GENERAL STURGIS was born in Pennsylvania in 1822, was appointed a Cadet at West Point in 1842, graduated in the same class with General McClellan in 1846, and immediately proceeded to join the army under General Taylor in Mexico the same year. He was taken prisoner on the 20th of February, 1847, two days before the battle of Buena Vista, while reconnoitring the enemy with but one man. In the act of daring it attributed much of the success of the battle of Buena Vista, as it was the first reliable information General Taylor had of the exact whereabouts of the enemy, and caused him to fall back and take the strong position which saved him the battle. After the Mexican War Lieutenant Sturgis accompanied Major Graham's command to California, and was constantly on active service there. He was promoted First Lieutenant First Dragoons in 1855, and in 1858 he was promoted to Captaincy in the First Cavalry for distinguished gallantry in a fight with the Mescalero Indians, for which he also received a vote of thanks from the Legislature of New Mexico. He was in the battle of Ojo Caliente, under Colonel Cooke, in 1854; also in the battle against the Cheyennes, under Colonel Loring, in 1855. He led a column of six companies of cavalry against the Kiowas and Comanches in 1860, overtaking them at Rock Creek, and Indian match through the s in the hottest of weather for weeks, and constantly routing a large force. Returning from the Plains, he witnessed the difficulties upon the Ohio rokes neutral lands. When lately in command Fort Smith, all of his officers having resigned and gone South, with a garrison of two small companies of cavalry, no cannon or fortifications, he started a well-contrived plan of the citizens of Fort Smith, in connection with the Governor of the State, to take the post, without having previously had any positive information of their intentions. He got his small force ready, and about half an hour before the Governor's forces arrived from Little Rock with ten pieces of artillery, he without his command, having all that was valuable, including twenty-five wagons, commissary stores, etc., retreating 170 miles to Fort Washita. For this he received a letter of thanks from Colonel Emory. He was promoted to the rank of Major First Cavalry, May, 1861. He commanded the column which moved down from Fort Leavenworth and joined General Lyon on Grande River, July 7, 1861. At the battle of Springfield, General Lyon, wishing to have a permanent force that would not go well with him, told Major Sturgis to keep near him. When the General fell Major Sturgis assumed the command for three hours, after that desperate fight continued, his little command holding out against about seven times their number, before forcing the enemy to fall back, reposing all their desperate charges, he found his little army too much crippled to follow them without almost a certainty of losing every man. He therefore withdrew his force to Springfield, and afterward succeeded in reaching Rolla with the entire command and a train of commissary stores valued at over one million of dollars.

THE REBEL GENERAL PRICE.

WE publish on page 641 a portrait of the REBEL GENERAL PRICE, who has just taken Lexington, Missouri—from a photograph sent us by our artist in the West.

Sterling Price is a native of Virginia, and resided for some time in Prince William County in that State. From thence he removed to Missouri, where he has resided for the last twenty years. He is by profession a lawyer, but occupied the important positions in the State service, and has also represented it in Congress. He was Governor before Robert Stewart. During the Mexican war he served in the Volunteers and rose to the rank of Colonel of Cavalry, and subsequently to that of Brigadier-General of Volunteers. When the Rebellion broke out he avowed himself a traitor, and was appointed by ex-Governor Claiborne Jackson Major-General of the State Militia of Missouri.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1861.

OPERATIONS IN THE GULF.

IT is generally understood that the Government has chartered the Baltic, Atlantic, some or all of Vanderbilt's steam fleet, and other steamships now lying in the port of New York. The event indicates the early departure of one or more of the expeditions to which we alluded in our last number but one. Common rumor asserts that two of these expeditions are to be fused together, and that a body of 12,000 men, with not less than 300 guns, will operate against a single point on the Southern coast.

Speculation is naturally rife on the subject of the point to be assailed. Not a few would be glad to hear that Charleston had been attacked and reduced. Our present troubles have arisen in great degree from the spite and malevolence of the people of Charleston. Unwilling to accept their own decline and fall as an inevitable fact, the people of South Carolina, in the vain hope of saving themselves, have involved the whole continent in bloodshed, and it would be only a righteous retribution if Charleston were bombarded and its harbor forever closed. An attack upon Savannah is recommended by the fact that there is a large Union party in Georgia, which would become active in the event of a landing being effected by our troops. Mobile, Pensacola, and New Orleans all invite attack. The occupation of any one of the three would probably reopen the cotton trade. Pensacola could be occupied under cover of the guns of Fort Pickens without difficulty and with a small force. Mobile and New Orleans would require more men and a more elaborate expedition. But the force now being fitted out in the Northern ports would suffice. A much smaller force would be adequate to seize Beaufort, North Carolina, or Port Royal, South Carolina, or Brunswick, Georgia, or any port in Florida or Texas.

Letters from the Gulf state that we have already occupied Mississippi City, and cut off the communication between New Orleans and Mobile. Various points at the mouth of the Mississippi have likewise been occupied by men detached from our ships of war. These landings, considered in connection with the preparations of General Butler at Fortress Monroe, would seem to indicate the mouth of the Mississippi as the probable destination of the great expedition which is expected to sail southward; though of course nothing is known for certainty, and it is quite likely that the Government may have encouraged the belief that an attack was intended to be made at New Orleans, when, in reality, Charleston, or Mobile, or Pensacola, or Mobile were the points in view.

The importance of the capture and occupation of one or more of these ports entirely depends on the nature of the occupation. If merely to hold Charleston, or Mobile, or New Orleans, and there administer the laws of the State of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, and not inconvenience the rebels, and would not tend to bring the rebellion to a close. All the rebels who could would leave for the interior; the others would submit under protest, and while trying to make as much money as they could out of our army, and devolving upon us the duty of doing their police duty at our expense, would hold themselves ready to assist all the rebels of the interior in expelling us as soon as it was safe to do so. In this country the interior does not follow the dominion of the seaboard. During the revolution Boston, Newport, New York, Philadelphia, and Charleston were generally in the hands of the British, and yet, from first to last their cause was desperate. If we are to gain any substantial advantage by the occupation of Southern ports, that occupation must involve intolerable inconvenience and suffering to Southern people; then they will begin to weigh the policy of submission to the Government; and overtures for reconciliation by the surrender of their ringleaders and the return of the people to their allegiance may fairly be expected.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

☞ THE public are reminded that Messrs. Harper & Brothers employ no TRAVELING AGENTS. Parties who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly had better remit direct to the Publishers, or pay their subscription to some Postmaster or General Agent with whom they are acquainted, and of whose responsibility they are assured.

☞ THE OLD POSTAGE STAMPS being no longer available at the Post-Office, Messrs. Harper & Brothers can no longer receive them in payment of subscriptions or copies of the Weekly or Magazine.

THE LOUNGER.

THE POST OF DUTY.

THERE seems at length to be a real effort to call men who are not necessary to business into the public service. Of course it is an incident of the war, nor is it likely to last forever. Yet we shall have hall a long time, and it will be remembered for a generation at least.

The names of well-known citizens are mentioned as probable candidates for the assembly, the Senate, etc. The nomination will be a test of patriotism. Men of large and various relations in life can not easily go to Albany. Merchants, bankers, lawyers, manufacturers of immense business, only go there at a sore sacrifice of time, money, and inclination.

But is not that the very sacrifice which the times demand? Can they show more plainly their lively devotion to the great cause, or their clear perception of its peculiar urgency at the moment, than by accepting the offices that may be offered them?

It has always been our national reproach that our best and wisest men abstained from active interest in public affairs. The political constitution of other countries compels the ablest men to be great proprietors, and invites, by every prize that it allures ambition, the services of gifted and capacious men. But with us political service, while it may readily be prostituted to venal ends, offers but an elusive prize to ambition. We must serve for duty's sake. It is the tax we must pay. And who loves to pay taxes?

Gentlemen who may be called upon to serve, and who recoil from the hard service, let your friends and constituents see, in your ready acceptance, that the great system we are all crying to save is fully worth saving.

IN PEACE PREPARE FOR WAR.

THE University of Michigan is the most amply endowed college in the West, and one of the most completely equipped in the country. It is situated delightfully at Ann Arbor, two or three hours west of Detroit, upon the Michigan Central Railroad. The head of the university is Dr. Tappan, an eminent scholar, and one of the most enlarged views, who has already impressed himself upon the history of education in this country. Dr. Brunow, one of the young professors who have made a name, fills the chair of astronomy. He was called to the Dudley Observatory upon the retirement of Dr. Gould to Chile, but is a man who goes for work rather than show, and the somewhat ornamental position at Albany was less agreeable to him than the post of duty at Ann Arbor, where he was not expected to discover a new comet every night. Andrew D. White is Professor of History and Belles Lettres—an eminent and elegant scholar, a devoted and beloved teacher, a generous and noble man. Professor Frieze is the accomplished teacher of Latin, and the college instructors are animated by the most intelligent interest in their pursuit. The situation of their University, the pioneer of letters upon the prairies, lends this band of scholars peculiarly close. The State of Michigan, with a liberality which is no less sagacious than patriotic, has made the university the crowning work in the country seems to the stranger full of life and energy as the University of Michigan.

The life of the students is necessarily simple. They are drawn to the college by the love of study of knowledge, and they willingly work their passage. There is a manly, robust quality which does not belong to all colleges, and most hands the impression of the university a little different from that of the Eastern colleges.

At an early period of the war the military spirit showed itself among the students. They were formed into a battalion, and every morning, already at the new hour, they were seen, rifle in hand, carefully fostered, and their manly discipline promoted by the teachers. And now, when it is evident to all that the call of the country must henceforth be, in some degree, military schools, the Board of Regents are considering a resolution to establish a permanent battalion of one company of artillery "under the conviction that this work" [of military training] "can be more economically performed for the State at large, where all the other studies, engineering, the higher mathematics, the modern languages, the natural sciences, and other studies connected with the profession of arms are now taught, than any where else in the State."

The plan is so admirable that it can hardly fail to be adopted in some form or other. That we are still men, although republicans—that Governments must be defended from traitors as well as foreign enemies—and that the most entirely disregarded the warning to prepare in peace for war, are points that will no longer be doubted or discussed. How to prepare for war is now the practical question; and the University of Michigan leads the way in the practical answer.

A ZONE OF FLOWERS.

ONE of the most delightful sights to a stranger in Paris is the flower market by the Madeleine. On the sunny spring mornings, as you stroll among the the plants and look at the church, you might easily fancy yourself in that ideal world which the poet Claude Lorraine loved to paint. But Paris is never contented with what it has accomplished. It must go on and fulfill its destiny of being the most magnificent metropolis and the most beautiful city in the world.

Monsieur Reydenouarde proposes now to girt Paris with a zone of flowers, without taking an inch of ground from the fields or church yard, but

The history of the past lies open to us all. And the charm of the fast-day sermons was the expression of the various views which honest thinkers will naturally entertain.

Not the least of the benefits of the war will be that true freedom of speech which for a long time this country has not known. Our condition since the danger of endeavoring to suppress any discussion in times of peace. Did this swift nation think to avoid danger by plunging its head into the sand? They only put the hammer of a pile-driving machine. It goes up, up, up, by rapid jerks, until suddenly some little thing touches a spring, and down it comes in one headlong, heavy, hopeless fall. Why be dismayed by the loss of Lexington? It was unavoidable that we should be beaten at first, and again almost every year. It ought not to be disheartening, and it would not be if we carried steadily in mind just what we are doing. We are building a navy, we are organizing an army to resist and destroy a rebellion which has been carefully organizing itself for years. When it crosses the Potomac or the Ohio, or when the black flag of the mad assassins of the nation floats unchallenged or unremoved upon a single rood of land beyond the section in which this rebellion sprung—then we may justly feel as if we were a little guilty of delay.

Meantime, while unrelaxing in effort, let us all be patient of inevitable waiting, of some inevitable mismanagement, and of many an inevitable disaster. But patient only so long as we feel that all that can be done to avoid waiting, mismanagement, and disaster, has been done.

KENTUCKY.

We had some hard words from friends in Kentucky, a few months since, for suggesting that she was trying to hold an impossible position. But the history of that time in that State shows clearly enough that there is no resting-point between the doctrine of absolute State independence and that of absolute national supremacy. If a State has the right to nullify the command of the Government for a national necessity, she has the right to secede at her pleasure. She takes the position of an entirely independent sovereign power; and that position is no more consistent with national supremacy than the total independence of a county is compatible with the supremacy of a State. The county has certain rights with which the State may not lawfully interfere; but in all that concerns the welfare of the State, the State is herself the judge and the subordination of the county must be unconditional.

If this, which is the simple and fundamental principle of the American system, had been adequately understood by the Union men in Kentucky, that State would be to-day either occupied and defended by national troops, or by her own citizens. But the loyalty of the border States has been a constitutional loyalty. Their nationality has been a modified patriotism. They have celebrated their own individual and limited glory much more than the splendor of the nation, from which all their separate distinction proceeds. Kentucky as a constituent part of this nation is an important and dignified State. Kentucky as a single independent power is utterly unimportant. And when the question was, shall we be a nation or are we not? when the question was to be decided by arms, Kentucky held aloof and said, "I must be counted out." But when the corn is burned in mill-stoves, when it is a question of meal or grain, of grinding or not grinding, you can not be counted out; you must be meal or corn.

Now the old State sees the necessity of the case, and she is rising and running to the rescue of the nation, in whose life is the blood of her own strength. The prayers and hopes of all loyal citizens go with her, but unless the citizens themselves go to Kentucky will pay the sad penalty of her toying with treason. Breckinridge and Burnett, Magoffin and James B. Clay, have done treason all the service they could by wearing a thin mask of technical loyalty until this time. It was doubtless expected for the rebels that the State should be paralyzed with "neutrality" until they were fully prepared to seize and hold her. They think they are so now, and the mask is dropped. Like Virginia, Kentucky is to be again a dark and bloody ground. The immediate result is perhaps hardly doubtful. No thoughtful man can doubt that the real sympathy of Kentucky is with the rebellion, while he will not be unjust toward the noble, patriotic hearts in the State who see that the great ultimate fatherland of America.

But whatever the present fate of the State may be, it will shake off the regnerating action of the country.

Public sentiment there as elsewhere will be purged by the purifying fire. And when the war is over, and the national honor is vindicated, that feeling of entire nationality which is to guide us in future, as it is to save us now, will inspire no State more fully than Kentucky.

PRESTIDIGITATING.

THE welcome which we hoped for Hermann has been heartier than any conjuror received here. When the vast Academy of Music has been thronged every evening and every morning when he has performed, is a question easy enough to answer if you regard only the surprising excellence of the performance, but very difficult if you reflect that Mr. Hermann was a mere name to us, and that the title, Prestidigitator, seemed such clap-trap as to be very unpromising. Think of it; Grisi, world-renowned, never fairly filled the building when she came with Mario and the glories of her fame. Hermann, a magician, unknown to us a month ago, begins with a crowd, and continues with an incessant crush. What is public opinion? What is the secret of public favor? If Robert Houdin had come we could understand it. Doubtless Hermann is better than Houdin; but why was it taken for granted?

Certainly nothing can surpass the elegance and the perfection of Hermann's conjuring. This particular Lounger has not seen him yet, but all the other Loungers in town have, and they tell the same story. So unanxious and unquestionable is the comfort, that it is no more permitted to doubt that Hermann is the greatest of living conjurors, than that Dickens is the greatest of living novelists. We have but a very loose kind of thing, probably, but not this thing. We have all seen men draw ribbons from their mouths and pound watches in mortars, and we have often untracked out of lovely woman's pocket handerchief. Oh yes, we have all heard Miss Pretty Dolly warble "Ah, now comes the" at all the musical evenings. But when we hear Jenny Lind or Alboni pour out that limpid, tender, heart-breaking strain—do we believe that we ever have heard it before?

If now we recur to the question Why this popularity, whence these crowds, that even famous artists have not attracted, would it not be a curious answer to say Ullman's. Let us suppose a case. There is an experienced manager of opera and other public amusements. The times demand a new and sharp sensation. The ingenious manager slips across the sea to Europe, and finds a magician. Presto! Fifth Avenue, New York are covered with brilliant placards, the windows glow with portraits, the newspapers sparkle with paragraphs, all foretelling the advent of a prestidigitator. The opening night arrives. The great theatre is crowded to see a conjurer hitherto unknown. Let us suppose that the ingenious manager knew by experience the mercantile value of a great crowd to a conjuror's success; that he consequently calls in the highly respectable known as dead-beats and fills up his house; and that he takes care every night that the crowd does not fall off. The result inevitably is long runs and all other lounges immediately ask, "Who is this magician that four thousand people go to see every night?" We shall all go to see. And all other people will go to see, and the audience, under such circumstances, is not likely to diminish. If you add that the performances is marvelous and masterly, will you be longer surprised at the crowd which is so suddenly evoked by Prestidigitation?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

MEMBERS OF AN AUTHOR'S WIFE.—"James! James! (in a louder key) I have been calling you this last half hour, and dinner is getting cold." "Oh, is it? Well, you know I have just killed the cruel old uncle; his property, of course, goes to his nephew, Charles, and is mine by right of his death. Keep the mutton hot until the scene is over.—Punch's Pocket-Book."

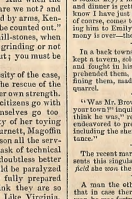
In a back township of Upper Canada, a magistrate, who kept a tavern, sold liquor to the people till they got drunk and fought in his house. He then issued a warrant, apprehended them, and fined them for an affray, besides fining them, made them treat each other to make up the quarrel.

"WAS Mr. Brown a very popular man when he lived in your town?" inquired a busy-body of his friend. "I should think he was," replied the latter, "for as many persons endeavored to prevent his hanging; and several of them, including the sheriff's deputy, followed him for some distance."

The recent marriage of a Mr. Day with a Miss Field produces this original remark, that although he gained the field she won the day.

A man the other day, on being asked his age, replied that in case there was no war he was forty-one—but it was the war forty-one.

THE latest Yankee invention is a new-fashioned traveling-bag, in which a man can sew himself upon a journey. He will travel without the bother of sewing himself on after a man for his fare. He places himself in the bag, and, taking it in his hand, passes for baggage.



SECRETARY CHASE'S BRIGADE.

When the celebrated Beau Nash was ill, Dr. Cheyne wrote a prescription for him. The next day the Doctor coming to his patient inquired if he had followed his prescription. "No, truly, Doctor," said Nash, "if I had I should have broken my neck, for I threw it out of a two-pair of stairs window."

"MR. Timothy," said a learned lady, who had been showing off her wit at the expense of a dangler, "you remind me of a barometer, that is filled with nothing in the upper story." "Divine Almira," meekly replied her adorer, "it is thankful I am that the fostering compliment let me remind you that you occupy my upper story."

A Boston editor, alluding to the long nose of Julius Cæsar, the Duke of Wellington, and other dignitaries, says that he recently saw a man in the street who had a nose so thin and straight, and nubbed at the end, and a foot long. In concluding, the writer seemed much chap-trap as to be very unpromising. Think of it; Grisi, world-renowned, never fairly filled the building when she came with Mario and the glories of her fame. Hermann, a magician, unknown to us a month ago, begins with a crowd, and continues with an incessant crush. What is public opinion? What is the secret of public favor? If Robert Houdin had come we could understand it. Doubtless Hermann is better than Houdin; but why was it taken for granted?

Certainly nothing can surpass the elegance and the perfection of Hermann's conjuring. This particular Lounger has not seen him yet, but all the other Loungers in town have, and they tell the same story. So unanxious and unquestionable is the comfort, that it is no more permitted to doubt that Hermann is the greatest of living conjurors, than that Dickens is the greatest of living novelists. We have but a very loose kind of thing, probably, but not this thing. We have all seen men draw ribbons from their mouths and pound watches in mortars, and we have often untracked out of lovely woman's pocket handerchief. Oh yes, we have all heard Miss Pretty Dolly warble "Ah, now comes the" at all the musical evenings. But when we hear Jenny Lind or Alboni pour out that limpid, tender, heart-breaking strain—do we believe that we ever have heard it before?

If now we recur to the question Why this popularity, whence these crowds, that even famous artists have not attracted, would it not be a curious answer to say Ullman's. Let us suppose a case. There is an experienced manager of opera and other public amusements. The times demand a new and sharp sensation. The ingenious manager slips across the sea to Europe, and finds a magician. Presto! Fifth Avenue, New York are covered with brilliant placards, the windows glow with portraits, the newspapers sparkle with paragraphs, all foretelling the advent of a prestidigitator. The opening night arrives. The great theatre is crowded to see a conjurer hitherto unknown. Let us suppose that the ingenious manager knew by experience the mercantile value of a great crowd to a conjuror's success; that he consequently calls in the highly respectable known as dead-beats and fills up his house; and that he takes care every night that the crowd does not fall off. The result inevitably is long runs and all other loungers immediately ask, "Who is this magician that four thousand people go to see every night?" We shall all go to see. And all other people will go to see, and the audience, under such circumstances, is not likely to diminish. If you add that the performances is marvelous and masterly, will you be longer surprised at the crowd which is so suddenly evoked by Prestidigitation?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE REBEL ARMY FALLING BACK.

THE WORD has been received in every immediately in front of Washington has fallen back, nor could their exact position be ascertained. The batteries on the Munson's Hill and Falls Church have been abandoned, and are now occupied by the Union troops. The position of the rebels at these points appears to have been very formidable. There were two lines of guns—having been mounted; their defenses were simply rifle-pits, but were three miles in front of the main body of the army.

THE SECOND FIFTY MILLION LOAN.

The Associated Banks of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia met, this week, in the Merchants' Exchange, on Saturday, at the Bank of Commerce in this city, and accepted Hon. Mr. Secretary Chase, who was present, for the second loan of $50,000,000 of the National Loan, to date from 15th of October.

DRAFTING NOT TO BE RESORTED TO.

Secretary Cameron has addressed a paper to the Governor of Iowa in which he declares that, not only from policy the opinion that the patriotism of the people can safely be relied on for the raising of men.

PERSONAL.

Colonel F. P. Blair has been released from arrest by General Fremont, and has returned to Washington.

Thurlow Weed promises, if a regiment or brigade of printers can be raised, that he will shoulder his musket and march away to the war along with his brethren of the craft.

Professor La Mountain, of Troy, has been order to report, with his balloon, to General McClellan at Washington. He is hopeful that the will be attached to the Commanding General's staff.

James B. Clay, who has been arrested for treason, is the oldest son of the late Henry Clay. He is the present owner of Ashland, the famed residence of his father. About four years ago he tore down the old house, and sold the house and rafters of which it was formerly composed, to be converted into walking canes. He represented the eighth district of Kentucky in the Thirty-second Congress.

Ulysses C. Wainwright and Isaac Wilcox have been elected by convention in St. Louis on the charge of 21 crimes against the Government, and found guilty. They were sentenced to be confined in jail during the war, and never to have their property confiscated for the benefit of the Government. The sentences were approved and confirmed and carried into effect.

Governor Sprague, of Rhode Island, is raising three more batteries in that State, which will make eight in all. A battalion of cavalry is also to be raised.

Rose Winslow has at last come to the conclusion that it is not good to be open and above board in treason, and has determined, if not to be its friend, at least not to do anything which will be construed as being the friend of treason. He has accordingly, as we hear from Fortress Monroe, taken the oath of allegiance, and on Monday night left the fortress for his home in Baltimore.

Three more persons have been released from their confinement in the Carpenter's Hall, viz.: Wall, of New Jersey; George L. Bowne, of Florida; and Pierce Butler, of Pennsylvania. The first two took the regular oath of allegiance prescribed by the last Congress, and the latter pledged himself to do no act hostile to the United States, and not to visit South Carolina without a passport from the Secretary of State.

Ex-Governor Henry A. Wise and his son, Oliver Jennings Wise, have been indicted by the present Grand Jury of the United States District Court, at Wheeling, Virginia.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

We read in the London Star of Sept. 6 that, while we have no wish to contradict, in the most positive manner, the statement made by some of the New York journals, and repeated by some of the correspondents of English newspapers, that Mr. Adams, the United States Minister at this Court, has received written home, expressing his belief that the British Government would recognize the independence of the Confederate States as a question of time and not of policy."

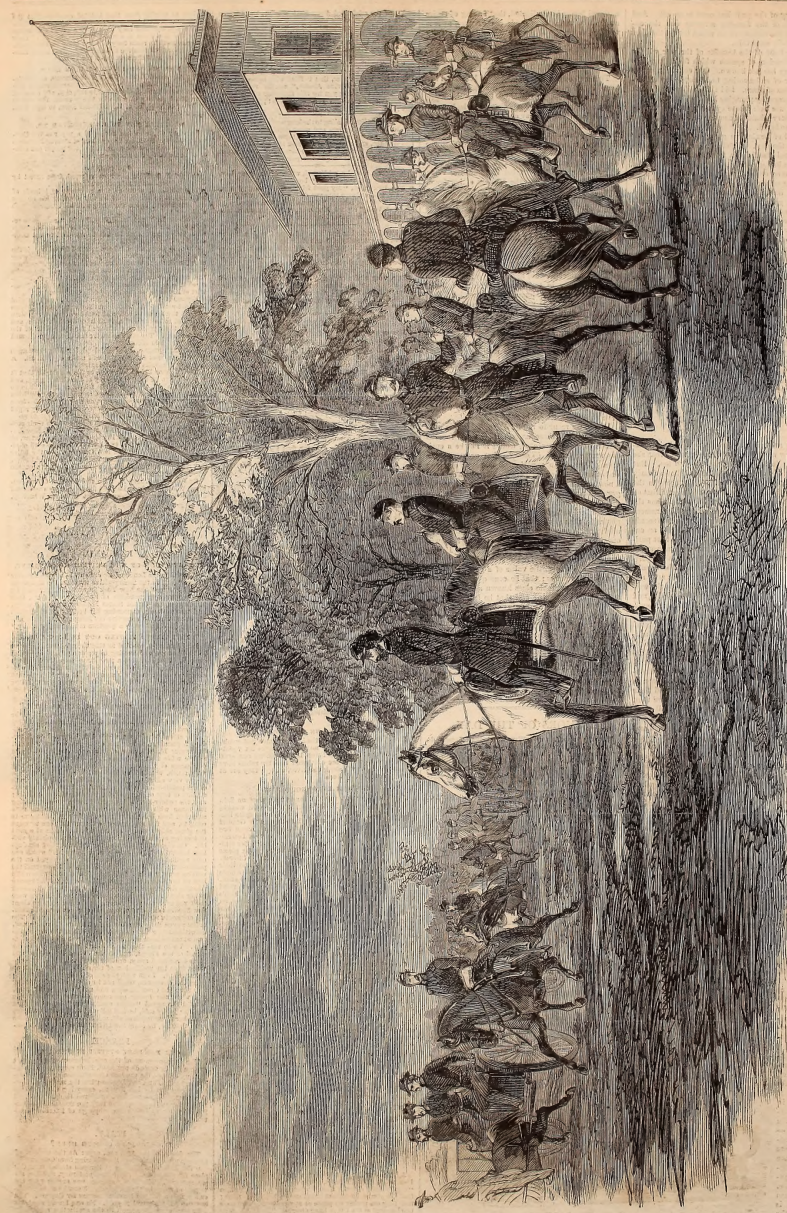
PRIVATEERS FITTING OUT IN ENGLAND.

Intelligence has been received so that the Government in England are endeavoring to procure privateers in that country. It is said that a new steamer, called the Sumter, built in Hartlepool and sailed for Plymouth, armed with six heavy guns, and fully manned. It was also reported that Mr. Fawcett had purchased two steamers, with rifling screws, which are now lying in the Victoria dock at London.

THE ACCIDENT TO THE "GREAT EASTERN."

Mr. Howard Paul, one of the passengers of the Persia, furnishes us with the following items concerning the Leviathan:

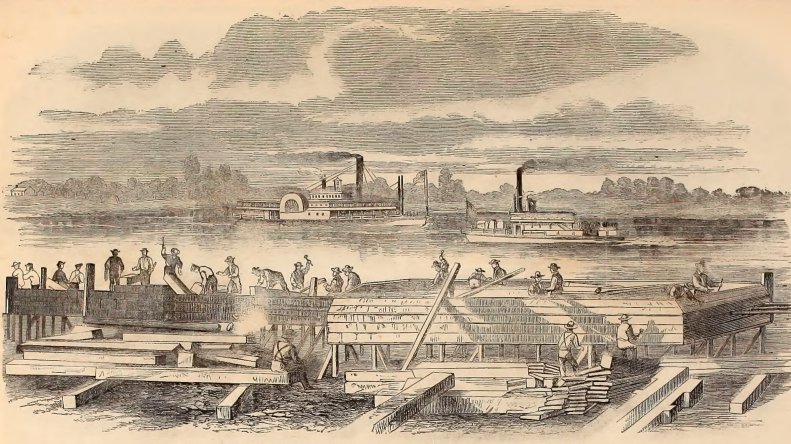
The steamship Persia, which left Liverpool on Saturday, September 7, and the Great Eastern on Sunday, September 15, at eleven o'clock A.M., two hundred and fifty miles out, met with a terrible accident, which for the passengers of the Persia observed that she was rolling very much, but had no idea of the accident which had occurred to the rudder. It was found that she had lost both of her paddle-wheels; the whole of the bottom of the engine of one had been carried away, and the other was ill or disabled; and the rudder-head being carried away, she was steering by the screw only. The paddle-wheels, Engine were stretched from bulwark to bulwark for the passengers to hang to, and the greatest rolling was found that one moment the great ship revealed the whole of her decks at a most alarming angle, and the next the keel was the only visible. On discovering the plight of the vessel Captain Cadman took a signal from the Great Eastern, which was only replied to by a large board being displayed on the paddle-box. The signal was, of course, incorrect, and the writing on it not be deciphered. The Great Eastern still kept on her course, making very little headway, for every minutes the Persia followed her in order to get an answer to her signal. The passengers of the Great Eastern were seated over the decks there were reported to be about one hundred and fifty on board. Some were observed leaning anxiously forward to catch a view of the Persia. The ladies were in the after-cabin, the saloon of the Persia, and, notwithstanding the extraordinary roll of the vessel, the utmost calm and quietness prevailed among them. Dinner was only replied to by a large board being displayed on the paddle-box. The signal was, of course



MAJOR-GENERAL FREMONT, U.S.A., AND STAFF INAUGURATING CAMP BENTON, AT ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI, BEFORE STARTING FOR LEXINGTON.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.—[SEE PAGE 646.]

BURNING THE PENSACOLA DRY DOCK, OFF FORT PICKENS, FLORIDA, ON AUGUST 31, BY LIEUT. SHIPLEY, U.S.A.—Sketched by Charles P. Allogger.—[See Page 655.]

CHARGE OF THE IRISH REGIMENT (COLONEL MULLIGAN) OVER THE BREAST-WORKS AT LEXINGTON, MISSOURI.—[See Page 646.]



BUILDING PONTOONS FOR MILITARY USE ON THE MISSISSIPPI.—[SKETCHED BY ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.]

THE WAR IN MISSOURI.

WE devote a large proportion of our space this week to illustrations of the War in Missouri. On page 644 will be found a picture of MAJOR-GENERAL FREMONT AND HIS STAFF INAUGURATING CAMP BENTON, which is located near the fair grounds, some two miles from St. Louis. The following are the names and rank of the members of General Frémont's staff:

Chief of Staff, Brigadier-General A. Asboth; Assistant Adjutant-General, Captain Chauncey McKeever; Military Secretary and Aid-de-Camp, Colonel J. H. Eaton; Chief Topographical Engineer, Colonel John Fiske; Chief of Ordnance, Colonel Gustave Waagner; Chief of Artillery, Lieutenant-Colonel James Totten; Judge Advocate, Major R. M. Corwin; Division Surgeon, Doctor T. Telkampf; Assistant Surgeon, Doctor John Cooper; Acting Assistant Q. M. General, Brigadier-General J. McKinstry; Deputy Paymaster-General, Lieutenant-Colonel T. P. Andrews; Commander of Body Guard, Major Charles Zagonyi; Musical Director, Captain A. Waldauer; Aids-de-Camp, Colonel A. Albert, Colonel Gustave Rheinec, Colonel J. P. C. Schaack, Colonel Owen Lovejoy, Colonel John A. Gurley, Colonel J. C. Woods, Major James W. Savage, Major Frank J. White, Major William Dorsheimer, Major H. Ramming, Major B. Rush Plumley, Captain J. R. Howard, Captain Leonidas Haskell, Captain Joseph Remingly.

The artillery seen in the picture are Totten's famous battery which did so much execution at the Battle of Springfield. The large building in the picture is the officers' quarters, the lower one the soldiers' barracks.

On page 645 we illustrate the CHARGE OF THE IRISH BRIGADE AT LEXINGTON. Every body has read the account of this splendid movement; how the rebels, outnumbering our forces in the proportion of four to one, had driven our outposts in, and were preparing to assault our intrenchments, when Colonel Mulligan mustered his Irishmen, sallied forth, and scattered the rebels at the point of the bayonet. Our artist has caught the spirit of the scene.

On this page we give a picture, from a sketch by Alexander Simplot, of the "NEW ERA," one of the new gun-boats built for Government service on the Mississippi; also, a picture of the PONTOONS NOW BEING BUILT ON THE MISSISSIPPI for the use of General Frémont's army. Pontoons are used for the passage of rivers by armies on the march. Latterly, in this country, our engineer officers have used vulcanized India-rubber pontoons, consisting of three cylinders connected together. From the appearance of the objects depicted in the sketch, we should judge that Frémont's pontoons are more like scows, which will not be taken out of the water, but will be floated down with the expedition which descends the Mississippi.

Finally, on page 653, we publish a fine picture of the BATTLE OF LEXINGTON, from sketches sent us by one of our Western artists who was in the place when it was attacked. By way of further description of the scene we give the following extract from the correspondence of the Chicago Tribune:

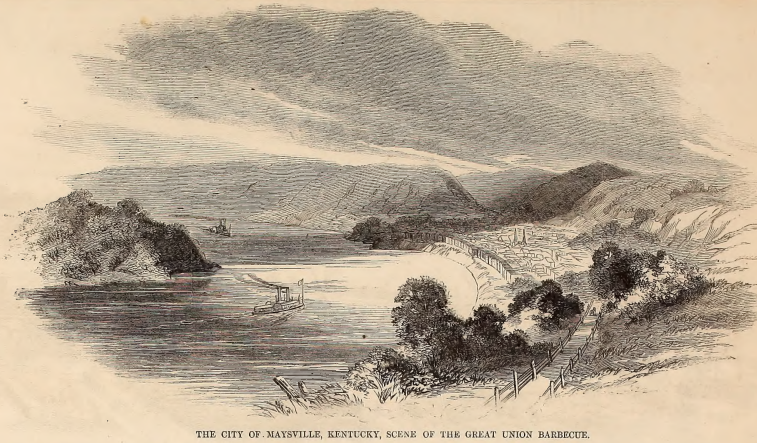
The situation of the Federal troops grew more desperate as day after day passed. Within their lines were picketed about the wagons and trains a large number of horses and mules, nearly three thousand in all, now a serious cause of care and anxiety, for as shot and shell plunged among them, many of the animals were killed and wounded, and from the struggles of these latter the danger of a general stampede was imminent. The havoc in the centre of the intrenchment was immense. Wagons were knocked to pieces, stores scattered and destroyed, and the ground strewn with dead horses and mules.

On Wednesday, the 12th, an evil from the first apprehended fell upon Colonel Mulligan's command. They were cut off from the river and their water gave out. Fortunately a heavy rain, at intervals, came greatly to their relief. But to show how severe the straits of the men, the fact may be stated of instances occurring where soldiers held their blankets spread out until thoroughly wet, and then wrung them into their camp dishes, carefully saving the precious fluid thus obtained. Famine also began to grow sheet. The fighting at this time, from the 10th to the 21st, knew little cessation. The nights were brilliant moonlight, and all night long the roar of the guns continued, with an occasional sharp rattle and skirmish without the works.

From the first but one spirit pervaded our troops, and that was no thought or word of surrender, except among some of the Home Guards, who had done the least share of the work and the fighting. The cavalry behaved nobly, and could the full details be written up, some of their charges, brave charges on the enemy's guns would shine with any battle exploits on record.

General Price sent Colonel Mulligan a summons to surrender, to which the gallant commander sent a refusal, saying, "If you want us, you must take us." But the defection and disheartenment of the Home Guards intensified daily, and on Friday, the 31st, while Colonel Mulligan was giving his attention to some matters in another portion of the camp, the white flag was raised at his own instance by Major Becker, of the Home Guards, from the portion of the intrenchment assigned to him.

THE GUN-BOAT NEW ERA, JUST BUILT AT ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—[SKETCHED BY A CORRESPONDENT.]



THE CITY OF MAYSVILLE, KENTUCKY, SCENE OF THE GREAT UNION BARBECUE.

Captain Simpson, of the Last Rifles, called Colonel Mulligan's attention to Major Becker's action instantly, and the Jackson Guard, Captain M'Dermott, of Detroit, were sent to take down the flag, which was done. The heaviest part of the fight of the day followed in a charge upon the nearest battery of the enemy, the Illinois cavalry suffering severely.

The Home Guards then left the outer work, and retreated within the line of the inner intrenchments, about the college building, refusing to fight longer, and here again raised the white flag, this time from the centre of the fortifications, when the fire of the enemy slackened and ceased. Under this state of affairs Colonel Mulligan, calling his officers into council, decided to capitulate, and Captain M'Dermott went out to the enemy's lines with a handkerchief tied to a ramrod, and a parley took place. Major Moore, of the brigade, was sent to General Price's headquarters, at New Lexington, to know the terms of capitulation. These were made unconditional, the officers to be retained as prisoners of war, the men to be allowed to depart with their personal property, surrendering their arms and accoutrements.

Reluctantly this was acceded to, and the surrender took place. At 4 P. M. on Saturday the Federal forces, having laid down their arms, were marched out of the intrenchments to the tune of "Dixie," played by the rebel band. They left behind them their arms and accoutrements, reserving only their clothing. The boys of the brigade many of them wept to leave behind their colors, each company in the brigade having its own standard presented to it by their friends. At the surrender the muster rolls of the companies were taken to General Price's head-quarters, the list of officers made out, and these ordered to report themselves as prisoners of war.

General Price is now in possession of Lexington, and Major-General Frémont has gone up the Missouri River to attack him; while General Sturgis and General Hunter are converging upon Lexington from the northwest and south.

THE WAR IN KENTUCKY.

We publish herewith, from a sketch by Mr. H. Mosler, a view of Camp Rosseau, near Muldraugh's Hill, Kentucky. This is a camp of Union troops, situated 31 miles north of Louisville, Kentucky, and 7 miles from Muldraugh's Hill, on the railroad to Nashville, Tennessee. Troops from Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky are rapidly congregating here, and there is a strong prospect of an early brush.

We also give, from a sketch by another contributor, a view of Maysville, Kentucky. The artist writes us as follows:

Maysville, Kentucky, September, 1861.

Having attended the Grand Union Barbecue recently held near this place, I seized the opportunity to make a sketch of the beautiful little city. It was necessarily a hasty one, but will serve to give you an idea of the scenery and situation. It was through Maysville that the Government arms were first introduced into Kentucky which had so marked an effect in preventing "precipitation;" and near here, in the lovely woodland just behind the lofty, precipitous hill on the extreme right of the picture, around which you may see winding the magnificent Macadamized road that leads to Lexington, and within sight of La belle Riviere, was held the barbecue of which I spoke. This was the largest gathering I have seen for years. There were speakers from Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee. Among those from the last-named State was Hon. Horace Maynard. Colonel Charles Marshall, a prominent citizen of this county (Mason), contemplates the establishment of a camp in the vicinity of this place.

Before the introduction of railroads into the State Maysville was the grand gate-way of trade and travel between the South and East. It is still a town of considerable importance, but is principally remarkable at present for the gallantry and hospitality of its people, and the beauty of its situation and its women.

Bickets.

Telegrams dated Louisville, Kentucky, September 28, say:

Agents are now stationed along the Ohio River, to prevent the smuggling of arms into Kentucky.

The Bulletin says that 500 troops from Terra Haute, Indiana, have gone up Green River, Kentucky, and taken possession of locks Nos. 1 and 5. One shot was fired at them, and the fire was returned, killing their assailant. Many Union families have fled to Evansville from the Green River country.

A regiment of cavalry from Ohio has gone into camp near Covington, on the Lexington pike.

Cynthiana, Kentucky, is occupied by Federal troops. National flags were flown to the breeze from the Louisville Hotel and Gault House to-day.

Seventeen Secessionists, among them James B. Clay and Colonel H. C. Harris, of Madison, were brought to Louisville this afternoon and committed. A writ of habeas corpus in Clay's case has been issued, returnable before Judge Catron on Monday.

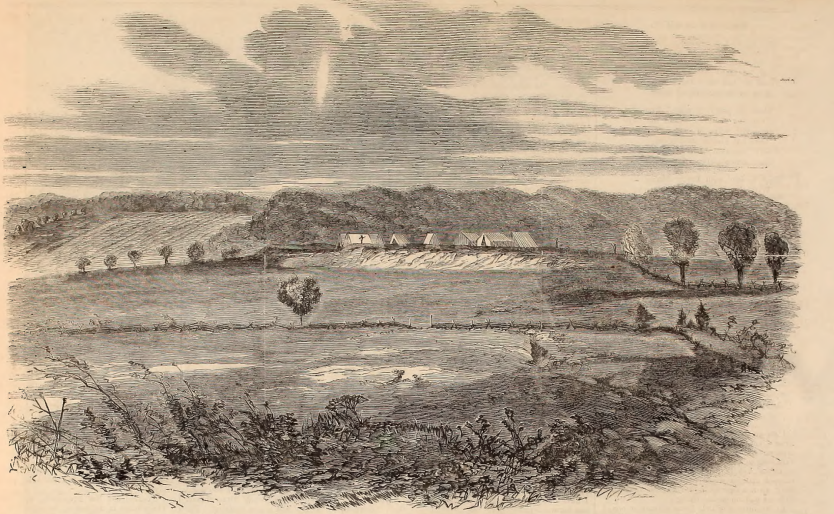
Benton Otterby, a lawyer of this city, was arrested, but released on taking the oath of allegiance.

CAMP OF GENERAL ROSSEAU'S BRIGADE, NEAR MULDRAUGH'S HILL, KENTUCKY.—[Sketched by Mr. H. Mosler.]

Butler.
Wool.
McCall.
Rosecrans.
McCook.
Anderson.
McDowell.
Sibley.
Bichker.
McClellan.
Scott.

Hunter. Siegel. Sprague. Prentiss. Mansfield. Tyler. Burnside. Banks. Frémont. Lander. Heintzelman. Dix. Curtis. Stone.

ALS.



SECTION OF THE EARTH-WORKS COMMANDING THE APPROACHES TO LEESBURG, VIRGINIA, ON THE SOUTH.—[SKETCHED BY A MEMBER OF GENERAL GORMAN'S COMMAND.]

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT ON THE OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD.

WE illustrate on this page the terrible RAILWAY ACCIDENT which occurred on 17th ult. on the OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD. The Cincinnati Commercial thus describes the event:

At ten minutes to nine on the night of 17th the train, consisting of six cars carrying about 250 men of the 19th Illinois Regiment, Colonel Torchin, had broken the bridge down under the following circumstances: The engine passed the bridge in safety, the first car was thrown off the track, but ran to a place twenty yards beyond the bridge; but the second car fell directly into the creek, hind end downward; the fourth and fifth cars ran on top of the third, crossing it flat as a board. In the third car was Company I, where the greatest mortality took place. The sixth and last car, containing the field-officers and their attendants, was not injured.

Those who escaped represent the scene as full of every conceivable horror. Fires were soon lighted on the banks, messengers dispatched for assistance, and the work of rescue begun. All the while the air resounded with the groans, prayers, and imprecations of the sufferers.

Before daylight eighteen bodies were recovered in addition to rescuing all the living. Lieutenant Whetten was caught by both legs between two platforms, and it required three-fourths of an hour to clasp and saw him out, every blow of the axe causing intense agony. A colored servant, caught in a similar though less painful situation, was two hours undergoing the operation of rescue. A brakeman, with an arm and leg both broken, crawled from under the bottom car to a place of safety.

Fortunately, both the regimental surgeons, their hospital steward, and Lieutenant Kellot, also physicians, were in the forward car and escaped without injury. Companies I and G were the greatest sufferers—the latter entire company, except Lieutenant Bridger and two corporals, were more or less injured. The Colonel, who is an old Mexican campaigner, Lieutenant Kellot, and Life-Major Moore, were accompanied by their wives. These ladies not only rendered great assistance in dressing the wounded, but even tore their under garments off their persons to make bandages.

It is not known whether the accident was the work of malice or misfortune.

EARTH-WORKS NEAR LEESBURG, VIRGINIA.

THESE are apparently but temporary breastheights, inclosing a small encampment erected subsequent to the construction of the works. They occupy the brow of an eminence some four miles distant from Edward's Ferry.

The accompanying view is telescopic, and was obtained from the summit of a mount in the neighborhood of the former place. Numbers of the insurgents are daily seen on and near the intrenchments, although their force is very limited.

TERRIBLE RAILWAY ACCIDENT ON THE OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD.

PRETTY MABEL.

SIDE by side with Pretty Mabel
Sate I with the sunshade down:
In the distance hummed the Babel
Of the many-footed Town;
There we sate with looks unstable—
Now of tenderness, of frown.

"Must we part? or may I linger?
Wax the shadows, wanes the day."
Then, with voice of sweetest singer
That has almost died away,
"Go!" she said; but tightened finger
Said articulately, "Stay!"

Face to face with Pretty Mabel,
With the gauzy curtains drawn;
Till a sense, I am unable
To convey, began to dawn;
Till the slant sun flung the gable
Far athwart the sleepy lawn.

"Now I go. Adieu, adieu, love!
This is weakness: sweet, be strong.
Comes the footfall of the dew, love!
Philomel is combining song."
"Go!" she said; "but I go too, love!
Go with you, my life, along!"

Hand in hand with Pretty Mabel,
Through perplexities of life;
Mid all other shiftings stable,
Quiet 'mid surrounding strife;
No mere forms of plight and fable,
But—a Husband and a Wife.

CADER IDRIS—THE CHAIR OF IDRIS.

I AM an old bachelor now, the object of an interest—not, perhaps, wholly unselfish—to my nephews and nieces. Be it so. They will not have long to wait. The one bright thread in the darksome web of my life was snapped, rudely snapped, many a weary year ago, and I am only sorry when a new spring-time comes round and finds me still among the living.

In the autumn of 1829 I was staying in one of the wildest and most secluded districts of Wales, not, as one's gray-haired, broken man, but young, happy, and rich in friends, in prospects, and, above all, in that elastic spirit of hopefulness that forms the best heritage of those who enter the world. Talglyn Hall, one of those moss-grown stone mansions whose weather-beaten masonry look old enough to be built with the eternal hills that overshadow them, was the place of my temporary abode. The Hall was the ancestral residence of a Welsh gentleman whom I shall call Griffith. It was his friend and guest; indeed we were distantly related, and I was to have been the husband of his youngest daughter. Dear, lost Ellen! with what painful distinctness, after all these years, does her gentle image rise before me, in all the bloom of that youthful beauty on which the hand of Time was never to be laid.

Mr. Griffith, a widower, had five children to cheer his hearth, and of these three were daughters. The two eldest were handsome enough, but Ellen, their younger sister, then scarcely seventeen, was a beautiful and winning as a fairy. No wonder that I admired her. Admired is a cold, pale phrase. She was born to be loved, and I loved her with a deep, strong, fervent love which time has never gained the mastery. I do not wish to linger on that happy period of alternate hope and fear, of tokens warmly eked out by glances, and all the petulant changes of passion. Suffice it that my love was returned at last, and that before my long visit was at an end Ellen had plighted me her simple troth. I went honestly to Mr. Griffith, and told him all. He was not displeased. He appeared, in fact, hardly to be surprised. Lovers, indeed, are generally very transparent in their wily stratagems for hood-winking the world, and even the most careless household is speedily aware of the progress of an attachment. But Mr. Griffith, though not averse to receiving me as a son-in-law, was not willing that his daughter should marry at seventeen, and was besides desirous that time should test whether we, the principal parties in the case, really knew our own minds. We both thought this decision very tyrannical and absurd. I am sure that it was right, and blind, and wise. For a year Ellen and I separated. I was to work busily at the bar, as before; the Griffiths were to travel, to visit watering-places and cities, and to vary their usual mode of life, in order that Ellen might see something of the world before she irrevocably fixed her fate in it. And, if all went well, and we were both continued of the same disposition, after the lapse of a twelvemonth, why then—

Then! How cruel seemed the suspense and the banishment when that short sentence was to then be unchanged a year hence, fifty years hence, my younger readers may think their own hearts. We obeyed. I not only obtained some credit as a rising junior at the bar, where I already possessed a certain feeling—not, I dare say, to circumstance its exact degree—to the eminent and probable of all—but I was to be match. And with the weary w[illegible] over, the year was out, and I was [illegible] again to claim my bride. I went out to fly with [illegible]. Ellen had the old loving look in her dear blue eyes; she had been excited and flattered, but no one had been able to win away her heart from me, and the Squire admitted that I had established a probation turned out more satisfactory than ours. All the family were kind, warm-hearted people; they welcomed me cordially among them; they were willing to half me as a brother though they did grudge a little at times that I should rob them of the light of their home, the darling of them all, for Ellen was but[illegible]. She had been very pretty a year before, but had now expanded like a flower, and was as sweet a type of the more fragile order of womanhood as ever existed. I was surprised to see how much she had developed in so short a time, but she loved me none the less for the greater experience of life which she had gained in the past year. Our wedding-day was fixed; the preparations were nearly completed, and my sisters, who were to be bridesmaids jointly with Ellen's sisters, were shortly expected at Talgiyn. And now but a few days intervened between me and the crowning happiness of my life—that happiness which was never to be.

I have painted nothing as yet but a picture of hope and happiness, a sunny tea and white-sailed pleasure-barks gayly gliding over the soft summer waves. Now comes the blacker sketch of wreck and storm. Ellen had one failing. She was too harsh a word, one flaw in her nature. She had a pretty waywardness, an impatience of contradiction that never degenerated into obstinacy, but became imperious, but which in one endowed with a less sweet temper would infallibly have done so. As it was, it rather took the form of a lively defiance, so winning, so full of grace, that you could scarcely have the heart to wish it away. But there were times when Ellen's petulant caprice became a source of terror to those who loved her best. I have known her persist in maintaining her seat on a plunging, kicking horse, full of vice and mettle, and which exerted every sinew and every artifice to hurl from the saddle its slender but unconquerable rider. Equally, I have seen her run, mocking our cowardice, along the brink of a fallen tree that bridged a cataract, slippery though that tree was with the washing of ceaseless spray, and perched at a fearful height above the rugged rocks and the dark pool below. And in a mountain excursion, no one, not even her dare-devil young brothers, ventured so often on the most dangerous precipices as Ellen did, laughing the while. Yet she was no Amazon, but when the whim was over, showed all a girl's timidity in fear of peril. It was contradiction that nettled her to rashness. One evening, after a happy day spent partly on the hills and partly in boating on the Talgiyn lake, the conversation turned, somehow, on the superstitions of Wales. One legend called forth another, and some of her relations, who had heard me hear these weird tales as Ellen, or told them so charmingly and simply. At last she related a particular story which I have had too much reason to remember, which has burned into my brain like a fiery brand, the story of the Lady of Cader Idris. The legend has reference to the Welsh pronunciation of that it is by some considered anterior to even Merlin, that "he who spends a night in the chair or Cader Idris will be found mad, or a poet, or a seer." Some relates that Merlin sat there, and that Taliesin also went through the dread ordeal that touched his lips with the fire of genius.

"You know," broke in young Herbert Griffith, "the gap cut in the live rock, on the high peak where the chair is, and which they call it. It looks like the throne of some queer old king. I showed it to you when we went shooting dotterels. Beg your pardon, Ellen."

Ellen went on to relate how, long ago, in the thirteenth century, the lady of the manor, a beautiful and wilful maiden, who had many friends the Lady of Cader Idris, had resolved to undergo this terrible trial in the hopes of becoming imbued with the spirit of poetry. Her lady-love, with all her usual courage and headstrong will, she had persisted in her resolve, in spite of the entreaties of her kindred, the prayers of her friends, and the remonstrance of her confessor. How she had gone up alone to the haunted hill-top, where, as legends tell, spectres keep a watch-fire, and where the mountain-winds and had faced storm, and darkness, and all the horrors of the visible and viewless. Finally, how she had been found on the following morning quite dead, seated in the rocky throne on blue Idris, with her long dark hair floating over the stones as she sat, in an attitude of repose, and with on her face an expression of awful fear stamped on her open eyes and fair pale face. The tradition added that, on account of the impiety of the lady's request to commands, the pitiless church had denied her poor body Christian burial, and that she had been laid, in silence and in secret, by the hands of her unhappy kinsmen, under a cairn of pebbles on the hill-top.

Then Ellen went to her harp, and sang or first the wild Welsh air that belongs to the legend, sweet in elder days, and then the polished verses which Mrs. Hemans had penned on the same theme. Nor was it till the last echo of her voice died away that my voice had long died away that we recovered from the impression of the weird and mournful tale, and began to express our admiration of the challenge in probability. I remember we all took part, in a sportive way, against Ellen and the legend. Her wish was, or seemed to be, to ridicule, by daring and spoiled child of the household, and also perhaps to atone to ourselves for having been for a time more completely under the spell of the genius than we could well unravelled. But to start a discussion is like rolling a stone down-hill. It starts gently, gliding down grassy banks and springing playfully from rock to rock, gaining in leaps with huge bounds, gaining force every instant, till it thunders from crag to crag, and crashes into the valley below. Ellen's opinion was grew warm and lively, almost bitter. Ellen was piqued and ruffled. She had called us one of her favorite tales, one which she had loved and dwelt upon, and which was grown to be almost a part of herself, and we had listened—and laughed. She had not the experience that ripe years impart, and which would have made her suspect that our derision was in a measure defensive and overstrained, and she was vexed, and showed it. She was quite angry with her jeering brothers, but I came in for the full weight of her indignation.

"Why was I incredulous? Did I think woman's nature so frivolous and cowardly that nothing brave or self-devoted could be looked for from a woman?"

To this I replied, with provoking gravity, "That I thought the story a pretty one, but that it was as improbable as the adventures of King Arthur and his knights, and that I never saw or heard of any female capable of confronting so much risk and discomfort." Finally, I declared the "Lady of Cader Idris" a pure invention of some crack-brained harper. Ellen's scornful eyes flashed, and she tossed her golden ringlets as she turned away. All might have gone well had not some mischievous fiend whispered to me to improve my victory. So I did. I waxed very witty and satirical, and the company applauded, and the Squire, who was asleep, and Ellen, who stamped her little foot angrily on the floor, exclaiming:

"I will prove that a woman dares do more than you fancy. I will go through this ordeal, that you believe impossible. We shall see who is right, you or I."

And she left the room at once. When she came back, half an hour later, she was quite calm and collected. She had had a conversation as usual, and spoke pleasantly of the projects for pike fishing in the Llyn, for a late picnic to some celebrated cascade, for a ball, and a ride to the county town. But there was a feverish restlessness in her air, and she broke off rapidly from talking on one subject to diverge to another. She sat down when asked, to harp or piano, but she played but a few bars, and then rose again, saying she could not remember a tune. This change of manner caused me some concern, and I went up to her, and said, in a low tone,

"Ellen, are you ill?"

"Ill? No," she answered, in an abstracted manner, and moved away.

"You are not offended with me?" I began. "I did not mean—"

"No, I am not offended," she answered, with some constraint, and then began to take the keenest interest in the pike-fishing that Herbert was trying.

We exchanged no other word until every one had retired to rest, and it came to my turn to wish her "Good-night." Then she took my hand between her own little white fingers, and for a moment gazed in my face with a strange look that has haunted me ever since—that will haunt me to my dying hour. Sorrow, reproach, affection, and an undercurrent of firm but hidden determination, were blended in that look, but the fatal that I ever received from those fond blue eyes that I had hoped would be a sunshine in my house from youth till age. I have too much reason to remember it.

"Good-night," as if it had a new meaning. She turned away.

"Ellen!" said I, springing after her, "one moment, Ellen!"

She did not seem to hear. She glided from me, and was out of the room before I stood motionless. False pride made me ashamed of my anxiety. Even then, after the loss of one precious moment, I should have followed her, but the Squire called to me, candle in hand, from his study door, to say something about to-morrow's pike-fishing, and the opportunity was lost. Alas! alas! that I should not then have been the magic power of one word of real kindness and contrition?—it might have altered the whole current of our future.

That has been one long and unavailing regret. But the word remained unspoken. I went to my chamber, a prey to a thousand of the wings, close of the gray turret where, beneath its conical roof of slate, the alarm-bell hung. A slowly undressed, and was about to turn in, when I stood motionless. False pride made me ashamed of my anxiety. Even then, after the loss of one precious moment, I should have followed her, but the Squire called to me, candle in hand, from his study door, to say something about to-morrow's pike-fishing, and the opportunity was lost. Alas! alas! that I should not then have been the magic power of one word of real kindness and contrition?—it might have altered the whole current of our future.

That has been one long and unavailing regret. But the word remained unspoken. I went to my chamber, a prey to a thousand of the wings, close of the gray turret where, beneath its conical roof of slate, the alarm-bell hung. A slowly undressed, and was about to turn in, when I stood motionless. Before me was a large circular window, often peering forth through the Elizabethan casement of diamond panes, many of which were darkened by the heavy drapery of the bed. [illegible] All was ghostly still in the garden below, where the stiff hedges of clipped holly, the terraces fringed with box-trees, the fountain, the broad, old-fashioned walks were white with moonshine. An owl was hooting in the wood, and the mastiff in the courtyard was howling dismally. I rose to shut, and rattled his chain. The moon was high and bright, but black clouds were sailing across the sky; and, as I looked, I saw that, during the hurry and bustle of a trap-door had been opened above some fiery gulf, then vanished as quickly. "There will be a storm to-night," I said to myself. I turned from the window for the last time. I was very ill-satisfied with myself, and, as often happens, I perversely chose to punish myself by blaming my lady-love Ellen. "She had no right to be so positive and so petulant," I said to myself. It angured ill for our future happiness that we resent pain the words so deeply. But in the morning I would speak to her, reason with her—in the morning? We are blind, blind, blind!

My prediction that there would be a storm that night was fulfilled to the letter. A storm there was. It was ushered in by a peal of thunder that sounded in my sleeping ears as if the trumpet of the archangel were calling sinners to judgment. Crash upon crash, roar upon roar, till the vault of heaven was full of the grandest music, and the ancient mansion rocked like a living creature in fear. The blaze of the lightning, broad and bright, flooded the whole sky with a lurid splendor, and left between the stunning bursts of the thunder might be heard the howl of the wind and the battling of the hail and rain. I rose and dressed. A ship was shipwreck and ruin, and death of travelers on lonely moorland roads, and toppling down of gray steeples, and hail and rain and wind went on lashing and tearing at the casement.

I fell asleep, not a strange dream I had. I dreamed of the high peak of Idris, with its storm-lashed terrace of mossy stone, the cairn of loose pebbles, and the rocky chair, deep cut in the very brow of the horrid cliff, with a yawning precipice below. And the chair was not empty. No. It had a tenant, and that tenant bore a female shape. I could see the white robe fluttering through the blackness of night, and the loosened hair, and the hand that was pressed to the eyes, as if to shut out some ghastly sight of things unspeakable, while its fellow grasped the rocky rim of the throne. Then the thunder bellowed overhead, and the lightning flashed in fiery forks and hissing zigzags, ringing the hill-top with a flaming diadem, blazing, red, and menacing, through the abyss below, and illuminating with a dreadful light that solitary form, whose midst the wrath of the elements. The tempest broke in its might upon the peak of Idris; hail, rain, wind, swept the mountain as with a besom, and the pale form in the fantastic chair endured them all. Strange, unearthly shrieks were blended with the howl of the wind; wild and distant pageants trooped by amidst the driving mists and sheets of blinding rain; and by one lurid glare of the lightning I saw the figure remove the hand that hid its face. The face of a young girl—of Ellen!—but so ghastly with terror, so full of agony and nameless horror, that I awoke, trembling and unnerved, with great heat-drops on my forehead, such as excessive bodily pain might have called forth. The storm still raged, but more feebly. Yes, it was subsiding now. I sank back again, but this time into a heavy, dreamless slumber. I woke in the golden, brilliant morning: the sky was blue, the birds were singing gayly, and the verdure of the country seemed fresher and richer than before the storm. My spirits rose as I dressed; I was in the best of tempers, and I made a resolution that I would not chide Ellen for her wilful conduct of the preceding evening, but would let my very considerate and kind, and would even say I was sorry to have hurt her feelings by a careless word. I went down to the breakfast-room. The Squire was there, with his two elder daughters and his eldest son, while the young Herbert came in with his fishing-rod a moment later. But no Ellen. The old butler brought in the urn, after we had exchanged a few remarks, and then, for the first time, Ellen's absence was commented upon.

"She is not usually the last one," said her father. "Owen, you had up Miss Ellen's maid to let her know we are waiting breakfast."

The man went. We chatted on. But Owen came back with a blank look to say that she maid had found the door locked, and that she had knocked repeatedly, but without getting an answer.

This astonished us all.

"She must be ill!" cried Charlotte, the eldest sister, hastily leaving the room.

Soon, the two came back to say that she had called aloud at the door, but that Ellen would not reply a word.

"Perhaps she has gone out," said Herbert.

"The window in the oratory that opens out of her room leads right on to the terrace by the greenhouse, and I know there are steps to the garden."

"Nonsense," said the Squire, knitting his brows, "that door has been locked these 50 years, and the key lost too. Ellen has overslept herself. I am ill."

We all went up in a body. Two or three of the servants were on the landing-place.

"I am afraid, Sir," said the lady's maid, half crying, "something's amiss. We can't hear a sound. It's all as still as death."

Something of the kind shot across all our minds as we heard this speech.

We neared the door; the Squire tapped.

"Ellen! Ellen, love! answer, my darling; are you ill?"

No reply.

Mr. Griffith set his strong shoulder against the door, and by a violent effort dashed it in. We entered. The room was tenantless—empty.

"She has gone out, after all," cried Herbert, running to the old oratory, and pointing to the long disused door, now wide open.

"Miss Ellen must have gone out last night," stammered one of the women, "for the bed has not been touched."

Last night! In the storm! Impossible. Yet on tracking farther we found on the terrace a bow of ribbon, drenched and heavy with moisture. It had evidently been dropped by the wanderer all recognized it as Ellen's—on the previous night, before the rain began.

"She must be found, I say, poor child," grounded the Squire, "or is she playing us a trick? No, she never could have the heart to trifle with us in such a way!"

Suddenly a horrid thought flashed across my mind. My dream! the dispute of the previous night —the strange mysterious latter in which she took leave of me—all these came crowding back.

"I know where she is," I cried aloud. "I know it was no dream. She has gone up on Cader Idris, dead or mad by this, and I am the accursed cause."

"My poor fellow, your anxiety makes you talk wildly," said the Squire. "Cader Idris; how can she be there? Impossible!"

"She is there," cried I, in an accent of agonized conviction that none could resist; "she spoke of going through the ordeal of the rock-chair last evening; and I—I had that fearful dream. Oh! why was I so perishing in the tempest. Follow me, and waste no time. For Heaven's dear love be quick, and bring restoratives, if in mercy it be not too late!"

My vehemence bore down all opposition. In less than five minutes we were mounted and on foot of the mountain. But I outstripped them all. My heart was on fire, and my feet were gifted with unusual speed. Up, among the loose rocks and loose stones, up by bush and crag, by rock and water-course, and by tracks only trodden by the goat, and I stand panting on the terrace, at the foot of peak above, a yawning precipice below. My dream was too terribly realized. There, in the rock-hewn chair, with its low mantle of stone, a mantle of gay plaid, both of them drenched and stained with rain and earth, lay Ellen, cold and dead! Her large fair head half hid her pale face, and her little hands were tightly-clasped log-ther. I clasped her to my breast; I called wildly on her name; I parted the dank hair that hid her face, and as it I saw imprinted the same agony of fear, the same dark horror, as in my fatal dream. But she was dead, my dear, dear Ellen! and I think my heart must have broken then, as I saw her, forever. Since that day the world has been a prison to me,

GRAND CAVALRY AND ARTILLERY REVIEW AT WASHINGTON ON SEPTEMBER 24, 1861.

GRAND CAVALRY REVIEW AT WASHINGTON.

ONE of the finest displays of cavalry and artillery ever witnessed upon this continent was made on Sept. 24 on the parade grounds one mile east of the Capitol. There were two thousand cavalry and eight batteries of artillery in line. Each battery consists of six pieces, making forty-eight pieces. About an equal proportion of 32-pound howitzers, Parrot rifled cannon, James's rifled cannon, and Napoleon guns constituted the character of the ordnance. The cavalry was under the command of General Stoneman, and the artillery under the command of General Barry, both aids to General McClellan, and detailed to the several services named. The whole was reviewed by Major-General McClellan at four o'clock. The General was accompanied by General Van Vleet, Quartermaster of the Department of the Potomac, Inspector-General Marcy, Captain Sykes and Captain Hudson, of General McClellan's staff, General Mansfield and staff, General Andrew Porter and staff, General Fitz-John Porter, General Meigs, General Keyes, General Smith, General Hooker and staff, including Prince Salm-Salm, and the Prince de Joinville and son and two nephews. This entire party accompanied the commanding General in the grand review. It was witnessed by at least five thousand people, and was highly satisfactory to General McClellan, to guests, and to the spectators generally.

The Prince de Joinville, Prince Salm-Salm, and other experienced military gentlemen from the classic fields of Europe, who have witnessed many military displays in their own countries, express their admiration of the appearance of our men, especially when they learned how short a time they had been mustered into service, and do not hesitate to say that they never witnessed a spectacle equal to it in Europe. The character of the ordnance and precision of manœuvres of our men elicited their enthusiastic applause.

The companies of regular cavalry on the ground, though indifferently equipped, showed good drill, and the raw volunteer regiments evidenced much improvement upon their condition when brought here a month since.

THE BATTLE OF LEXINGTON, MISSOURI.—From Sketches by a Western Correspondent.—[See Page 646.]

THE DARKEST HOUR.

DESPAIR not, Poet, whose warm soul aspires
To breathe the exalted atmosphere of fame;
Give thy heart words, but purify its fires,
So that thy song may consecrate thy name;
Sing on, and hope, nor murmur that the crowd
Are slow to hear and recognize thy lay:
Thy time will come if thou art well endow'd;
The darkest hour is on the verge of day.

Despair not, Genius, wherever'e thou art,
Whate'er the lent and purpose of thy mind;
Use thy rich gifts with an unfailing heart,
And wait till Fortune deigneth to be kind.
The world is tardy in its help and praise,
And doubts and dangers may abound thy way,
But light oft pierces through the heaviest haze;
The darkest hour is on the verge of day.

Despair not, Patriot, who in dreams seblime
Sees'st the future nation glorious yet unborn,
And fain wouldst chide the laggard wings of Time,
Because they bring not the transcendent morn.
Be firm in devotion's hour by hour;
We seem to travel on a sunward way,
And what some fashions now may be as clear
The darkest hour is on the verge of day.

Despair not, Virtue, who in sorrow's hour
Sigh'st to behold some idol overthrown,
And from the shade of thy domestic bower
Sing'st some heroic dirge, some bird of promise flown;
God chastens but to prove thy faithfulness,
And in thy sadness he will be thy stay;
Trust and deserve, and He will soothe and bless;
The darkest hour is on the verge of day.

Despair not, Man, however low thy state,
Nor scorn the meanest thing that crosses thee full;
Learn to disdain the impious creed of Fate,
And own the Providence who governs all.
If then in toiling thou hast earned with,
Thy conscience clear, thy reason not astray,
Be this thy fulth and consolation still—
The darkest hour is on the verge of day.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

A STRANGE STORY.

By SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXV.

MY intercourse with Margrave grew habitual and familiar. He came to my house every morning before sunrise; in the evenings we were again brought together: sometimes in the houses to which we were both invited, sometimes at his hotel, sometimes in my own home.

Nothing more perplexed me than his aspect of extreme youthfulness, contrasted with the extent of the travels, which, if he were to be believed, had made him of the known world unexplored. One day I asked him, bluntly, how old he was?

"How old do I look? How old should you suppose I was?"

"I should have guessed you to be about twenty, till you spoke of having come of age some years ago."

"Is it a sign of longevity when a man looks much younger than he is?"

"Conjoined with other signs, certainly!"

"Have I the other signs?"

"Yes, a masculine beauty, perhaps a matchless, constitutional organization. But you have evaded my question as to your age; perhaps it was an impertinence to put it?"

"No; I came of age—let me see—three years ago."

"So long since? Is it possible? I wish I had your secret!"

"Secret! What secret?"

"The secret of preserving so much of boyish freshness in the wear and tear of man-like passions and man-like thoughts."

"You are still young yourself—under forty?"

"Oh yes! some years under forty."

"And Nature gave you a much grander frame and a much finer symmetry of feature than she gave to me."

"Pooh! pooh! You have the beauty that must charm the eyes of woman, and that beauty in its nature forms one of youth. Happy man if you love, and wish to be sure that you are loved again."

"What you call love—the unhealthy sentiment, the feverish folly—I left behind me, I think forever, when—"

"Ay, indeed—when?"

"I came of age!"

"Hoary cynic! and you despise love! So did I once. Your time may come."

"I think not. Does any animal, except man, love its fellow she-animal as man loves woman?"

"As man loves woman? No, I suppose not."

"And why should the subject-animals be wiser than their king? But, to return—you would like to have your youth and my careless enjoyment of youth?"

"Can you ask—who would not?" Margrave looked at me for my years with unusual seriousness, and then, in the abrupt changes common to his capricious temperament, began to sing still one of his barbaric chants—a chant different from any I had heard him sing before —made either by the modulation of his voice or the nature of the tune—so sweet that, little as music generally affected me, this thrilled to my very heart's core. I drew closer and closer to him, and murmured when he paused,

"Is not that a love-song?"

"No," said he, "it is the song by which the serpent-charmer charms the serpent."

CHAPTER XXVI.

INCREASED intimacy with my new acquaintance did not diminish the charm of his society, though it brought to light some startling defects both in his mental and moral organization. I have before said that his knowledge, though it had swept over a wide circuit and dipped into curious, unfrequented recesses, was desultory and erratic. It certainly was not that knowledge, sustained and aspiring, which the poet assures us is "the wing on which a man soars to heaven." So, in his feelings themselves there were singular inequalities, or contradictions. His power of memory in some things seemed prodigious; but when examined it was seldom accurate; it could apprehend, but did not hold together with a binding grasp, what metaphysicians call "the association of ideas." He seemed unable to put it to any steadfast purpose in the sciences of which it retained, vaguely and loosely, many recondite principles. For the sublime and beautiful in literature he had no taste whatever. A passionate lover of nature, his imagination had no sympathy with the idea by which nature is expressed or idealized; wholly unaffected by poetry or painting. Of the fine arts, music alone attracted and pleased him. His conversation was often eminently suggestive, touching on much, whether in books or mankind, that set one thinking; but it was rarely instructive. It rather uttered any of those noble or tender sentiments which come spontaneously to the lips of youth and blossom out from the wisdom which labor accords to genius.

In his character there seemed no special vice, no special virtue, but a wonderful want of joyousness, animal good-humor. He was singularly temperate, having a dislike to wine, perhaps from fastidiousness. Of late when living my health absolutely perfect. No healthful child likes alcohols, no animal, except man, prefers wine to water.

But his main moral defect seemed to me in a want of sympathy, even where he professed attachment. He did feel so much for himself, so much himself, he unmanned at the bite of a squirrel, and sob at the thought that he should one day die, was so callous to the misery of another as a deer who deserts and butts from him a wounded comrade.

I give an instance of this hardness of heart where I should have least expected to find it in him.

He had met and joined me as I was walking to visit a patient on the outskirts of the town, when we fell in with a group of children, just let loose for an hour or two from their day-school. Some of these children were gathered round him as having played with them at their homes; they ran up to him, and he seemed as glad as themselves at the meeting.

He suffered them to drag him along with them, and became as merry and sportive as the youngest of the group.

"Well," said I, laughing, "if you are going to play at leap-frog, pray don't let it be on the high road, for I shall be run over by some gig or draymen; see that meadow just in front to the left—off with you there!"

"With all my heart," cried Margrave, "while you pay your visit. Come along, boys."

A little urchin, not above six years old, but who was lame, began to cry, he could not run—he should be left behind.

Margrave stopped. "Climb on my shoulder, little one, and I'll carry you."

The child dried its tears, and delightedly obeyed.

"Certainly," said I, to myself, "Margrave, after all, must have a nature as gentle as it is simple. What other young man, so courted by all the allurements of the great himself from pleasure, would stop in the thoroughfares to play with children?"

The thought had scarcely passed through my mind when I heard a scream of agony. Margrave had leaped the railing that divided the meadow from the road, and in so doing the poor child, perched on his shoulder, had, perhaps from surprise or fright, loosened its hold and fallen heavily. Its cries were piteous. Margrave clasped his hands to his ears—uttered an exclamation of anger—and not even stopping to lift up the boy, or examine what hurt he was, called to the other children to come on, and was soon rolling with them on the grass, and pelting them with daisies. When I came up only one child remained by the sufferer—his little brother, a year older than itself. The child had fallen on its arm, which was not broken, but violently contused. The pain must be excruciating. I carried the child to its home, and had to remain there some time. I did not see Margrave till the next morning when he then called. I felt so indignant that I could scarcely speak to him. When at last I rebuked him for his inhumanity he seemed perfectly unable to comprehend what the circumstance, and then merely said—as if it were the most natural confession in the world—

"Oh, pshaw! my dear fellow, I told you that I hate discords. I am pleased with the company of children; but they must be children who laugh and play. Well! why do you look at me in that way? What have I said to shock you?"

"Shock me—you shock manhood itself! Go; I can't talk to you now. Go, I say!"

But he did not go; and his voice was so sweet, and his ways so winning, that disgust insensibly melted into that sort of forgiveness one accords (let me repeat the illustration) to the deer that forsakes its comrade. The poor thing knows no better. And what a graceful, beautiful thing this was!

The fascination—I can give it no other name —which Margrave exercised was not confined to me, it was universal—old, young, high, low, man, woman, child, all felt it. Never in Low Town had stranger, even the most distinguished by fame, met with a reception so cordial—so flattering. His frank confession that he was a natural son, far from being to his injury, served to interest people more in him, and to prevent all those inquiries in regard to his connections and antecedents, which would otherwise have been afloat. To be sure, he was evidently rich, at least he had plenty of money. He lived in the best rooms in the principal hotel; was very hospitable; visited the families with whom he had grown intimate; made them bring their children — music and dancing after dinner. Among the families in which he had established familiar acquaintance was that of the mayor of the town, who had bought Dr. Lloyd's collection of subjects in natural history. To that collection the mayor had added largely by a very recent purchase. He had arranged these various specimens, which his last acquisitions had enriched by the interesting carcasses of an ugly elephant and a still uglier hippopotamus, in a large wooden building contiguous to his dwelling, and which had been constructed by a former proprietor (a retired fox-hunter) as a riding-house. And being a man who much affected the diffusion of knowledge, he proposed to open this museum to the admiration of the general public, and to be ready to respond it to the Athenæum or Literary Institute of his native town. Margrave, seconded by the influence of the mayor's daughters, had scarcely been three days at L—— before he had persuaded this excellent and public-spirited functionary to inaugurate the opening of the museum by the popular ceremony of a ball. A temporary corridor should unite the drawing-rooms, which were on the ground-floor of the house, with the room contained the collection; and thus the fete would be elevated above the frivolous character of a fashionable entertainment and consecrated to the solemnization of an intellectual institute. Dazzled by the brilliancy of this idea, the mayor announced his intention to give a ball that should include the surrounding neighborhood, and be worthy, in all expensive respects, of the dignity of himself and his family. A night had been fixed for the ball—a night that became memorable indeed to me! The entertainment was announced with the usual interest, in which even the Hill condescended to share. The Hill did not much patronize mayors in general; but when a mayor gave a ball for a purpose so patriotic, and on a scale so magnificent, the Hill liberally acknowledged that Commerce was, on the whole, a thing which the Eminence might, now and then, condescend to notice without absolutely descending from the rank which Providence had assigned to it among the High Places of earth. Accordingly the Hill was represented by its Queen to honor the first magistrate of Low Town by a promise to attend his ball. Now, as this festivity had originated with the suggestion of Margrave, so, by a natural association of ideas, every one, in talking of the ball, talked also of Margrave.

The Hill had at first affected to ignore a stranger whose debut had been made in the mercantile circle of Low Town, but the Queen of the Hill now said, sententiously, "This new man in few days has become a Celebrity. It is the policy of the Hill at once to Celebrities, if the Celebrities pay respect to the Proprieties. Dr. Fenwick is requested to procure Mr. Margrave the advantage of being known to the Hill."

I found it somewhat difficult to persuade Margrave to accept the Hill's condescending overture. He avowed that he was unlike to all societies pretending to aristocratic distinction—a dislike expressed with a fierceness so unwonted that it made me suspect he had at some time or other been subjected to mortification by the supercilious airs that blow upon heights so elevated. However, I succeeded to my insistance, and accompanied me one evening to Mrs. Poyntz's house. The Hill was encamped there for the occasion. Margrave was accordingly civil to him, and after a few commonplace speeches bearing that he was fond of music, consigned him to the caressing care of Miss Brabazon, who was at the piano, the musical department in the Queen of the Hill's administration.

Mrs. Poyntz retired to her favorite seat near the window, and I followed to cheer her; and while she knitted in silence, in silence my eye glanced toward Margrave in the midst of the group assembled round the piano.

Whether he was in more than usually high spirits, or whether he was actuated by a malign and impish love of mischief, or whether, in spite of decorum by which the gayeties of the Hill were habitually subdued into a serene and somewhat insipid pleasantness, I know not; but it was not many minutes before the orderly aspect of the place was grotesquely changed.

Miss Brabazon began to come to the close of a complicated and dreary sonata, I heard Margrave abruptly ask her if she could play the "Tarantella, Lydia Languish's favorite air which is founded on the legendary belief that the bite of the tarantula excites an irresistible desire to dance. She replied that Lydia's excitement was that she was ignorant of the air, and had not even heard of the legend, Margrave said, "Let me play it to you." And before the astonished Miss Brabazon graciously yielded her place at the instrument. Margrave seated himself—there was great curiosity on his perfect features—and Margrave's fingers rushed over the keys, and there was a general start, the prelude was so unlike any known combination of harmonious sounds. Then he began a chant—song I can scarcely call it—words certainly not in Italian, perhaps in some uncivilized tongue, perhaps in impromptu gibberish. And the torture of the instrument now commenced in good earnest: it shrieked, it groaned: wilder and noisier. Beethoven's Storm, roused by the fell touch of a German pianist, were mild in compasison; and the mighty voice, dominating the anguish of the cracking keys, had the full dispason of a chorus. Certainly I am no judge of music, but to me ear the discord was terrific—to the ears of better informed amateurs it seemed ravishing. All were spell-bound; even Mrs. Poyntz paused from her knitting, as the Fates paused from their web at the lyre of Orpheus. To this fearless delight, however, soon succeeded a general desire for movement. To my amazement, I beheld these formal amateurs and sober fathers of families forming themselves into a dance, turbulent as a children's ball at Christmas. And when, suddenly desisting from his music, Margrave started up, caught the skeleton hand of Jean Miss Brabazon, and whirled her into the centre of the dancing, I could have fancied myself of a witch's sabbat. My eye turned in scandalized alarm toward Mrs. Poyntz. That great creature seemed as much astonished as myself. Her eyes were fixed on the scene in a stare of positive stupor. For the first time, no doubt, in her life she was overcome, deposed, dethroned. The awe of her presence was literally whirled away. The dance ceased as suddenly as it had begun. During which the gallanized mummy whom he had selected as his partner, Margrave shot to Mrs. Poyntz's side, and said, "Ten thousand pardons for quitting you so soon, but the clock warns me that I have an engagement elsewhere." In another moment he was gone.

The dance halted, people seemed slowly returning to their senses, looking at each other bashfully and ashamed.

"Good heavens! my dear," sighed Miss Brabazor at last, sinking into a chair, and casting he, deprecating, fainting eyes upon the hostess.

"Fever!" said fat Mrs. Bruce, wiping her forehead.

"Witchcraft!" echoed Mrs. Poyntz, "it does indeed look like it. An amusing and preposterous exhibition of animal spirits, and not to be endured by the Proprieties. Where on earth can that young rapscallion have come from?"

"From savage lands," said I. "So he says."

"Do not bring him here again," said Mrs. Poyntz. "He would soon teach us how to topsyturvy. But how charming! I should like to see more of him," she added, in an under voice, for the Hill seemed to me something moving, and not in the presence of those for whose Proprieties I am responsible. June must be out on her ride with Lieut. Colonel."

Margrave never again attended the patrician festivities of the Hill. Invitations were poured upon him, especially by Miss Brabazon and the other old maids of the Hill.

"Those people," said he, "are too tame and civilized for me; and so few young persons among them. Even that girl June is only young on the surface; inside, as old as the World or her mother. I like youth, real youth —I am young, I am young!"

And, indeed, I observed that he would attach himself to some young person, often to some child, as he did to cordial and genial favor, yet not more than an hour or so, never distinguishing them by the same preference when he next met them. I think that remark is made in reproof of his fickleness, one evening when he had found me at work on my ambitious book, reducing the old world measure the Laws of Nature.

"It is not fickleness," said he, "it is necessity."

"Necessity! Explain yourself."

"I seek to find what I have not found," said he; "it is my necessity to seek it, and among those I meet and disappointed in one, I turn to the other. Necessity again. But find it at last I must."

I suppose you mean what the young usually seek in the young; and if, as you said the other day, you have left love behind you, you now wander in search of God it."

"Tush! If I may judge by the talk of young fools, love may be found every day by him who looks out for it. What I seek is among the rarest of all discoveries. You might aid me to find it, and in so doing aid yourself to a knowledge beyond all that your formal experiments can bestow."

"Prove your words, and command my service," said I, feeling somewhat doubtful.

"Yet me told me that you had examined into the alleged phenomena of animal magnetism, and proved some persons who pretended to the gift which they denied to call second sight to be humbling impostors. You were right. I have seen the clairvoyants who drive their trade in this line of imposture; and my experience is stored, unknown to the possessor, undetected by the common observer; but the signs of which shall be as apparent to the modern physiologist as they were to the ancient priest."

"At least, as a physiologist, an ignorant of the signs—what are they?"

"I should despair of making you comprehend them by mere verbal description. I could guide your perceptions to distinguish them unerringly were living subjects before us. But not one in a million has the gift to an extent available for the purposes of science, and with the world ugly it. Many have imperfect glimpses; few, few indeed, the unveiled, lucent sight. They who have but glimpses are simpletons misled and dupe the minds that consult them, because, being sometimes marvelously right, they excite a credulous faith in their general accuracy: and as they are but translators of dreams in their own brain, their assurances are no more to be trusted than are the dreams of commonplace sleepers. But where the gift exists to perfection, he who knows how to direct and to profit by it should be able to discover all that he desires to know for the guidance and preservation of his own life. He will be forewarned of every danger, forearmed in the means by which danger is avoided. For the eye of the true Pythoness matter has no obstruction, space no confines, time no measurement."

"My dear Margrave, you may well say that creatures as gifted are rare; and for my part, I would as soon search for a unicorn as to use your affected expression, for a Pythoness."

"Nevertheless, whenever there come across the course of your practice some young creature to whom all the evil of the world is as yet unknown, to whom the ordinary cares and duties of the world are strange and unwelcome; who from the earliest dawn of reason has lived to or apart and to music; before whose eyes visions pass unsolicited; who converses with those who are not dwellers on the earth, and beholds in the space landscapes which the earth does not reflect—"

"Margrave, Margrave! whom are you going to speak?"

"Whose frame, though exquisitely sensitive, has still a health and a soundness in which you recognize no disease; whose mind has a truthfulness that you know can not deceive you, and a simple intelligence too clear to deceive itself; who is moved to a mysterious degree by all the varying aspects of external nature—innocently joyous, or unaccountably sad; when, I say, such a being comes across your experience, you form me; and the chances are that the true Pythoness is found."

I had listened with vague terror, and with more than one exclamation of amazement, to descriptions which brought Lilian Ashleigh before me; and I now sat mute, bewildered, breathless, gazing upon Margrave, and rejoicing that at least Lilian he had never seen.

He returned my gaze steadily, searchingly, and then, breaking into a slight laugh, resumed:

"You call my word 'Pythoness' affected. I know of no other. My recollections of classic anecdote and history are confused and dim; but somewhere I have read or heard that the priests of Delphi were accustomed to travel chiefly into Thrace or Thessaly in search of the virgins who might duly administer their oracles, and that the oracles gradually ceased in repute as the priests became unable to discover the organization requisite in the priestesses, and supplied by craft and imposture, or by such imperfect fragmentary developments as belong now to professional clairvoyance, the gifts which Nature failed to afford. Indeed, the demand was one that must have rapidly exhausted so limited a supply. The constant stretch upon faculties unwearing to the vital functions in their relentless exercise, under the artful stimulants by which the priests heightened their power, was mortal, and no Pythoness ever retained her life more than three years from the time that her gift was elaborately trained and developed."

"Pooh! I find no classical authority for the details you so confidently cite. Perhaps some such legends may be found in the Alexandrian writers; but those mystics are no authority on such a subject. After all," I added, recovering from my first surprise or awe, "the Delphic oracle, ever proverbially ambiguous, and their responses might be rend either way, a proof that the priests dictated the verses, though their arts of duping unhappy priestess might throw her into real convulsions, and the real convulsions, not the false gift, might shorten her life. Enough of this idle subject! Yet no! I must question more. If you found your Pythoness, what then?"

"What then? Why through her aid I might discover the process of an experiment which your practical science would assist me to complete."

"Tell me of what kind is your experiment; and precisely because such little science as I possess is strictly practical, I may assist you without the help of the Pythoness."

Margrave was silent for some minutes, passing his hand several times across his forehead, which was a frequent gesture of his, and then rising, he answered, in weary, listless accents:

"I can say more now, my brain is fatigued; and you are not yet in the right mood to hear me. By-the-way, how close and reserved you are with me."

"How so?"

"You never told me that you were engaged to be married, or to leave town, when though I have won your friendship, to hear what concerns you so intimately from a comparative stranger."

"Who told you?"

"That woman with eyes that pry and lips that scheme, to whose house you took me."

"Mrs. Poynte! Is it possible? When?"

"This afternoon. I met her in the street—she stopped m and, after some unmeaning talk, asked 'if I had seen you lately; if I did not think you very absent and distracted; no wonder—you were in love. The young lady was away on a visit, and would by a dangerous rival.'"

"Wooed by a dangerous rival!"

"Very rich, good-looking, young. Do you fear him? You turn pale."

"I do not fear, except so far as he who loves truly loves humbly, and fears not that another may be preferred, but that another may be worthier than himself. But that Mrs. Poynte should tell you all this does amaze me. Did she mention the name of the young lady?"

"Yes; Lilian Ashleigh. Henceforth be more frank with me. Who knows? I may help you. Adieu!"

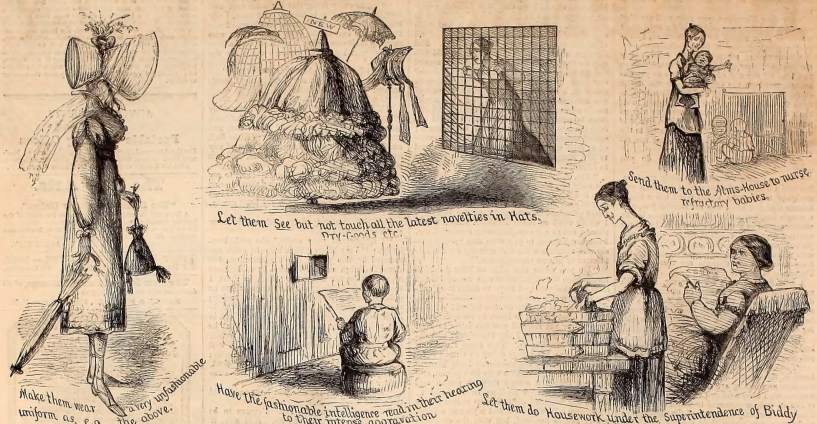
CHAPTER XXVII.

WHEN Margrave had gone I glanced at the clock—not yet nine. I resolved to go at once to Mrs. Poynte. I was not an evening on which she received, but doubtless she would see me. She owed me an explanation. How thus carelessly divulge a secret she had been enjoined to keep? and this rival, of whom I was ignorant? It was no longer a matter of wonder that Margrave should have described Lilian's peculiar idiosyncrasies in his sketch of his fabulous Pythoness. Doubtless Mrs. Poynte had, with unpardonable levity of indiscretion, revealed all of which she disapproved in my choice. But for what object? Was this her boasted friendship for me? Was it consistent with the regard she professed for Mrs. Ashleigh and Lilian? Occupied by these perplexed and indignant thoughts, I arrived at Mrs. Poynte's house, and was admitted to her presence. She was fortunately alone; her daughter and the Colonel had gone to some party on the Hill. I would not take the hand she held out to me on entrance; seated myself in stern displeasure, and proceeded at once to inquire if she had really betrayed to Mr. Margrave the secret of my engagement to Lilian.

"Yes, Allen Fenwick; I have this day told not only Mr. Margrave, but every person I met who is likely to tell it to some one else, the secret of your engagement to Lilian Ashleigh. I never promised to conceal it; on the contrary—"

I wrote word to Anne Ashleigh that I would therein act as my own judgment counseled me. I think my words in that hasty letter to Mrs. Ashleigh, written by Lady Haughton, and delivered by Mr. Vigors. That letter I will now state to you; but before doing so I must enter into a preliminary explanation. Lady Haughton is one of those women who love power, and can not obtain it except through wealth and station—by her own intellect never obtain it. When her husband died she was reduced from an income of twelve thousand a year to a jointure of twelve hundred, but with the exclusive guardianship of a young son, a minor, and adequate allowances for the charge; she continued, therefore, to preside over a house of the establishments in town and country; still had the administration of her son's wealth and rank. She granted his estates in order to maintain her ascendency over him. He became a brainless prodigal—spendthrift alike of health and fortune. She watched, and

HOW TO DEAL WITH FEMALE TRAITORS.



MRS. —— and MRS —— Illuminated their Houses on receipt of the News of the Fall of Lexington.—Washington Correspondence.

STOP THIEF!

The Honorable and Neutral Position occupied by the Hon. JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. (Drawing his Salary as U. S. Senator, and furnishing Valuable Information to JEFF DAVIS at the same time.)

The New York State Fair.

Held at Watertown, September 17, 18, 19, and 20, 1861, awarded to the FINGER & LYON SEWING-MACHINE COMPANY THREE OF THE FOUR AWARDS made on Sewing-Machines, viz.:

"Best Double-Thread Sewing-Machine;"
"Best Manufacturing Machine;"
"Best Sample of Work on Sewing-Machine;"

Another evidence that we have the best Sewing-Machine for all kinds of work in the world!

Send for a circular, which, with samples of work, will be sent to any part of the world, mail free. Address

FINKLE & LYON SEWING-MACHINE CO.,
No. 505 Broadway, New York.

GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN and our New Union Pain Gift Packages are to be wondered at. Seventy-five cents worth of indispensable articles for 25 cents. Agents are making from $5 to $10 per day. Agents wanted, male and female, everywhere. Address, with stamp for circular, RICHARDS & CO., 399 Broome Street, New York.

Man-of-War Manual.

Manual of Internal Rules and Regulations for Men-of-War. By Capt. U. P. Levy, U.S.N. Cloth, 70 cents. Sent free by mail on receipt of price.
This day published by
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
192 Broadway.

AGENTS WANTED—For the BEST WAR MAPS, VIEWS, and PORTRAITS.—65 Maps, 7 Views, 5 Portraits. Samples of all on receipt of $1. Circulars sent free. Address E. F. LLOYD, Publisher, 305 Broadway, New York.

Mechanics and Inventors, Arouse!

NOW IS THE TIME TO THINK, TO INVENT, and to develop new inventions.
Now is the time to secure Patents and have them READY for the renewal of business so far inactive.
Now is the time to make arrangements for the manufacture of new and useful articles of all kinds.
Now is the time to secure Patents in England, France, Belgium, and other European countries.
Inventors, wake up! Messrs. MUNN & CO., proprietors of The Scientific American, No. 37 PARK ROW, N. Y., having a branch office in Washington, continue to exhibit Patents or models on the most extensive scale and in the best manner.
They have acted as attorneys for more than 15,000 patentees, to all whom they refer.
All who want their patent business done with despatch, and on reasonable terms, should address or apply as above.
Pamphlets of advice to inventors, in different languages, about Patent Laws, &c., furnished free.
MUNN & CO. are permitted to refer to Hon. Judge MASON,

Hon. Joseph Holt,

Hon. W. D. BISHOP, Ex-Commissioner of Patents.

ALL WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Wedding Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 182 Broadway. Samples by mail.

GAME, MEATS, FISH, &c., improved by the use of LEA & PERRIN'S Worcestershire Sauce. JOHN DUNCAN & SONS.
Union Square and 14th Street, Sole Agents.

Barnum's American Museum.

Dickens's

"Great Expectations"

Has been dramatized expressly for Barnum's Museum, and will be brought out here

On Monday next, Oct. 7th,

WITH ENTIRE NEW SCENERY by Mr. GEORGE HEDGE, A FULL ORCHESTRA, NEW PROPERTIES, COSTUMES, &c. All the other attractions of the Museum will remain in full force, making the most interesting place of amusement in New York; nevertheless the price of admission remains at only 25 cts. Children under 10 years, 15 cts.

WEDDING CARDS.
These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only by EVERDELL & SON, 302 Broadway.
Specimens by Mail, on receipt of 3 stamps.

JEWELRY! JEWELRY!—The Head-Quarters for all Cash Buyers of fine and cheap Jewelry. Miniature Pins of all the Heroes. Persons wishing to see Samples, enclose stamp for full particulars. W. A. HAYWARD (Manufacturing Jewelry), 208 Broadway.

Another New Story now Ready
IN THE
New York Weekly,
(The best Story and Sketch Paper published)
ENTITLED,
The Defrauded Heiress;
OR,
The Stepmother's Plot
By JAMES REYNOLDS, Author of
"The Stolen Bride," "Long Hank," "Hermit of Ottawa," &c., &c.

In "The Stolen Bride," and "Long Hank," and "Hermit of the Ottawa," Mr. Reynolds gave evidence of great vigor and power, and stamped himself as a romancer of no mean reputation; but in giving to the world "The Defrauded Heiress," he has placed himself in the front rank of the great writers of the day.

It is a story of life in a great city, founded on fact, and in it are brought to view all the lights and shades of society. Most people have but an imperfect idea of the snares and pitfalls set to entrap the unwary, not only in low life among the hordes of the poor, but among the wealthy and powerful and apparently respectable.

The story in question chronicles the misfortunes of a young and beautiful girl, born and nurtured in the lap of luxury, who is the victim of the foul machinations of her own mother, who, in order to secure the property which the poor girl holds in her own right, does not scruple to connive at her irretrievable ruin. The manner in which the story is worked up proves conclusively that the author holds the key to the human heart, and that, having unlocked it, he can play upon it as upon an instrument. It has not a string which does not vibrate to his powerful touch. At one moment he fires us with indignation, as he relates some act of cold-blooded treachery and wrong, and at another our heart throbs wildly with the pleasurable excitement which the narration of heroic and generous deeds is sure to call up. The poor, but noble and virtuous seamstress, the wealthy but conscientious woman of the world, the hard-fisted mechanic, the reckless rover, the desperate gambler, and the true gentleman, all pass in review before the reader, portrayed with a power that never fails to engross the whole attention. From the first chapter to the last he is spell-bound, and when he reaches the end he lays down the paper with a sigh of regret that the story has ended so soon.

We think we may safely say that is the most powerfully-written romance which has been placed before the public for many years.

The Defrauded Heiress

☞ Do not fail to read the opening chapters.

The NEW YORK WEEKLY is sold by all respectable News Agents in the United States. The price is TEN CENTS, but in some cases, where Agents have to pay carriage or postage, a higher price is necessarily charged. When there is a News Agent in the town, we desire our friends to get the WEEKLY through him. We do not wish to mail the paper except to places where there is no other means of getting it. When sent by mail, the price will invariably be $2·5 a year, in advance. Subscriptions taken for three months. Two copies will be sent for a year for $3; four copies for $6; eight copies for $12. Postmasters and others who get up clubs of ten, and send us $25 at one time, will be entitled to an extra copy for their trouble. The bills of all solvent banks taken at par for subscriptions. Canada subscribers must send twenty-six cents extra with every subscription, to prepay the American postage.
STREET & SMITH, Editors and Proprietors,
31 Frankfort Street, N. Y.

DEVLIN & Co.

Having made an important and desirable change in our firm, we beg to inform our friends that our entire resources are now employed in an extensive and elegant ready-made Clothing for men and boys, great varieties of cloths, cassimeres, beavers, vestings, &c., to make to order. And also a complete assortment of all descriptions of Army and Navy Cloths, &c., to supply the largest orders.

The rates and terms in every department of our business shall be in keeping with the spirit of the times, viz.:

LOW PROFITS, PROMPT SALES, CASH.
DEVLIN & CO.,
Cors. of BROADWAY & WARREN and GRAND Streets.

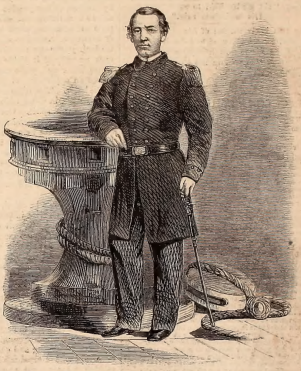
HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 251.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

COLONEL MULLIGAN.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]



LIEUTENANT RUSSELL, U.S.N., WHO BURNED THE "JUDITH" AT PENSACOLA.

THE REBEL EX-GOVERNOR JACKSON, OF MISSOURI, ADDRESSING COLONEL MULLIGAN'S TROOPS AFTER THE SURRENDER AT LEXINGTON.

SKETCHED BY O. R.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

DIED, ON THE BATTLE-FIELD.

FAR from his native home he died;
The clash of arms on every side,
The roar of cannon, and the tide
Of red blood flowing.

Around the dying and the dead
Lay on the field of battle, red
With carnage, while the sky o'erhead
Crimson was blushing.

Slowly the spark of life went out,
As rang the gallant shout,
Telling the foe were put to rout
By his brave comrades.

No gentle mother softly laid
On his hot brow her hand, or prayed
As his soul heavenward strayed—
Heavenward ascended.

But as the glorious field was won,
While rushed the conquering army on,
As blood-red sank the setting sun,
He peaceful lay, he perished.

Around his green and hallowed grave
Fond friends shall sadly mourn the brave,
Saying, "He gladly died to save
His land from ruin."

Over this lowly mound of his
All that he asked or wished for is Graved on his narrow headstone this—
"DIED FOR HIS COUNTRY!"

LYNN, MASSACHUSETTS, 1861.

COLONEL MULLIGAN.

We publish on page 657, from a photograph sent us from the West, a portrait of the brave COLONEL MULLIGAN, whose gallant defense of Lexington we chronicled last week. The following biography of Colonel Mulligan is interesting:

Colonel James A. Mulligan was born in the city of Utica, New York, in the year 1829, and is consequently in his thirty-second year. His parents were natives of Ireland, his mother, after the death of his father, which took place when he was a child, removed to Chicago, where she has resided with us for the past twenty-three years. She married a respectable Irish-American in Chicago named Michael Lanahan, who stands very much by with a fatherly solicitude the expanding mind of the brave young soldier. He was educated in the Catholic College of Saint Chrisostom under the superintendence of the Rev. Mr. Rinsellor, now of New York city. He is a strict member of the Roman Catholic Church. In 1852, 1853, and 1854 he read law in the office of the Hon. John A. Knuddl, Congressman from the Chicago District. For a short time he edited the Western Tribune, a semi-religious weekly newspaper in Chicago. In 1856 he was admitted an attorney-at-law in Chicago. At this time had the position of Secretary of Commissioners in the Chicago Shields Guards, one of the companies attached to the Irish Brigade now in Missouri, and which has done so well at Lexington.

In the winter of 1857 Senator Fitch, of Indiana, tendered him a clerkship in the Department of the Interior. He accepted the appointment, spent the winter at Washington. During his residence in Washington he corresponded with the Utica Telegraph over the nom de plume of "Shiloh." After his return from Washington he was elected Captain of the Shields Guards. On the news arriving of the bombardment of Fort Sumter he tarried not nor rested till the Union cause. The Irish-American companies held a meeting, of which he was Chairman. Shortly afterward he went to Washington with a letter, written by the late Senator Douglas on his death-bed, to the President, tendering a regiment to be called the "Irish Brigade." He was elected Colonel, and immediately went to work with a will. The course of the Brigade up to the battle of Lexington is well known; it has safely, bravely, and honorably done its duty.

Colonel Mulligan is worthy of all praise. A poorer, better man does not live in the State of Illinois. Since he was able to tell the difference between an ale and water a glass of nightcaps or malt liquor has not passed his lips. He is a rigid temperance man, although he is jovial and wholesouled to a fault. He is five feet three inches in height, with a wiry, elastic frame, a large, lustrous, hazel eye, an open, frank, Celtic face, stamped with courage, pluck, and independence, surmounted with a bushy profusion of hair, fashioned after the Burnside in all relations, respected by all, he has won his way by untiring industry and unquestionable economy. On the 19th of October, 1857, he was married to Miss Marian Nugent by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Chicago.

THE WAR IN MISSOURI.

We continue to devote a large section of our space to the operations of the war in Missouri. On page 664 we publish a large view of JEFFERSON CITY, the present head-quarters of General FREMONT, and on page 663 a plan of the same, showing the Missouri River. Jefferson City, on the Missouri River, is, as every one knows, the capital of the State of Missouri. When the rebellion first broke out in Missouri Jefferson City was peaceably occupied by General Lyon, and Governor Jackson was expelled. The Union troops proceeded to erect fortifications, as to protect the State Capital, and ever since then Jefferson City has been a place of great military activity. There must be at the present time over 40,000 Union troops in the place, and between it and Lexington; and a battle in the vicinity is hourly expected. Troops continue to arrive daily, both by rail and by steamer.

Another picture, on page 667, from a sketch by Alexander Simplot, represents the EMBARKATION AT ST. LOUIS OF SIGOURNEY REGIMENT, under COLONEL KELTON, FOR LEXINGTON. The peculiar build of the Mississippi steamers will be recognized by all who have sailed on the Father of Waters. Colonel Kelton, we need hardly add, arrived too late to save the brave Colonel Mulligan.

On page 667 we give a picture of a scene which took place at Lexington after the surrender. The rebel General Jackson ordered Mulligan's brigade to be drawn up in solid column to hear a speech from him. He then addressed them in harsh language, demanding what business they had to make war in the State of Missouri, adding that when Missouri needed troops from Illinois she would ask for them. After upbraiding them for some length of time, this wretched traitor at last told them they might go home, when they dispersed with feelings which can be more easily imagined than described. If Governor Jackson falls into the hands of any of the Illinois Volunteers he will have a hard time.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1861.

WAR AS A SCHOOLMASTER.

THE peace party has deafened us with commonplaces about the cost of war. No one denies that war brings great evils in its train, though there are still greater evils than they, and wise and good men often advise war and accept its mischiefs in order to escape the greater calamities of peace. Too little attention has, however, been paid, since the present conflict began, to the benefits of war in the abstract. Reflection will show that they are by no means insignificant.

Peace enervates and corrupts society; war strengthens and purifies. The chief danger against which all nations have been warned in this country has been the corruption pervading our society and our political institutions. Our aristocracy being exclusively mercantile, money has grown to be the sole idol worshiped by the bulk of our people; and those who worshiped it faithfully and successfully have been pardoned when they neglected every other object of reverence. Society accepts the fraudulent bankrupt; tolerates notorious cheats; winks at open rascality if it yields 20 per cent.; and where honor and profit are in conflict, never misses an opportunity of pronouncing in favor of the latter. This is the case to some extent in every nation, in direct ratio of the influence of the mercantile spirit. But nowhere has it been more intense and more general than that of European countries, because here the mercantile class is paramount, while there it is only one of many competitors for power. Everywhere else except the suffrage some votes are bought: it is only in a country where money is the sole exclusive idol that all offices are matters of bargain and sale.

If this evil can be cured, it must be done by raising up some rival influence to that of sheer dollars. Such a war will do. Nothing is so directly opposed to the mercantile spirit as the military spirit. The one calls into play the most sordid and the basest instincts of our nature: the other appeals to our noblest and purest impulses—courage, honor, patriotism, self-devotion, self-denial. In a mercantile point of view, it does not pay to be killed or wounded for one's country. Hence, therefore, soldiers are usually deem all traders knaves. The merchant's aim is profit, the soldier's, glory. The merchant's means are cunning and calculation, the soldier's daring and devotion. Each forms more opposite and antagonistic classes than soldiers and mercantile is ever hard to conceive. And the effect of the creation of a military class in our midst will necessarily have a counterbalance the mercantile influence now paramount, and to raise up honor as an idol in opposition to dollars. If the war achieves this result, it will not have been in vain.

The war will consolidate us as a nation. Nearly half a century has elapsed since the last appeal was made to the patriotism of the American people. Few persons have living who responded to that appeal. The present race of Americans have never known any thing practical of the common danger and common interest or the cost of national danger, and the patriotic sentiment has so nearly died out in them that men of intelligence and education are heard unblushingly to sneer at the idea of expending life for national existence. Half a century of undisputed peace and the pursuit of gain have rusted their hearts. The war will now develop the dormant principle of nationality. The bonds-men will revive to patriotism; the sordid will realize that private schemes can not thrive if the great public scheme fails. Men's hearts, from various motives, will expand largely in fact as in name, consolidated and homogeneous.

The war will prepare us for struggles, if any should come, with foreign nations. It is already evident that the British aristocracy can not submit to any ordinary sacrifice in order to have the rebellion succeed, in the hope that the catastrophe of American democracy might check the aspirations of the working-classes in Great Britain. No one can tell at what time this selfish oligarchy may delude England into a war with the United States. Nor can any one foresee the result of the complications which must grow out of the movements of Spain in St. Domingo, and of the maritime powers of Europe in Mexico. Before this war we were in no condition to contend with a power like Great Britain. When the war ends we shall be able to hold our own not only against England, but against any combination of foreign powers. We shall have a first-class army and a first-class navy, ample resources, and a thorough and complete military and naval organization.

But the chief advantage which the war will confer upon the country will be the diversion of at least a part of the national intellect and energy from the mere pursuit of gain, and the elevation of a substantial section of our people to nobler and higher aims. It can not but leave behind it a pretty general conviction that there really is something in this world better than dollars, and something worthier than the craft which is called smartness. Tis no mean boon that we

> "Wake to the higher aims
> Of a land that has but for a little her hurt of gold,
> And love of ease, and the mean and wrong and shameless,
> Horrible, hateful, monstrous, not to be told,
> And hurl once more in the heart of battle unroll'd
> Though many a light shall darken, and many shall weep
> For those that are crushed in the clash of jarring things,
> Yet Liberty yet does shall be dearer as a good than
> And many a darkness into the night shall leap,
> And shine in the noon-day of splendid noons,
> And noble thought be freer under the sun,
> And the heart of a people beat with one desire;
> For the long, long canker of peace is over and done!"

THE LOUNGER.

ENGLISH HATE.

No thoughtful American can affect to be indifferent to English criticism, because the English have necessarily a greater sympathy with us than any other nation in the world. But the malignity of hatred which the leading English papers evince toward us—a malice which we known to be the organs of eminent public men in England—reveals a condition of the English mind which few of us could have even dreamed. But it has been engaged in a bloody war for the purpose of territorial aggrandizement, or for commercial advantages; but it, for instance, goes to the other side of the globe to India, and, with the most unblushing military barbarism, virtually taken possession of an immense empire, without holding it by means which have made the names of Clive and Warren Hastings hardly eminent; or had it insisted upon thrusting a poisonous drug into China, and, upon its refusal to receive it a cause of war against a distant people who "only asked to be let alone," it would then be natural that a great civilized, constitutional, Christian power should ensure the crime and sentence the criminal to public infamy.

But why a friendly nation, engaged in suppressing a rebellion which strikes at the very existence of the nation; a rebellion whose success would be the most fatal blow to constitutional liberty; a rebellion undertaken, as its leaders expressly avow, not because the Government has done them any wrong, but for the reason that slavery is in danger if the Government is not overthrown; a rebellion which betrays as inevitable and dangerous as a war with England the full development of English people found in Charles the First—why a friendly nation, engaged in the repression of such a rebellion, should be constantly and recklessly maligned as we have been, and are, by the chief English organs of public opinion, is a question as difficult to solve as why Hoover was ever to have supposed that the haughtiest and most selfish power in the world could possibly forget that in our wrestling infancy our little finger was stronger than her loins.

The Laureate of England dreamed of "a federation of the world." Somebody, old enough to dreamer who was no laureate. If it could begin to come it could only be by the confidence and friendship of natural and political allies. Does it near that Millennium is, read the English papers and discover.

MR. SEWARD UPON SPECIAL CORRESPONDENTS.

WHEN the correspondent of the London Times came to this country last spring there was a good deal of foolish talk about the arrival of an ambassador of the great power of the day; the "public press." Of late there has not been so much said of the correspondent's capacity. The last fact in the career of the Doctor of Laws was, that he had been fined thirty or forty dollars for breaking the blockade by taking out of Charleston a lady. At an earlier period one of his letters was telegraphed all the way from Newfoundland by the "Associated Press" to the New York Herald, in which the Barrister at Law rapped several of them in a rousing way upon the knuckles. Then came the petition of some forty persons to the Secretary of State, calling attention to the letters and the letter-writer. Mr. Seward's reply was pointed and conclusive.

There is a word to be said about that letter of Mr. Seward's. Of course we all know, or ought to know, that the letters of the Doctor and Barrister are not the sources of information current in Europe and England of the condition of affairs in this country. They doubtless make European public opinion, and therefore seem tremendously important. That they are crude, prejudiced, untrue, and foolish, is evident enough; but that does not affect the matter. They are an authentic exposition of this person from the country would have been obviously impolitic. The Government fears to have the public think it does not. Therefore Doctor's cry, duly echoed through Europe. But the letter of the Secretary of State emphatically stigmatizes the act of a foreigner who perverts our hospitality to shelter himself in writing injurious publications against us for a foreign press."

To those in other lands who are still accessible to reason, who still believe that the Government of the United States is not recreant to constitutional liberty, and who do not reproach us with imbecility because we can not at once fire a gun from which the charge has been drawn, the letter of the Secretary will be literally a letter of credit in our power, our purpose, and our patience.

And if, in the patriotic spirit of that letter, the officers of the army, forbidding him their lines, would treat with silent contempt a man who sees only to slander—if all gentlemen who have the honor of their country at heart would make him feel that whoever sneers at the nation in peril can be no associate or guest of theirs—and if the newspapers, by common consent, would leave the libels in the London Times, for which they are written, the Doctor of Laws would find himself in an isolation compared with which the casemates of Fort Lafayette would be delightful.

A GLIMPSE OF ITALIAN LIFE.

THE revelations of the interior of Italian life of two or three centuries ago is an exposure of the most startling romance and tragedy. Copious and interesting accounts are found in Carlo Troldo's "Italian Women." The story of Beatrice Cenci is a melancholy glimpse enough. The traditions which Browning immortalizes in his poetry, and which give a lurid light to so many of his pictures, belong to the same department of literature and history; to which the latest contribution is a work by Philarète Chasles, Professor in the College of France, called "Virginie de Leyva, or the interior of an Italian nunnery in the beginning of the seventeenth century." It is simply a story of love and ghastly crime; but, like all such stories sincerely told, it is a marvelous picture of contemporary life. A tree is told by its fruit—a civilization by its incidents. No wonder that Trollope so bitterly sneers at "the good old times," of all times the most wretched and hopeless.

Virginia was the grand-daughter of a bold brigand of Navarre and handsome Free-Lance of Charles the Fifth, who, after a life of crime, had Pirates of Ascoli, and went to rest under a sumptuous monument in a church at Milan. Virginia was sent to the convent at Monza, to which every young nun was to be taught, and among the rest a young Isabella. Osio, a handsome youth, saw Isabella in the convent garden and made love to her by signs. But the saintly Virginia saw the offense and told the notary, who told Isabella's father, who took his daughter away and married her. The young man, page, stabbed the notary, and the magistrate feared to arrest him lest he too should be stabbed. He fled. Virginia, softened by the sweet young man's grief, and was sorry for what she had done. She used her influence, as seigniorial lady, with the magistrate, pardon for Osio was granted, and they fell in love. Virginia was then twenty years old.

The Confessor of the convent, Arrighone, was an unsuccessful lover of the lady, and one of the worst of men. Osio gave her a book from the Confessor's library, in which it was written that a layman might elect any saint as the call of his heart, but that the only sin was in the nun quitting her retreat. Arrighone pressed his suit insolently. He declared that he would "ruin the reputation of Osio;" and Virginia threw herself into Osio's arms.

A family was born, and Virginia's maid, Meda, was delivered of a daughter. It was the nun's business to expose her mistress. Virginia and two nuns tried to kill her. But Osio succeeded. Intercourse between the convent friends was kept up by correspondence, and Virginia's relations had Osio arrested, fearing some political consequences. A solemn conference was held up from the convent to the tale of intimacy between Osio and Virginia a vile scandal. Thereupon he was released, and a few hours after he returned to the convent and received. Virginia concerned her lover in her cell. But the cry of shame at Monza reached the Cardinal Borromeo, and he came to the convent in disguise. He had an interview with Virginia. She confessed every thing. The Cardinal was dumb, and so departed. But at night came a carriage with four mules to the door of the convent, and the Lady of Monza was carried to Milan.

The two nuns who had tried to murder Meda fled under Osio's protection. He had two servants with him. One of them hurled one of the nuns into a deep river. Then Osio stabbed him. A similar fate had the other nun. Osio threw her into a well, and then stabbed the other servant. But both women marvelously escaped and told the tale. Osio flew into the mountains of the spot of Lake Como and led a band of desperate outlaws. The Governor of Milan offered a reward for him, and for Osio's head. A friend sent up to his father, and there, while the servants held Osio, his friend murdered him exactly as he had murdered Meda. Seven days by his side was on the convent at Monza. Arrighone had three years in the galleys. Virginia was immured in a convent, and died in the very odor of sanctity, like so many of the Lot of Lake Como and led a band of desperate outlaws. The Governor of Milan offered a reward for him, and for Osio's head. A friend sent up to his father, and there, while the servants held Osio, his friend murdered him exactly as he had murdered Meda. Seven days by his side was on the convent at Monza. Arrighone had three years in the galleys. Virginia was immured in a convent, and died in the very odor of sanctity, like so many of the Lot of Borromeo; into the urn of whose colossal brazen statue you may climb if you choose when you go to his side-steeple.

This terrible text M. Chasles improves by reasoning that the conventual system was responsible for this character. But the difference, from which we take the facts, seems to be correct in denying this, on the ground that, as a rule, the inmates of the religious houses were not conscious of their own temptations, than the women of the surrounding hamlets.

But whatever the moral improvement that may be drawn from it, the story is a curious episode of Italian life. It belongs to the department of real history, which consists of the daily and hourly acts of the people, not of the marches and counter-marches of a few leaders. Thus it is in memoirs, diaries, letters, and local annals that we come to the truest knowledge of the state of the world at any period.

M. Chasles dedicates his work to Mr. Thackeray; not, we suppose, as a sly insinuation that Virginia typifies women as Thackeray believes them to be, but because of personal regard, and because M. Chasles is the French author of eminence most familiar with English literature.

THE WAR AND EMANCIPATION.

THERE is still confusion about the cardinal point of the relation of Slavery to the War. Lord Pal-merston's organ, the London Post, says: "If the theory of the Government is to be observed, Slavery has nothing whatever to do with the question." Of course that statement is "meant to mean" that emancipation is not the object of the war, which is strictly true. On the other hand, nothing is truer than that emancipation may become an incident of the war.

The suspension of the habeas corpus is not the object of the war, but it has legitimately become an incident of it. So with the arrest of talkers of treason and the suppression of treasonable papers. Emancipation may, in like manner, very easily become an incident of the war.

This may happen in two ways. In the first place, if the rebels are sorely pressed they may free the slaves to save themselves; because they know that the danger of servile insurrection is not among the rear ranks of slaves. In the second place, if the Government is sorely pressed it may make it the interest of four millions of people in the very heart of the rebellion to be on its side and against it.

Does any body deny the right of the Government to confiscate the property of the rebels? The slaves are either property or persons. If the Government may properly take the horse and the grain which he is carrying, why may it not with equal propriety take the animal which has nourished and raised the grain, and loaded and driven the horse? Why take one part of the property and leave the other? Is there any special sanctity of property in men that it is to be exempted from the liabilities of all other property? But if the slaves are persons, then they may be found to be treated as active aid to the rebellion that necessity will compel the Government to deprive the rebellion of their services. Why not? Why should the abolition party, as the enemy have said pretty distinctly, "Slavery is dangerous to the common peace; keep your slaves at home." The slaveholders reply, "Think slavery dangerous, do you, and you won't let us multiply and aggravate the danger?—very well, take that!" And forthwith, with its hands bound and theft and treason of every basest kind, they fall upon the justest and most equable Government in the world, and try to smother it in the blood of its citizens. And when those citizens, seeing more suddenly than they thought the danger of slavery, declare that they will parley with it only by killing the way the slaveholders cry out, "Take care; you'll hurt us if you do that!" In the name of the God of Justice, who is responsible for the consequences? For every drop of blood that might be shed—for every cry of outraged honor—the men who compelled the Government to defend itself at all hazards would be strictly accountable.

If the rebellion chooses to ask the single question, Which is the more precious, the Government of the United States or the system of Chattel Slavery? it must abide by the answer.

JOHN BULL AS A PRACTICAL MAN.

JOHN BULL is a practical man. He has no nonsense about him. He neither eats frogs nor wears wooden shoes, as Frenchmen do; nor dreads through his nose and wears long straps to his trowsers, as Yankees do; nor eats sauer-kraut and beer soup, as the Germans do; nor garlic, as the Spaniards do; nor oil, as the Italians do. John Bull despises all such, and eats roast beef and talks the English language, as all honest Christian people do. His church is the best church—his manners are the best manners—his ways of doing the best ways—his men the best men—his government the best government—and his tea-pot the best tea-pot in the world. Nobody else knows any thing. There are no soldiers, sailors, or statesmen but John Bull's; and the secret of his superiority is, that he is eminently practical and common sense; he has his eyes and ears open; he knows what he is about; he gets twenty shillings to every penny he spends; and he is so lofty if God has not fit to make him so much bigger and better than other people? He acknowledges the divine regard in the political measures by making his church establishment as respectable as any thing human can be. What more or better could heaven or earth desire of John Bull?

Every now and then—as the nasal Yankees say —John Bull illustrates his practical genius with peculiar splendor. Some fifty years ago Liverpool and thirty years ago, Sir John Blount, one of John Bull's gentlemen, persuaded John Bull's Chancellor of the Exchequer that the debt of England might be paid off by opening new branches of trade in the South seas. The subscription to the stock was opened, and Liverpool and Sir Johnson Blount circulated rumors that Gibraltar and Port Mahon would be exchanged for some places in Peru. John Bull, who has no romance about him, rushed to the books, and first subscription was more than two millions of pounds—ten millions of dollars. In a few days the stock leaped up—such an eminently practical person is John Bull—and sold for double the price on the first payment. Finally, by cheating, lying, and swearing—such an ideal business is John Bull—the stock was raised to a thousand pounds per cent.; and John Bull very wisely dropped into stock-jobbing. One morning it turned out that Sir John Blount was Sir Jeremy Diddler, and the eminently practical person was left sucking his thumb for comfort.

It is not many years ago, also—quite within the range of modern memories—that King Hudson chuckled under the chin our friend who always gets twenty shillings to the pound, and persuaded him to subscribe to railways. The fine old English gentleman replied to King Hudson, "But you're a snob, aren't you?" King Hudson responded by clinking golden guineas in his pocket. "Ah! in that case," rejoined the honest upholder of the Protestant succession, "your very humble servant." So from the chin King Hudson raised his hand to the nose, and led John, like other Bulls, by that member. And when he had cleared out the pockets of the gentleman who has his eyes and ears open, King Hudson, like Robert Macaire, disappeared.

A few years later, in testimony of his eminently practical genius, John Bull laid several hundred thousand pounds at the bottom of the sea in the shape of an Atlantic telegraph. But sagaciously thinking that investment in sea-water not sufficient, he built a big ship, that he might possess an adequate monument on the top of the ocean of his enterprise at the bottom. In the ship the full force of his practical genius broke into play. In a way in idea; big upon the stocks; much too big to launch safely; big in the stream; big in the mud; too big to navigate; big in its tragical total trip; big in its delays; big in its voyage across the ocean; big in the mistakes of management; big in its excitement; big in the hopes of water and comfort; big in its disappointment; frightfully big in its total failure and enormous expense. It is the last big thing of our eminently practical genius, John Bull.

Happy the man who has no nonsense about him! Happy the people who are led by such men, and of whom his cleverest reviewer, himself a most eminent John Bull, could truly paint this picture: "Taxes upon every article which can pass into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot; taxes upon every thing which it is pleasant to see, hear, smell, taste, or touch; upon warmth, light, and locomotion; taxes on every thing on earth and the waters under the earth—on every thing that comes from abroad or grows at home; taxes on the raw material; taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man; taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite and the drug that restores him to health—on the ermine which decorates the judge and the rope with which he hangs the criminal—on the man's right and the cloth man's spice—on the brass nails of the coffin and the ribbons of the bride—at bed or board, couchant or levant, we must pay. The school-boy whips his taxed top with a taxed whip and chases his taxed horse with a taxed bridle on a taxed road; and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine which he bought dear and paid for cheaper, has paid fifteen per cent., flings himself back upon his chintz bed which has paid twenty-two per cent., and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a license of a hundred pounds for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from two to ten per cent. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel; his virtues are handed down to posterity upon taxed marble, and his life then gathered to his fathers to be taxed no more."

It is wonderful that with this splendid result of his practical genius, John Bull should accidentally trample and toss all other nations, provided always that they are weak or that calamity has befallen them?

THE NATIONAL HYMNS.

MR. WHITE, who is the author of the National Hymn Committee, has written a note to the papers, which is interesting to all who sent poems to the Committee. The note is in reply to a printed circular titled "The National Hymns, how they were written, and how not written: edited by Richard Grant White." The object of Mr. White's note is to say "that no such book is to be published, either with the consent of the National Hymn Committee, or with either my knowledge or consent. Nor have I 'edited' any such collection of poems. I have written a little book entitled 'National Hymns, how they are written, and how they are not written; a key to the Mystery of Rudolph the Four Times,' which Messrs. Rudd & Carleton are to publish in a few days; and in two sections of this a few of the poems sent to the Committee are quoted by way of illustration; but none are presented as 'the best' or as 'the worst.' I should not trouble you with this note, but the misapprehension in question is in direct contrariety with assurances which I have given to some of the gentlemen who have permitted me to use their hymns."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

MRS. ROCHEFOUCAULD'S MAXIMS.

Women's feelings are more intense than those of men. We are happier and more miserable than they are.

A woman hates a question, but loves to ask one.

The female mind is to a proficient to be purely methodistical. Who would marry a woman who punctuated her love letters?

Spoil is blind to every thing—save pin-money.

In society compliments are loans, which the lenders expect to be returned with interest.

Praise a woman's taste, and you may attack her sense with impunity.

Your candid friend has never any thing pleasant to say to you. He reserves it for your enemies. Beware, therefore, you with it.

If you want to know a woman's true character, linger after the guests have gone, and listen to what she has to say to them then.

A woman wins an old man by listening to him, and a young man by talking to him.

Enjoy to-day, for to-morrow the first gray hair may appear.

Hymen is only Cupid in court papers.

Women confess little faults, that their candor may cover great ones.

There are no reasons which explain love; but a thousand which explain marriage.

Love is venerable in man—and would be in woman—if she ever became old.

When a woman vows that she never flirts—she is flirting.

MATERNAL ADVICE.—A daughter is almost always right when she omits vows to imitate her mother; but we do not think the mother is equally right, when, at a certain period of life, she tries still she can to imitate her daughter.

ONE TO THE DOOR.—When a Holloway omnibus "goes down," may not the mishap be described as a Holloway "Bust"

ARTHOLOGICAL INSECTS.—At one of the late Meetings of the British Association, a philosopher read a paper "On Economical Entomology." Amidst the valuable facts known on the habits of Spiders, of which insects a well-known variety is ascertained to make geometric nets in any convenient place between twigs or in palings. Are the geometrical nets of this order in absolute space constructed by any spiders which exist there, and are those spiders as big as the Scorpion in the Zodiac?

RATHER DOWN IN THE MOUTH.—We see that a cheap advertising Dentist offers to "stop teeth at a shilling apiece." The fee of children will scarcely go much lower. There is a class of purchasers to ravenous after cheapness that it is quite necessary to offer a tooth-drop for them instantly to avoid starvation of it. Let one of those peripatetic merchants, whose shop consists of a tray slung round his neck, offer a penny for a tooth or a penny, and they will eagerly snatch at it. The above remedy, however, is not to be recommended as a practically easy, that we should say that it must almost be "no feeling" at the place.

NON-INTERVENTION.—There is a talk of the Salt Lake joining the Confederates. We think the Mormon Capitol is wrong. Let it secede, if it will; but it is not for it to join either party. It should be true to its own name, and consistently insist on the right of tribes to punish, equally on both sides, an Utah or more.

A DANGEROUS PRACTICE.—The young gentleman who took an overdose of laudanum mistook it for a dose of rum at us. On the contrary, he says he never felt better in all his life. It is very curious, for decidedly the dose was strong enough for any six pot persons. Still, we should not advise any of our readers to repeat the dose, too often, or else his friends will be distressed one day by having to resort to some very cruel experiments for the purpose of bringing him round. The cure, in the case of all him, is often a trying and very distressing one. We have of course given the name of the Dose to an old Stock Exchange before he was completely cured.

DRAWING-ROOM BALLADS.

IMPROVISED BY A GENTLEMAN WITH A GOOD MEMORY.

"Pity me, O lady, for I feel,
Indeed, 'twere vain to tell.
I would not, if I could, conceal,
Oh! yes, yes, 'tis a spell.
Oh, holiday, poor Lucy Neal,
That kiss of thine is cold.

I'll not beguile thee from the town,
Thy looks those gems you prove;
I've heard it said that love is sun
All by the red sea wave;
The Wolf of Rome, the Wolf of Rome,
Dog Tray, Donnie the brave.

In this old chair my father sat,
He ne'er was in the wars;
The owl sits by the tree, the bat
In Bengal's sultry nights.
Sings tra, la, la, all round my hat,
My hand is cold as ice.

Oh, maid of Athens, ere we part
A bunting we will go;
Upon the hill you shall not smart
Are girls of Buffalo;
Take now thine hour, thy shine; the heart
Bow'd down:—Bow, brothers, row.

THE DEFENCE DEARMED.—The disease which generally carries off diseases is the fever called Consumption.

What musical bone should exclusively publish Encumbrance?—Bones.

The Lightest Fish Dinner possible.—A pair of Cork Soles.

Why so refugee foreign noblemen, who dispense with linen but can not do without cuffs and collars, should prefer a small weekly bill to a long one?—Because it's less to squeeze.

The Rod.—On his next visit to the metropolis, Mr. T. Sayers intends, we hear, to put up at Mawley's Hotel.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.—Rainbows are not made of watered silk.

COUNTRIES FOR WARM WEATHER.—Jones tried very hard to obtain early winds, but failed, in consequence of a contrary day. Why was that by Jones's deadliest enemy?—Because it was a Foe-Wind-Day.

HIBERNIAN CONUNDRUM.—Why is the Daily News like a black eye?—Because it is a mourning paper.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Why are two young ladies kissing each other on emblem of Christianity?

Because they are doing unto each other as they would men should do unto them.

Why is a man writing a play-bill like a water-fowl? Because he's a puffin (puffing).

When my fire is out—
It wants in need of my second!
My third shows the sun, and my very body's dress.
Tell-bored.
Why is a letter N like a pig?
Because it makes a sty needy.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

AFFAIRS IN MISSOURI.

LEXINGTON, Missouri, was surrounded by the rebels and additional Iowa Regiment reaches us to the effect that General Lane has left Fort Scott with 5,000 men. It appears that the rebels left Lexington on Monday afternoon, the intention of Price being, as it is supposed, to march on Independence where a part of the beleaguered force is stationed. Just as they left Lexington, General Sturgis appeared on the other side of the town and the rebels upon them, and the report came to them that General Sturgis with 40,000 men, were coming. Then, on receipt of this intelligence they changed his plan, and moved westward toward Independence. He is estimated to have had between 25,000 and 30,000 men. The national troops are mostly stationed at Osterville, Missouri, a point about 30 miles distance from Osterville to Sedalia being twelve miles, and from Sedalia to Georgetown, the latter place being about 30 miles, and Georgetown fifty miles northeast of Sedalia, has also a force of some strength. Osterville is the point at which the railroad from Sedalia to General Fremont and his army are between Jefferson City and Lexington.

AFFAIRS IN KENTUCKY.

General Buckner is reported to have passed through Bowlinsville, Kentucky, on Wednesday last, with 5,000 rebels, collecting stores on his route. The troops at Bowlinsville, Kentucky, are under the command of Colonel Jennison's notice to enter Kentucky. About 1000 rebels are reported to be at Hopkinsville, Kentucky, Christian County, on Monday. Four hundred Union men, in same County, had assembled to defend Bowlinsville. Reports were current that Buckner, with 20,000 men, would attack Bowlinsville, Henderson County, on Thursday. Zollicoffer was expected to be retreating toward Barbourseville.

NEW ORDERS OF THE DAY.

General McClellan has issued some important orders. Among others is one referring to the late depredations committed by the Union troops on the cottages of Fairfax County. These excesses he denounces as atrocious, and feels convinced that they have been the work of a few bad men, and that the officers and soldiers of the army generally will unite in the suppression of practices which disgrace the whole army. He orders that in future the penalty of death shall be enforced upon all parties convicted of such outrages. In another order General McClellan declares all the forts and works in the vicinity of Washington, to the number of thirty-two, by special names, by which they shall be known hereafter.

THE BATTERIES ON THE POTOMAC.

A gun-boat reconnaissance down the Potomac results in the report that the whole line of the river from Acquia to Matthias Point is occupied by rebel batteries, which completely command the river.

FIGHT IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

We have a report that Colonel Guthrie had a fight in Western Virginia, in which the Union troops, consisting of four companies of the 7th Ohio Regiment, and a detachment of the First Kentucky regiments, and one company of the Fifth Virginia, under Lieutenant-Colonel Enyart, surrounded and defeated the rebels at Chapmansville, killing and wounding many several prisoners. On endeavoring to escape the rebels were intercepted by Colonel Guthrie, who killed forty of them and took a large number prisoners.

THE LATE BATTLE IN MISSOURI.

The authorities at Washington received information on 4th inst. that General Reynolds had made a reconnaissance in force from his position at Cassel Run, Missouri, to the rebel force under General Lee, that he scattered them and drove them from the ground, with a very small loss on our side, but it was supposed with considerable damage to the enemy.

FATE OF THE MURDERERS.

The fate of the murderers generally condemned by General McClellan to hard labor at Tortugas has been generally commuted to imprisonment at the Big Rice. General Wool had them drawn up in line, and addressed them in a few terse sentences, telling of duty they had not been condemned. He stated that General McClellan would have had them executed, but would not do so on account of the enemy, but he had a merciful proposition to make to them. If they would show themselves to be heroes, all those who were willing might step forward three paces. Those who were not willing would be sent to Tortugas to complete their crime. The entire number, 190, it was stepped forward with shouts and some with tears of joy. They were then taken to the boats, and embarked into a New York regiment.

THE PIRATE "SUMTER."

The privateer steamer Sumter left Suisuna on the 8th ult., for Panama. Several Americans from Suisuna she met a vessel laden with coal, took 150 tons from her, and continued on her way. The Panthaus was in pursuit.

THE SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY.

The Southern papers continue their complaints against the shinplaster currency, and the Richmond Dispatch says if greenbacks are issued by the Government, they will oppose the circulation of such illegal issues the whole South will be flooded with them, as every individual who chooses will force his worthless due bills on the community.

REPORTED ATTACK UPON NEW ORLEANS.

A startling rumor was received from New Orleans by way of St. Louis—published in the Republican of the latter city. It stated that a fleet of 40 vessels was near New Orleans—the date of which, however, is not given—announcing the arrival of several thousand troops was coming up the Belize to capture the place.

THE CHEROKEES JOIN THE REBELS.

John Ross, the principal of the Cherokee Nation, has finally succumbed to rebel pressure. On the 20th of August, as we learn from the St. Louis papers, a Confederate treaty was signed by the Cherokees, who has recently arrived in Mr. Lorin Blair, Indian Agent for Council, and a message recommending a severance from the United States and an alliance with the Southern Confederacy. Mr. Council adopted the recommendation, and Commissioners were appointed to make a treaty of alliance with the Jeff Davis Government.

PERSONAL.

General Wool has gone to Washington for consultation with the Cabinet, and General Mansfield has taken his place at Fortress Monroe.

Gustavus W. Smith, formerly Superintendent of Streets in New York, has been appointed a Major-General in the rebel army. He has been appointed to command the army heretofore led by General Johnston, who succeeds to general command of both that and the column commanded by Beauregard. Smith is a graduate of West Point, and was in the same class with General McClellan. Colonel Van Dorn, of Texas, has also been appointed a Major-General in the rebel service.

Colonel Taylor, late Assistant Commissary-General, and last week appointed Commissary-General, in place of General Gibson, deceased. The appointment is in the regular line of promotion, and Colonel Taylor has shown by his ability and energy while Acting Commissary-General an eminent fitness for the office.

The Hon. Charles Sumner delivered a speech at the Republican Convention at Worcester, Massachusetts, 11th inst., the ground that the overthrow of Slavery will at once make an end of the war, and justified that policy by many historic examples.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE COTTON QUESTION.

MR. LAING, Financial Secretary of India, made a stirring appeal to the British manufacturers and capitalists to continue their exertions to obtain a supply of cotton independent of the Southern rebel States, declaring that the question was of a range of importance more than that of those requiring a merely commercial consideration.

THE ARMY TO VISIT "LITTLE RICHARD."

The Great Eastern reached Queenstown on the 17th inst., having sustained very great damage, during a terrific gale, which she encountered on the 9th. The storm overtook the leviathan when she was two days out, and during the whole of the remainder of the voyage the waves, twenty-five of the passengers sustained fractures of bones, and the rest and bruises inflicted or reported as "unmentionable." The paddle-wheels were carried away, and the ship made her way by means of a temporary rigged steering gear. The baggage of the passengers was reduced, according to the Cork Examiner, to "a change of rag and wood splinters left floating in water in the baggage hold.

FRANCE.

FRENCH OFFICERS INVITED TO SERVE IN INDIAN CAMPS.

It is reported that a number of French army officers, particularly of the artillery and the engineers, were anxious to enter the United States Army, and had requested to be permitted to serve during the war, which has been accorded; but on making application at the War Office in Paris, their request was refused by the Minister in the name of the Emperor, who had forbidden his officers from accepting commissions in the Federal army.

SPAIN.

AN EXPEDITION AGAINST MEXICO.

It is currently reported and believed that a Spanish expedition against Mexico is being organized in Cuba; and it is alleged that five thousand of the Queen's soldiers, supported by a strong naval force, will soon be landed at Vera Cruz and commence a direct march on the city of Mexico.

THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN THE SPANISH COLONIES.

The Queen of Spain has proclaimed in Porto Rico that whenever a slave touched the Spanish soil he was free, despite any claim of his former master or owner.

CANNONADING ON THE OUTPOSTS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—[SKETCHED BY A REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.]

AN ALABAMA REGIMENT MARCHING THROUGH CAPITOL SQUARE, RICHMOND, ON THEIR WAY TO JOIN THE REBEL FORCES UNDER BEAUREGARD

WAR MAP OF KENTUCKY.—[See Page 671.]

MISSOURI RIVER
Pacific R.R.
Fortifications
State House & Battery
MAIN DEPOT
Hospitals
ST. STREET
Headquarters of Gen Davis in command of this post
DEEP VALLEY
VALLEY & CREEK
Battery
Battery
Battery
Battery
PLAN OF JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI.
ALTON
ST LOUIS
BELLEVILLE
LEBANON
CARONDELET
MERAMEC
JEFFERSON WATERLOO
HARRISON
SULPHUR SPS
HILLSBORO
SULLIVAN
STE GENEVIEVE
MINERAL POINT
POTOSI
AVON
FARMINGTON
FREDERICKT
IRONTON
ARCADIA
LESTERVILLE
MONTAUR
STEELEVILLE
ROLLA
LITTLE PINE BLUFF
WAYNESVILLE
SPRINGFIELD
LEBANON
OAKLAND
CAVE SPRING
ELLSWORTH HOUSTON EMINENCE
LOCANSPORT
LOWN
GREENVILLE
DONIPHAN
BIG BLACK R.
POPLAR BLUFF
CHARLESTON
NEW MADRID
CLINTON
UNION CITY
HICKMAN
DRESDEN
PARIS
TROY
CAMDEN
HUNTINGDON
TRENTON
HUMBOLDT
LEXINGTON
JACKSON
BYERSS
GADSDEN
BEARMANS P.
RIPLEY
BROWNSVILLE
OSCEOLA
COVINGTON
RANDOLPH
BOLIVAR
PURDY
SOMERVILLE
MOSCOW CORINTH
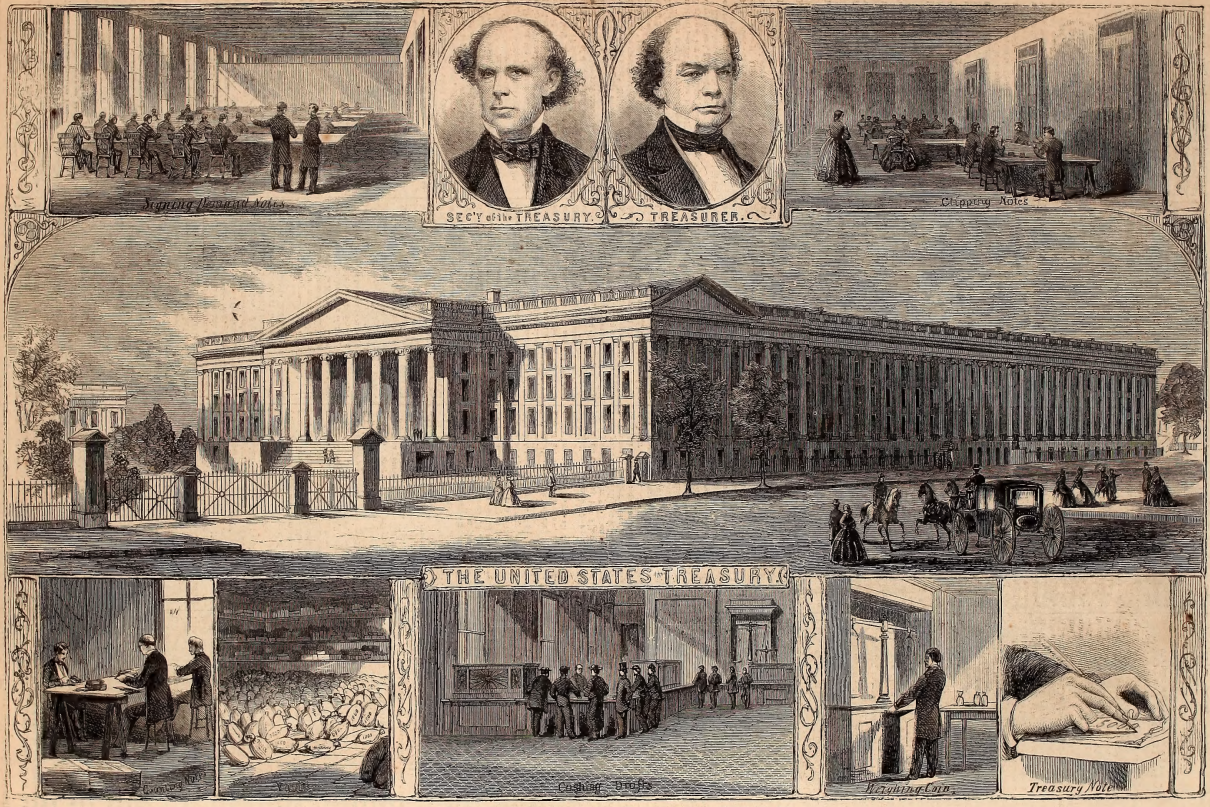
MEMPHIS
MARION
Wolf R.
Hatchie R.
Obion R.
Forked Deer R.
Big Hatchie R.
Tuscumbia R.
Tennessee R.
Mississippi R.
Ohio R.
Arkansas R.
White River
Black R.
Current R.
Gasconade R.
Osage R.
Pomme de Terre R.
Sac R.
Little Sac R.
Grand R.
Platte R.
Little Red R.
Big Piney R.
Big Creek
Big Piney
Big Prairie
Big Spring
Big Barren
Big Flat Creek
Big Creek
Big Indian
Big Creek
Big Creek
Big Creek

VIEW OF JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI, SHOWING THE NEW FORTIFICATIONS, AND THE ARRIVAL AND DEPARTURE OF TROOPS.—[SEE PAGE 658.]



THE UNITED STATES TREASURY—EXTERIOR AND INTERIOR.—[SEE PAGE 671.]

RED, WHITE, AND BLUE.

IT was the 15th of April, 1861—a day to be recorded—to be remembered; for on this day, across countless wires, flashed the startling intelligence, "SECRETARY OF THE FOR[illegible] AND GARRISON! 75,000 MILITIA CALLED FOR!"

Just back from Europe, in the midst of the rose colors of a lady's boudoir, and surrounded by the costly preparations for a party—laces and jewels and flowers—Edgar Mayne was reading this; Edgar Mayne—sound of heart as of limb—a young Hercules, ardent and impetuous, who for the last three years, at English clubs, and French salons, and Roman cafés, had raved and roared his patriotic belief in the Government of these United States with true American zeal. And now drums were beating and bushes blowing at its dissolution.

"75,000 men! Do you hear that, Caroline? I tell you before three months have elapsed we shall be occupied in fighting, and not flirting; so you might as well put up your lovers and fancies, and all this gauze folly," settling a strong hand down with a contemptuous crush on flowers, and flounces, and "folly."

"75,000! Do you realize it, Caroline?" looking with large brown eyes over the newspaper at the girl there, decking a gauze gown with slips of scarlet ribbons and beads of golden grain. She tossed her head at him with an air.

"Hall! Blonde and flowers—that's all the women of to-day are fit for! You girls! what do you care for your country, for liberty or tyranny, so that you can have your nineteen and sixty, and half smile at your own earnestness? and, gazing her, let the strong hand drop carelessly upon her loose silky hair, dropping a remark with it to softer his grievous disappointment; for Edgar Mayne was too well bred to be deliberately rude, even to his own sister.

Late in the day, as he sat by the fire absorbed in an evening journal, the mistress of the boudoir put her gem-like face between him and the news with a question:

"Will the state of the country allow you to accompany me to Mrs. Wolfe's to-night, Edgar?"

He glanced at her vivid cheek, and with a little grimace made answer,

"You are pretty, Carrie; but such a doll!"

Then he gave a shrug off, as young men like to do.

"Oh you women, you pretty women, Carrie!"

"To think men can not take you, sweet,
Unless you unfold you,
Ay and hold you,
And so keep you what they make you, sweet!"

Singing the German waltz, she went up the stairs. Three hours after she came down trilling the bars of a Rolowa, and enveloped in a white mist of down, blooming with half-blown roses—the last kalmia and beads of yellow grain nodding in her hair of loose black—her cloudy and soft bosom a fair heaving of purple rose and white, and violet eyes hiding darkly underneath darker brows and heavy fringes.

Through the mystic changes of the German waltz, and the sweet sliding cadences of the Redowa, there went weaving a solemn strain of dissonance. Into the pauses of the dance stole subtle langours—flowers faded, banners drooped, and the wind flung in through opened windows a quivering, shuddering sigh which every heart repeated.

"How stupid every thing seems! What is the matter?—does all the night?" asked Caroline Mayne of her companion, young Ryversant, in a disappointed, petulant tone.

He pushed a curtain aside, and they stood in the conservatory.

"What sin the night, Miss Caroline? We've had a shock—an electric shock—and we are a little stunned by it. We can't help thinking, when the horns and bugles are playing in there, of how they will sound a month hence, perhaps, when the bullets are whizzing round our heads."

"Do you really think it will come to that, Mr. Ryversant?"

"I think it is already here."

"Yes, I know there has been a call for troops; but I fancied there'd be a bluster, and then—"

"And then what, Miss Caroline?"

"Why, that both parties would keep on the defensive a while, but that it would finally be settled without bloodshed."

"It will be settled only with the shedding of the best and bravest blood in the country."

She mused. At length, speaking half absently: "I wonder will go?"

"I shall go, Miss Caroline."

"You!"—a little start of surprise, covered by a laugh of incredulity—then an exclamation, as she held out a hand with its sawny glove spotted and streaked with crimson stains.

"What is it, sir? I see; you have cut your hand on that vile Egyptian urn against which you leaned. I did once in this very spot;" and he took the hand contemptuously.

"No, no, it is nothing of the kind; it is only the red orchis that you gave me—I crushed it between my fingers."

There was a glow upon her cheek as fiery as the red orchis's stain, and a stormy gloom gathering in her eyes, while the blood stained palm was tossed and crushed by the fingers yet trembling from the effort.

"Bah! how it looks like blood!" she went on.

"Yes, take it off—do. I hope it isn't an omen."

"An omen?"

"Yes. For real bloodshed, and of what may follow if what you say comes true—of death, you know."

"Ah!" and a lifted look of lofty pain crossed his face. "The sin is great, but it shall be washed away in a nation's blood!"

The rapt expression was yet in his eyes as the little hand, soft and cold, lay uncovered in his own; and the absent air with which he kissed it could no woman with a heart and soul guessed. But the cool touch of the slight fingers brought him back—he was but a man, and a young and ardent one. Lingering over the fair, little hand, he said,

"I want a keepsake to take away with me when I go, Miss Caroline—a guerdon of empire. give me this little glove, with its mock blood-stains. It is a fitting token of the present—a symbol of the 'blood-red blossom of war.'"

She shuddered visibly. "Oh no, no, Mr. Ryversant, not that!"

The sudden passion of her manner, the gathering color, the kindling eyes! Up sprang the hope that for six months had been lying and dying in his heart. In a moment all the conventionalities had swept by.

"Do you will give me something! Oh, Caroline, give me yourself!" And the young fellow bent down his head, and hid his eyes against the little soft hand in the sudden moment of tenderness.

There came a stir—a lifted curtain drenched the moonlight in a flood of gas. A ripple of laughter, a rustle of silk, and the apartment held two other occupants. One, a woman, had quickly caught the spirit of the scene. And this woman? She hated Caroline Mayne, and had more sometimes from sheer antagonism of youth and beauty; and hating her, she knew her weak points. She knew that Caroline Mayne had the dramatic reputation of a Clara Vere de Vere—whether deserved or no she did not care to inquire. So, with one of those mischievous impulses which crept some souls, she dropped this small sneer at their feet.

"Oh! just in time to interrupt your rejection, Mr. Ryversant!"

And Caroline Mayne—what did she do? A splendid thing. One moment she hesitated, while the fiery flame of wounded delicacy rose in her cheek and kindled in her eyes. Then, quite calmly, though a little haughty of tone, and with an inscrutable depth in her glance, she made answer:

"You are just in time, Miss Wolfe, for congratulations, Miss Wyld. I am happy in owing allegiance to Mr. Ryversant." And over Mr. Ryversant's arm a little gloved hand was offered.

If ten minutes before he had thought Caroline Mayne the dearest and fairest of women, what did he think now, in view of this charming display of her proud and tender generosity? In view of it, his heart thrilling with its sudden rapture of acceptance, a new flood of love poured through him so deeply that eyes filled and cheeks flushed. "If I am ever tempted," he said unto himself "to judge this woman unjustly, the memory of this night shall soften all later memories."

Into the German waltz no longer wound the solemn strains of dissonance. The dance was accomplished in fitful melancholy, the flowers no longer drooped; Death's head had vanished from the feast, and the eternal flower of love bloomed in its place.

Riding home, Edgar Mayne asked his sister,

"What did Lou Wyld mean by your being a subject for congratulation? Has she not just been sent to her carriage, and said she had just congratulated you on your engagement. Some of her nonsense, I suppose."

"No, it was quite true;" and Caroline, as briefly as possible, related the circumstances of the last half hour. Brief as the narration was, it somehow perceived in these "circumstances" the peculiar nobility which had so touched the soul of Jerome Ryversant. He heard her, and seemed to see her face—touched the lovely falling hair, and the drooping kalmia, and the "gauze folly."

"Carrie, I didn't think it was in you."

"To love?"

"To be so brave. Carrie, do you know what you have done? By this one act you have bound Jerome Ryversant to you by a world of tender admiration which years of ordinary devotion would not have accomplished."

"You overrate it. I don't see."

"You little girl!" coming over, unchecked now by the clouds of "gauze folly," to sit beside her and put his arm about her. "You little girl! how do you did it for him. I see, and so did he, that your soul rose to meet the occasion because you were assailed in your pride and tenderness for him. It wasn't an easy thing to do, Carrie. I can fancy the color mounting, and the storm in your eyes; but it was easier than to let the shadow of a momentary mortification or pain rest upon your lover. No, I didn't think it was in you, Carrie. I give you my congratulations" lending forward and touching his lips to hers.

"She is really quite splendid!" he thought. "I am glad I know her better."

Did he know her better? Did she know herself better? Let us see.

Three days followed of congratulation, of happiness. The pretty boudoir was odorous with the rarest flowers that a lover could find, and redolent with the fair presence of his betrothed. Only the wary hour he thought—this young lover—"She is the noblest woman in the world!"

Outside this room the world, and beauty, and happiness the three days were set to sadder music while the 75,000 loyal souls were rapidly gathering under the Stars and Stripes. Jerome Ryversant sent forget that he had promised himself to his country in this newer and nearer promise. In the late fetters of his mouth, and the flashing fire in his glance to his native land? He was only waiting. At the close of the three days there would be time enough for parting words. So the three days went in a trance of happiness. He saw the sun set upon the last with a sigh that was the echo of a farewell; and with the night upon his lips he sought her presence. She was standing by the window, the warm mellow light bathing her beauty in a celestial bloom. The last three days were to him as he liked it best—the lovely figure wearing the colors he approved—and on her breast and in her hair the very flowers he had given her in the morning. The pang of parting struck deeper. She came forward in her pretty, stately way, her head drooped to him, her proud lips melting into a smile, and a conscious color rising.

"What is the matter? Has any body hurt you? as we say to little Nell," she asked him. He never answered; but the glance he dropped down upon her, yearning and mournful, the touch of his hand, lingering and tender, like a benediction upon her head, while a sigh tore up from his heart like a sob—all this was more eloquent than words, and in-affright she put her question a second time with affectionate alarm.

"What is the matter, dear? What has happened?"

He drew her nearer, bending down his gaze to meet hers.

"I was thinking of what is to happen, dearest—and the future seems to me as if it seems hateful to me, though I have the heart I sought for a 'guerdon of empire.'"

She looked puzzled, shook her head, and said, questioningly, "I don't understand."

He watched her a moment as she leaned against his arm—soft tints of rose, and violet darks—all a flower made to wear in one's bosom, to

"Sing and say for,
Watch and pray for."

And as he watched a fear shot into his heart—she didn't understand! Then he said, softly, drawing her closer still, to ease the ache,

"My regiment you know, it leaves soon."

"Well?"

"Would she understand?"

He waited a second—her face was out of sight—he was holding it to his breast; and she was quite still. Presently he spoke,

"I go with it as—"

"You!" The utter coldness of the tone, the ringing remoteness, as she ejaculated this one word, sounded like an accusation—like an accusation, pale and fierce, rose the clear-cut face, and she looked at him. He met the gaze tenderly, but sorrowfully. She waited for him to speak.

"You have forgotten, dear," he said at length, "that"—he paused a moment, hushing his heart at the moment—"that"—"you have forgotten that I told you four nights ago that I was going."

"Then!—but now—all is changed since then. Is life no dearer to you now than it was to you before that yourself?" The clear-cut face gathered color, and the eyes began to fill with hot tears.

"Caroline!" the deep voice grew tender, the natural tones, with a firm gaze: he answered steadily, "I love it to my country!"

She laughed a little scorn, then said, derisively, "To your country!" Wait till you are needed more imperatively; thousands are ready to go, are going; thousands will go for you. Why should you rush thus hastily forward? It is a madness; a piece of folly: you are excited with the occasion. Because others go, you go; and you call it patriotism, courage. It is neither; you are a coward, because you dare not stay behind. And none less than you love your own glory better than you love me!"

Conflicting passions reflected themselves in the face of her companion. Tenderness, pain, a man's honor shone there: all three dictated his reply:

"Caroline, you do not know what you say, or you would never say it. I love you, because I honor you and admire you above all other women. I love you as the noblest, the beautiful and true; for you are to me the representative of every thing beautiful and true; and so to love you is to love my home and my land. How then could I do less?"

The passionate tears she shed, the wild words of denial she uttered, were not all passion and wilfulness. It was love, and grief; and out of an aching heart sprung all this fierce protestation. From the soul's most sacred recesses of tenderness came the hot tide of agony that translated itself in haunt and reproaches. If there was something of vile was apparent to her listener; for through the harshest taunt, the cruelest reproach, he possessed himself. Perhaps he even understood—he even possessed himself—remembrance of that night, four days agone, when the world was transfigured for him, and when on the altar of his heart he made a vow to let all jealousy and fear of that hour. They softened now into clear, concise answers, perfectly manly, and perfectly tender; and they failed to convince or soften. To all this forbearance she returned only sharp reproach or bitter scorn, and lastly drew herself up with a proud, cold dignity, dropped into his hand, from whence it fell untaken to the floor, gave him her stateliest courtesy for a "good-by," and swept from the room, and out of sight! With the shock, the young fellow stood a moment gazing vacantly before him, murmuring, incoherently, "And this for the first day—for the end!"

It was thus Edgar Mayne found him. He went up to him asking the same question his sister had put a few minutes before under such different circumstances, "What is the matter?" but in that instant his eye caught the gleam of the diamond flash, and his quick glance fell upon the glove on the carpet. "Ah!" and he looked sadly into the face before him, as he lifted it—"A lover's quarrel." A dull blow for the young officer to bear, however. He would ask no questions; but all questions were anticipated, were answered in a few brief words.

Edgar Mayne was indignant.

"The girl is crazy!" he ejaculated, and was rushing to the door in search of her, to bring her down before them, in his impulse, when the calmer reason of Jerome Ryversant stayed him. But after, he was glad that his friend had gone straight, with tears in his eyes, and haunted by his suffering face, he sought her. He was not prepared for the pale look of open defiance that met him, and gently entered; but his errand was enough to rouse her, and something of the old scorn returned to her.

"Have you any thing to say, Edgar, impatiently, to her persistent accusations, "that he had pledged not only his word, but his heart and soul, for this cause in the very outset?"

"That was before!—that was before!" she exclaimed, with quick significance; "and after, when hundreds are pressing forward, and many rejected, why should he leave me, and so soon? No, do not argue with me—I am only secondary. I thought his finer than other men, but I was mistaken; it is their own glory first—then a woman's love. If I never marry I will not take a man who makes me second in his heart. I must reign there, the first consideration; his first honor and glory, the shall reign in mine."

"But—" He stopped, wise enough to see that only time could open her eyes to her error—time and remorse; that his words were wasted; and worse than that, adding still more to her determination.

As abruptly as he had entered he left her presence, left her to the sharp, burning pain, the consuming agony, that devastates such proud, concentrative natures.

Thus days went on in this wild inward war which gave no outward sign. In the time she asked no questions, she made no allusion to the past; but secretly and alone she devoured every remnant of information that the newspapers offered. She, who hated politics and newspapers!

One day, in a long list of names, she read one that sent every vestige of color from her cheek—Jerome Ryversant! If she had had any hope of his relenting, it was over now; but even here she gave no sign—she was still in outward calm.

Three days more and he would be gone. Gone! it was a bitter word.

The night of the third day came dreamily to many a heart—to none more drearily than to her, sitting apart and alone in a rose-hued boudoir. The stately scent of the flowers filled the room—his flowers. The curtain were undrawn; the chairs and couches still strewn with the trifles that had occupied them on days agone. All as he had left it. In this sepulchre the proud heart strug-gled on.

For these last three days her brother had caught no glimpse of her. But on the last night, somewhere between the hours of twelve and one, a little knock came outside his door, and her voice called him. He was dressing for writing, and somewhat startled, bade her come in. The face that greeted him startled still more. Its rose-bloom was gone—its beauty was fled. Where to have looked for touching was the sight that his eyes filled, and he received her with more kindliness than he had evinced for that first day of her grief. He bid her be seated.

She hesitated a moment, then told her errand. She would see Jerome Ryversant once more before he sailed, as a friend—a friend and no more! There was no time to lose, for at dawn they might leave left the city; but let him understand her! She must see him—must be with him as he took his knowledge that—it was no reunion, but she would see him once again!

Edgar Mayne considered unpardonable obstinacy. Edgar Mayne was again indignant; but another look at the pale, worn face, and he consented to unbend from his sternness.

To Jerome Ryversant he communicated the letter and spirit of her words. For a moment his eyes kindled, and his face was warm with sympathy. Then she memory of another night came up. He remembered her, proud and tender and brave for love's sake to sacrifice, and his face was cold, and he mitted his readiness to go to her.

The lights were all down but one in the "rose-Edgar Mayne looked through the purple glass, sent forth over the room a mystical radiance. Into this room Edgar Mayne conducted young Ryversant, and then left them alone.

As the two looked at each other after the door closed upon them, they realized, perhaps, something of the change suffering had brought. But to her it had wrought much more of change in these three days than the whole time had wrought in him. He was elated by the sublime knowledge of sacrifice, of patriotism, of right; plunged, too, into the midst of unparalleled excitements.

She, nursing an insane sense of wrong, born of her childish devotion as a woman—of her ignorance; alone, too, in the inaction of domestic life, had hung out the pale colors of distress. Seeing her, the lover's heart bled, and he loved him, and bled to the right. Seeing him, with a flush upon his cheek, uniformed and eager, she still less believed in love.

So her voice came coldly:

"I sent for you," she said, slowly, and with pained effort. "We parted angrily, which we must not wise well for what may be a final parting. In my view of your undertaking I yet hold the same opinion. I am as fearless as I was then, should."

He came forward and took her hands. Once more he pleaded with her. She heard him sadly, not angrily, but with unbelieving. He leaned down upon the fair little hands he held, but his ring had never been repulsed. She was fearfully in earnest then—she was only a beautiful cruelty.

So, bending down, he dropped a kiss upon the two hands; and lifting his head, with a "God bless you, Caroline," he spoke about the pale, ghastly pallor of her face, the faint drooping of her figure, stayed him. She had no strength, nor any will to resist. He drew her to him, and kissed her passionately—one of those little silken emblems—a cockade of red, white, and blue. Last night it glistened on the breast of Jerome Ryversant. Almost at the very instant a boy's young voice ascended, lark-like, singing:

"With her flag proudly floating before her,
The boast of the red, white, and blue!"

Following this wound the notes of a bugle; then the long-rolling call of a drum; and the city was astir with the warlike preparations.

How that morning went she never knew, and other mornings came floating her saddened but alert, with a serious watchfulness. A week after, when her brother announced his own determination to join in the struggle, she did not gainsay it.

LEBANON JUNCTION, 29 MILES FROM LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, ON THE LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE RAILROAD, PRESENT HEAD QUARTERS OF GENERAL SHERMAN'S BRIGADE OF UNION TROOPS.—SKETCHED BY HENRY MOSLER.—[SEE PAGE 671.]

On her table now, in place of romances, newspapers and books pertaining to the various struggles for liberty in other countries, and all manner of patriotic addresses that had gone forth from this, found place. She was learning a new lesson. It filled her soul with sorrow and perplexity, but it elevated and enlarged it.

So the days lengthened into weeks.

There came at last a day that will never be forgotten. In one portion of the land church bells were ringing and organ strains ascending on the summer air. In another,

"All into the valley of Death Rode the six hundred."

Sitting in church that morning, through the solemn sweetness of the chants Caroline Mayne was haunted by one sentence—"I owe it to my country!" The organ strains sounded to her like the dirge of hope, and the hymn had notes of wailing in it. "I owe it to my country!" That noble life! Was he even then, perhaps, giving it up? She drooped her flushed face, lifting her handkerchief as a shield, when lo! there dropped from out its folds the little silken token he had left behind—red, white, and blue! At such times, to imaginative persons, such simple occurrences come like omens. As such it came to her; and there, in the summer warmth, she grew chill with her emotions.

When, shortly afterward, the awful news came of that vain struggle she felt that her soul had been warned. Then followed the uncertainty of life or death for the beloved. In silence and alone she waited.

One day the bells rang, the cannon roared, and shouts of welcome rent the air. At a sheltered window a fair figure stoled in white watched the returning heroes. Her watch is rewarded: but she can scarcely see for tears as a proud head lifts itself above the others to her vision; and in close company her brother—Edgar Mayne—both safe and before her!

When a bouquet, small and delicate, fell at Jerome Ryversant's feet, he did not doubt its source nor its meaning as he looked at it. A bunch of scarlet kalmias, and red orchis, and heads of golden grain surrounding one rose—a white rose, the heart's gift—and girding it all a circle of laurel. Thus she spoke to him from her sheltered window. Thus she made her confessions.

Later, when he held her to his heart, with the same noble simplicity which had so endeared her at first, she briefly said,

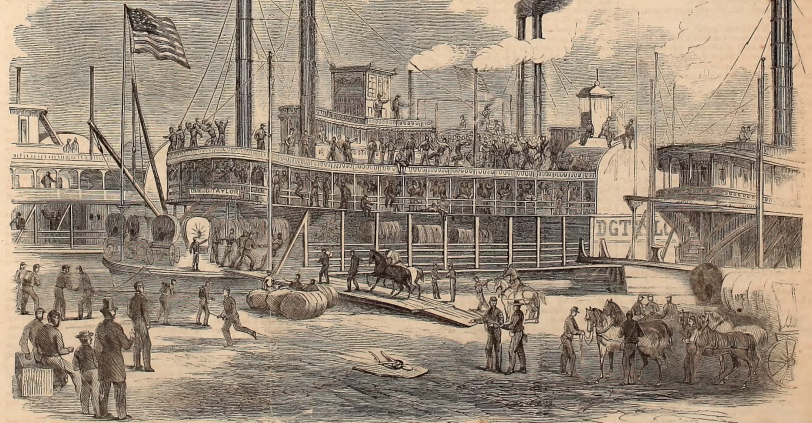
"I was wrong, and you were right; but I sinned through ignorance. Life has wider meanings to me now. This war has been my education."

How truly she said he began to realize as he saw with what clear perceptions she put mere personal ends away and flung her sympathies into the common cause.

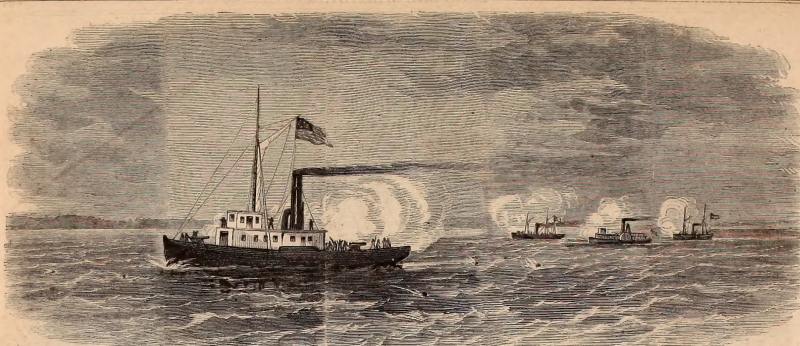
He realized it more fully when, a month later, sitting in the "rose-Eden," he put his future in her hands. Should he stay or go? A little lower dropped the head, a little colder grew the clasping hand, a little broken came the sweetest voice, as she answered:

"If three months ago the country needed the services of brave men, we know it needs them now. As you would give up for its cause what is dearer than your own life, I give what is dearer than mine."

While we await the result of this war to our country let us hope that its lessons have been thus nobly received, and that from the claims of pleasure, the fetters of fashion, other women may be able to renounce mere personal ends, and give up with such spiritual insight of love what is dearer than their own lives—what is dearer than any life—a country's salvation. And when they drape their rooms with banners and silken symbols, let them think of the meaning of this—"Red, White, and Blue."



EMBARKATION OF THE NINTH MISSOURI REGIMENT, COLONEL KELTON, AT ST. LOUIS, FOR LEXINGTON.—SKETCHED BY ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 658.]



CAPTURE OF THE UNITED STATES GUN-BOAT "FANNY," AT CHICKAMACOMICO, NORTH CAROLINA, BY THREE REBEL TUG-BOATS.

THE HOLOCAUST.

WITHIN our country's sacred fane
Low burns the altar's flickering light,
Trembling we watch it slowly wane—
That lost, what star shall guide our night?

Then gather round that holy flame,
And bring your choicest offerings here;
What dearest victims can ye name
For such a sacrifice too dear?

Pour forth your blood, pile up your gold—
'Tis well, but more than these we need;
No nation's life is bought and sold,
Nor saved alone by valorous deed.

Then here your cherished vices bring,
Your luxury's degrading ease,
The reckless pride with which ye cling
To wealth's most abject vanities;

Your worship of successful fraud,
Your want of faith in nobler aims,
Your blind self-seeking, and the broad
Ignoring of all loftier claims;

Your partisanship, which beguiles
To faction's aid its clamorous tools,
Your apathy, which feebly smiles
When power is gained by knaves and fools.

Come, offer in our solemn rite
Each sordid vice and low desire;
Rise up in manhood's simple might,
And naught shall quench our altar's fire.

L.

THE CAPTURE OF THE TRANSPORT "FANNY."

WE learn from Fortress Monroe of the capture of the Union gun-boat Fanny. She had on board twenty-five of the Indiana zouaves, including the Quarter-master and Sutler, all of whom were taken prisoners. The captain and a portion of the crew of the Fanny escaped. The capture was effected by three rebel tug-boats, which put out from Roanoke Island.

The master of the Fanny says:

"I left in the steamer Fanny at 6 o'clock A.M. [Oct. 1] for Chickamacomico, or Leggerhead Inlet, arriving there at 1 o'clock P.M. We anchored in about eight feet of water, and waited three 2½ hours before we got communication from shore. They then fetched a flat-boat off and loaded her with an assorted cargo, stores, tents, etc. When the boat had shoved off and got about two-thirds of the way on shore we saw a steamboat to westward about 4 o'clock P.M., which proved to be one of the enemy. She was standing to cut off our retreat, and in a short time two more appeared steering directly for us. The first one then stood in and commenced firing upon us, and as soon as the other two came up they did the same. We returned the fire with nine shots, striking one of the boats in the bow. Then Captain Hart of the Twentieth Indiana regiment, suggested that we should surrender, saying that it was no use fighting against such odds, and requested me to hoist the white flag. The mate of the boat and a few soldiers turned to and threw overboard some thirty cases of ammunition, and Captain Hart forbid them to throw any more overboard. He likewise requested the Sergeant to desist, which he refused to do, saying it would be worse for them if they were taken prisoners.

"Captain Hart then suggested that the chain be slipped and the boat run ashore, which was done. The white flag was then hoisted, and the crew of the boat left in their boats. We endeavored to get boats to carry the soldiers off the Fanny, but could not do so.

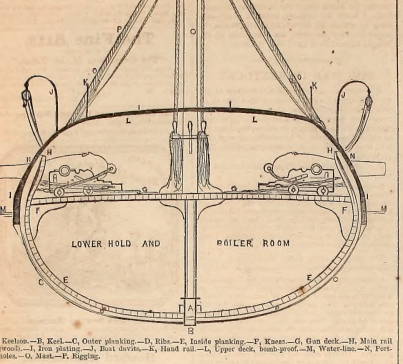
"To the best of my opinion they had plenty of time, from our arrival to that of the enemy's boats, to have got every thing on shore from the Fanny, if sufficient boats had been employed in the transportation of the stores, so that we could have destroyed the Fanny before she should have fallen into the hands of the rebels.

"We left there about 6 P.M., and arrived here about 7 A.M. on the 2d instant.

"W. H. MORRISON."

ARRIVAL OF THE FORTY-NINTH OHIO REGIMENT AT LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.—DRAWN BY HENRY MOSLER.—[SEE PAGE 671.]

THE IRONCLAD WAR-STEAMER NOW BUILDING AT MYSTIC, CONNECTICUT.—SECURED FROM THE ORIGINAL DRAWINGS BY R. S. OSGOOD.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]



A, Keelson.—B, Keel.—C, Outer planking.—D, Ribs.—F, Inside planking.—F, Knees.—G, Gun deck.—H, Main rail (wood).—I, Iron plating.—J, Boat davits.—K, Hand rail.—L, Upper deck, bomb-proof.—M, Water-line.—N, Portholes.—O, Mast.—P, Rigging.

MIDSHIP SECTION OF THE IRON-CLAD SHIP.

THE NEW IRON-CLAD GUN-BOAT.

We publish on page 669 a picture of THE NEW IRON-CLAD GUN-BOAT, which is now being constructed at Mystic, Connecticut, by C. H. Bushnell, of NEW HAVEN. The following accurate description is from the Herald:

This vessel, the first one built in this country, will be about one thousand tons register. Her dimensions are as follows: Length over all, two hundred feet; extreme breadth, thirty-six feet six inches; depth of hold, twelve feet eight inches; draught of water, about eleven feet.

The keel is of white oak, sided fourteen inches, in depth fourteen inches. Garboard strakes six inches in thickness; bottom plank four inches thick; wales four and a half inches in thickness. The bottom plank is fastened with three locust tree-nails and one composition spike in each strake.

The engine and boiler keelsons will be of white oak and yellow pine, and of such dimensions as will be deemed proper by the engineer department.

The frame of the vessel will be entirely solid. Ordinarily large spaces are left between the ribs and timbers of vessels, but here they will be made solid with "filling." Some idea can be formed of the thickness of the vessel when we say that it is twenty inches from the outside to the inside before the iron plating is put upon her.

The beams are of yellow pine, twelve by nine and a half inches, and the deck plank will be of the same material, four inches in thickness.

The cabins, ward-room, and steerage will be fitted up similar to those in the new gun-boats just launched. She has one flush deck, which is the fighting deck. Forward and aft will be half decks for officers, etc., but the engineer and boiler-rs will of course occupy the midship portion of it. The fighting deck, as well as the two half decks, are of wood, till the upper deck is only the upper part of the bomb-proof which covers the gunners. There will be no houses or guns on this deck, and it will be only used for a promenade and to work the ship while under canvas. The companion-ways will give access to the deck from below. A series of iron stanchions are placed around this deck, on which are placed a wire netting to prevent persons from falling overboard.

She will be brig-rigged forward and schooner-rigged aft, so that she will in rig be a harmaphrodite brig. Those spars will be light, as she will depend principally on her steaming powers. She will have a small bowsprit, made of iron, but it will not project outside of the vessel more than four feet.

She will carry four boats at her davits, which hoist sufficiently high to be out of the way of the guns.

All the standing rigging will be of wire rope, which is less liable to be cut by fragments of shell.

The steersman will be located below decks, and a lookout forward will signal to him while at the after wheel, and when he is at the forward wheel he can see for himself.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

A STRANGE STORY.

By SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE conversation with Mrs. Poyntz left my mind restless and disquieted. I had no doubt, indeed, of Lilian's truths but could I be sure that the attentions of a young man with advantages of fortune so brilliant would not dazzle her thoughts the contrast of the humbler lot and the duller walk of life in which she had accepted as sojourning a man removed from her by a mantle youth less by disparity of years than by gravity of pursuits? And would my suit now be as welcomed as it had been by a mother even so unworldly as Mrs. Ashleigh? It perplexed me, too, that neither mother nor daughter should have given me no cause in their letters to suspect that I had a rival in this favorite of fortune. Lilian's letters, it is true, touched but little on any of the persons round her—they were filled with the outpourings of an ingenuous heart, colored by the glow of a golden fancy. They were written as if in the wide world we two stood apart, alone, consecrated from the crowd by the love that, in linking us together, hallowed each to each. But Mrs. Ashleigh's letters had been more general and diffusive, detailed the habits of the household, sketched the guests, intimated continued fear of Lady Haughton, but had said nothing more of Mr. Ashleigh Sumner than I had repeated to Mrs. Poyntz. However, in my letter to Lilian I related the intelligence that had reached me, and impatiently I awaited her reply.

Three days after the interview with Mrs. Poyntz, and two days before the long-anticipated event of the mayor's ball, I was summoned to attend a nobleman who had lately been added to my list of patients, and whose residence was about twelve miles from L——. The nearest way was through Sir Philip Derval's park. I went on horseback, and proposed to stop on the way to inquire after the steward, whom I had seen but once since his fit, and that was two days after it, when he called himself at my house to thank me for my attendance, and declared that he was quite recovered; fearful, no doubt, that I might otherwise want to make a long bill out of him.

As I rode somewhat fast through Sir P. Derval's park, I came, however, upon the steward, just in front of the house. I reined up my horse and accosted him. He looked very cheerful.

"Sir," said Io, in a whisper, "I have heard from Sir Philip; his letter is dated since—since—my good woman told you what I saw; well, since then. So that it must have been all a delusion of mine, as you told her. And yet, well—we will not talk of it, doctor. But I hope you have kept the secret. Sir Philip would not like to hear of it if he comes back."

"Your secret is quite safe with me. But is Sir Philip likely to come back?"

"I hope so, doctor. His letter is dated Paris, and that's more than he has been for many years; and—but bless me—some one coming out of the house? a young gentleman! Who can it be?"

I looked, and to my surprise I saw Margrave descending the stately stairs that led from the front door. The steward turned toward him, and I mechanically followed, for I was curious to know what brought Margrave to the house of his quondam host.

It was easily explained. Mr. Margrave had heard at L—— much of the pictures and internal decorations of the mansion. He had by dint of coaxing (he said, with his enchanting laugh) persuaded the old housekeeper to show him the rooms.

"It is against Sir Philip's positive orders to show the house to any stranger, Sir; and the housekeeper has done very wrong," said the steward.

"Pray don't scold her. I dare say Sir Philip would not have refused me permission he might not give to every idle sight-seer. Fellow-travelers have a freemasonry with each other; and I have been much in the same far countries as himself. I heard of him there, and could tell you more about him, I dare say, than you know yourself."

"You, Sir! pray do then."

"The next time I come," said Margrave, gayly; and with a nod to me he glided off through the trees of the neighboring grove, along the winding foot-path that led to the lodge.

"A very cool gentleman," muttered the steward; "but what a pleasant way with him! You seem to know him, doctor. Who is he—may I ask?"

"Mr. Margrave. A visitor at L——, and he has been a great traveler, as he says; perhaps he met Sir Philip abroad."

"I must go and hear what he said to Mrs. Gates; excuse me, Sir, but I am so anxious about Sir Philip."

"If it be not too great a favor, may I be allowed the same privilege granted to Mr. Margrave? To judge by the outside of the house, the inside must be worth seeing; still, if it be against Sir Philip's positive orders—"

"His orders were not to let the Court become a show-house—to admit none without my consent; and I should be ungrateful indeed, doctor, if I refused that consent to you."

I tied my horse to the rusty gate of the terrace-walk, and followed the steward up the broad stairs of the terrace. The great doors were unlocked. We entered a lofty hall with a domed ceiling; at the back the grand staircase ascended by a double flight. The design was undoubtedly Vanbrugh's, an architect who, beyond all others, sought the effect of grandeur less in space than in proportion. But Vanbrugh's designs need the relief of ornament and movement, and the forms of a more pompous generation, in the bravery of velvets and laces, glancing amidst those gilded columns, or descending with stately tread those broad palatial stairs. His halls and chambers are so made for festival that they become inefficient desolate and gloomy amidst solitude and decay.

The housekeeper had now appeared—a quiet, timid old woman. I soon excused herself for admitting Margrave, not very intelligibly. It was plain to see that she had, in truth, been unable to resist what the steward had called his "pleasant ways."

As if to escape from a scolding, she talked volubly all the time, bustling nervously through the rooms, along which I followed her guidance with a hushed footstep. The principal apartments were on the ground floor, or rather a floor raised some ten or fifteen feet above the ground; they had not been modernized since the date in which they were built. Hangings of faded silk; tables of rare marble, and bordered gilding; comfortless chairs at drill against the walls; pictures, of which connoisseurs alone could estimate the value, darkened by dust or blistered by sun and damp, made a general character of discomfort. On not one room, on not one nook, still lingered some old smile of Home.

Meanwhile, I gathered from the old woman's rambling answers to questions put to her by the steward, as I moved on, glancing at the pictures, that Margrave's visit that day was not his first. He had been over the house twice before; his ostensible excuse that he was an amateur in pictures (though I knew, as I have before observed, that for that department of art he had no taste); but each time he had talked much of Sir Philip. He said that, though not personally known to him, he had resided in the same towns abroad, and had friends intimate with Sir Philip; but when the steward inquired if the visitor had given any information as to the absence, it became very clear that Margrave had been rather asking questions than volunteering intelligence.

We had now got to the end of the state apartments, the last of which was a library. "And," said the old woman, "I don't wonder the gentleman knew Sir Philip, for he seemed a scholar, and looked very hard over the books, especially those old ones by the fire-place, which Sir Philip, Heaven bless him! was always poring into."

Mechanically I turned to the shelves by the fire-place, and examined the volumes ranged in that department. I found they contained the works of those writers whom we may class together under the title of mystics—Pozhyry and Plotinus; Swedenborg and Behmen; Sandivogius, Van Helmont, and Cardan. Works, too, were there, by writers less renowned, on astrology, geomancy, chiromancy, etc. I began to understand among what class of authors Margrave had picked up the strange notions with which he was apt to interpolate the doctrines of practical philosophy.

"I suppose this library was Sir Philip's usual sitting-room?" said I.

"No, Sir; he seldom sat here. This was his study;" and the old woman opened a small door, masked by false book backs. I followed her into a room of moderate size, and evidently of much earlier date than the rest of the house. "It is the only room of the old mansion," said the steward, in answer to my remarks. "I have heard it was left standing on account of the chimney-piece. But there is a Latin inscription which will tell you all about it. I don't know Latin myself," said the steward.

The chimney-piece reached to the ceiling. The frieze of the lower part rested on rude stone caryatides; in the upper part were oak panels very curiously carved in the geometrical designs favored by the taste prevalent in the reigns of Elizabeth and James, but different from any I had ever seen in drawings of old houses. And I was not quite unlearned in such matters, for, as I have before said, my poor father was a passionate antiquarian in all that relates to mediæval art. The design in the oak panels was composed of triangles interlaced with varied ingenuity, and inclosed in circular bands inscribed with the signs of the Zodiac.

On the centre frieze supported by the caryatides, immediately under the wood-work, was inserted a metal plate, on which was written, in Latin, a few lines to the effect that "in this room, Simon Forman, the seeker of hidden truth, taking refuge from unjust persecution, made those discoveries in nature which he committed, for the benefit of a wiser age, to the charge of his protector and patron, the worshipful Sir Miles Dervel, knight."

Forman! The name was not quite unfamiliar to me; but it was not without an effort that my memory enabled me to assign it to one of the most notorious of those astrologers or conjurers whom the superstition of an earlier age alternately persecuted and honored.

The rest of the room was more cheerful than the statelier chamber I had passed, for it had still the look of habitation. The arm-chair by the fire-place; the knee-hole writing-table beside it; the sofa near the recess of a large bay-window, with book-prop and candlestick screwed to its back; maps, ceiled in their cylinders, ranged under the cornice; low strong safes, or cupboards, probably for papers and relic-deeds, skirting two sides of the room, with articles familiar to modern use on their ample shelves; a fowling-piece here; fishing-rods there; two or three simple flower vases; a pile of music-books; a box of crayons—all seemed to speak of residence and ownership—had the idiosyncrasies of a lone single man, it is true, but of a man of our own time—a country squire of plain habits but not uncultivated tastes.

I moved to the window; it opened by a sash upon a large balcony, within which a wooden stair wound to a little garden, not visible in front of the house, surrounded by a thick growth of evergreens, through which one broad vista was cut; and that vista was closed by a view of the mausoleum.

I stepped out into the garden—a patch of sward with a fountain in the centre—and parterres, now more filled with weeds than flowers. At the left corner, a tall wooden summer-house or pavilion; its door open. "Oh, that's where Sir Philip used to study many a long summer's night," said the steward.

"What! in that damp summer-house?"

"It was a pretty place enough then, Sir; but it is very old. They say as old as the room you have just left."

"Indeed, I must look at it, then." The walls of this summer-house had once been painted in the arabesques of the Renaissance period; but the figures now were scarcely traceable. The wood-work had started in many places, and the sunbeams stole through the chinks and played on the floor, which was formed from old tiles quaint-

"I LOOKED, AND TO MY SURPRISE I SAW MARGRAVE DESCENDING THE STATELY STAIRS THAT LED FROM THE FRONT DOOR."

ly tesselated and in triangular patterns, similar to those I had remarked in the chimney-piece. The room in the pavilion was large, furnished with old worm-eaten tables and settles.

"It was not only here that Sir Philip studied, but sometimes in the room above," said the steward.

"How do you get to the room above? Oh, I see; a staircase in the angle."

I ascended the stairs with some caution, for they were crooked and decayed; and on entering the room above, comprehended at once why Sir Philip had favored it. The walls were glazed all round, and on three sides commanded a magnificent prospect, for which I was wholly unprepared: the fourth side brought in full view the mausoleum, terminating the vista cut through the evergreens. In this room was a large telescope. A small balcony extended from the windows, which reached the floors; and on stepping into the balcony, I saw that a winding stair led from the balcony to a platform on the top of the pavilion—perhaps once used as an observatory by Forman himself.

"This gentleman who was here to-day was very much pleased with this look-out, Sir," said the housekeeper.

"Who would not be?" said I. "I suppose Sir Philip has a taste for astronomy."

"I dare say, Sir," said the steward, looking grave; "but he's most out-of-the-way things."

The position of the sun now warned me that my time pressed, and I should have to ride fast to reach my new patient at the hour appointed. I therefore hurried back to my horse, and spurred on, wondering whether, in that chain of association which so subtly links our present to our manhood by the impressions in childhood, it was the Latin inscription on the chimney-piece that had originally biased Sir Philip Derval's literary taste toward the mystic jargon of the books I had glanced at.

CHAPTER XXIX.

I DID not see Margrave the following day, but the next morning, a little after sunrise, he walked into my study, as was his ordinary habit.

"So you have something else than Sir Philip Derval?" said I. "What sort of a man is he?"

"Hateful!" cried Margrave; and then checking himself, burst out into his merry laughter. "Just like my exaggerations! I am not acquainted with any thing to his prejudice. I came across his track once or twice in the Times. Travelers are always apt to be jealous of each other."

"You are a strange compound of cynicism and credibility. But I should have fancied that you and Sir Philip would have been congenial spirits, when I found among his favorite books Van Helmont and Paracelsus. Perhaps you, too, study Swedenborg, or, worse still, Ptolemy and Lilly?"

"Astrologers? No! They deal with the future! I live for the day, only I wish the day never had a morrow!"

"Have you not, then, that vague desire for the something beyond; that not unhappy, but grand discontent with the limits of the immediate present, from which man takes his position for improvement and progress, and from which some sentimental philosophers have deduced an argument in favor of his destined immortality?"

"Eh!" said Margrave, with as vacant a stare as that of a peasant whom one addressed in Hebrew. "What heap of words is this? I do not comprehend you."

"With your natural abilities," I asked, with interest, "do you never feel a desire for fame?"

"Fame! Certainly not. I can not even understand it!"

"Well, then, would you have no pleasure in the thought that you had rendered a service to humanity?"

Margrave looked bewildered. After a moment's pause he took from the table a piece of bread that chanced to be there, opened the window, and threw the crumbs into the lane. The sparrows gathered round the crumbs.

"Now," said Margrave, "the sparrows come to that alms-giver that the bread that comforts their lives in this world: do you believe that one sparrow would be silly enough to fly to a homestop for the sake of some benefit to come hereafter, or to be chirruped about after he was dead? I care for science as the sparrow cares for bread; it may help me to something better for my own life, and as for fame and humanity, I care for them as the sparrow cares for the general interest and posthumous approbation of sparrows!"

"Margrave! there is one thing in you that perplexes me more than all else—human puzzle as you are—in your many eccentricities still self-contradictions."

"What is that one thing most perplexing?"

"That, in your enjoyment of nature you have all the freshness of a child, but when you speak of man and his objects in the world you talk in the vein of some worn-out and cynical cynic. At such times, should I close my eyes, I should say to myself, 'What weary old man is venting his spleen against the ambition which has failed, and the love which has forsaken him?' Outwardly the very personation of youth, and inwardly like a butterfly in the sunshine of the sun and the mist of the herbage, how have you none of the golden passions of the young? their bright dreams of some impossible love—their sublime enthusiasm for some unattainable glory? The sentiment you have just clothed in your parable of the sparrow is too mean and too gloomy to be genuine at your age. Misanthropy is among the dismal fallacies of graybeards. No man, till man's energies leave him, can divorce himself from the bonds of our social kind."

"Our kind—your kind, possibly! But I—" He swept his hand over his brow, and resumed, in strange, absent, and wistful accents: "I wonder what it is that is wanting here, and of which at moments I have a dim reminiscence." Again he paused, and gazing on me, said, with more appearance of friendly interest than I had ever before remarked on his countenance, "You are not looking well. Despite your great physical strength, you suffer like your own sickly patients."

"True! I suffer at this moment, but not from bodily pain."

"You have some cause of mental disquietude."

"Who in this world has not?"

"I never have."

"Because you own you have never loved; and certainly you never seem to care for any one but yourself; and in yourself you find an unbroken sunny holiday—high spirits, youth, health, beauty, wealth. Happy boy!"

At that moment my heart was heavy within me.

Margrave resumed:

"Among the secrets which your knowledge places at the command of your art, what would you give for one which would enable you to dely and deride a rival where you place your affections, which could lock to yourself and imperishably control the will of the being whom you desire to fascinate by an influence paramount, transcendent?"

"Love has that secret," said I, "and love alone."

"A power stronger than love can suspend, can change, love. Bid it love me, and, be the object or dream of your life, love is the rosy associate of youth and beauty. Beauty soon fades, youth soon departs. Love, in its nature and its means by which beauty and youth can be fixed into blooming duration—means that can arrest the coming, delay, repair the effects, of time on the elements that make up the human frame!"

"Silly boy! Have the Rosencrucians bequeathed to you a prescription for the elixir of life?"

"If I had the prescription I should not ask your aid to discover its ingredients."

"And is it on the hope of that notable discovery you have studied chemistry, electricity, and magnetism? Again I say, Silly boy!"

Margrave did not heed my reply. His face was overcast, gloomy, troubled.

"That the vital principle is a gas," said he, abruptly, "I am more convinced. Can that gas be the one which combines caloric with oxygen?"

"Phosoxygen? Sir Humphry Davy demonstrates it not to be caloric, as Lavoisier supposed, but light in combustion with oxygen, and he suggests, not decided that it is the vital principle itself, but the pabulum of life to organic beings."*

"Does he?" said Margrave, his face clearing up. "Possibly, possibly then, here we approach the great secret of secrets. Look you, Allen Fenwick, I promise you to put suitable trust, security from all the jealous fears that now torture your heart; if you care for that fame which in me as in you would be one of a flower, the balm of a breeze. I will impart to you a knowledge that, in the bonds of ambition, would dwarf into contemptible pigmies the mightiest of recognized science. I will do all this, if, in return, but for one month you will give yourself up to my guidance and my will, without to ask, no matter how wild they may seem to you."

"My dear Margrave, I reject your bribes as I would reject the money and the rank that a child might offer to me in exchange for a toy. But I may give the child its toy for nothing, and I may test your experiments for nothing some day when I have leisure."

I did not hear Margrave's answer, for at that moment my servant entered with letters. I took a hasty glance at the superscription of the first. It was the seal. Such a loving, bright, happy letter; so sweet in its gentle chiding of my wrongful fears. Lilian implied that, since her last, the delightful Summer had proposed, been refused, had left the house. Lilian and her mother were coming back in a few days. All the rest written in this letter were inclosed a few lines from Mrs. Ashleigh. She was more explicit as to my rival than Lilian had been. Her allusion to his intentions had been made to me before, it was from a delicate consideration for myself. Mrs. Ashleigh said that "Mr. Summer had heard from L—— of our engagement—disbelieved it;" but, as Mrs. Poyntz had so shrewdly predicted, had gone away in the belief that his own attachment, the offer of his own hand. On Lilian's refusal his pride had been deeply mortified. He had gone away in bitterness, in no slight degree of sorrow. Lady Delafield, dear Margaret Poyntz's aunt, had been most kind in trying to soothe Lady Hughden's disappointment, which was rudely expressed—so rudely, added Mrs. Ashleigh, "that it gives us an excuse to leave soon." Lilian had been proposed to, which Lilian very glad of. Lady Delafield feels much for Mr. Sumner; has invited him to visit her at a place she has near Worthing; she leaves to-morrow in order to receive him; promises to reconcile him to our rejection, which, as he was my poor Gilbert's friend, and was rejected by me first, would be a great relief to my mind. Lilian is well, and so happy at the thoughts of coming back."

When I lifted my eyes from these letters I was as a new man, and the earth seemed a new earth. I felt as if I had realized Margrave's idle dreams—that love could never chill, youth never fade.

"You care for no secrets of mine at this moment," said Margrave, abruptly.

"Secrets," I murmured; "none now are worth knowing. I am loved—I am loved."

"I bide my time," said Margrave; and as my eyes met his, I saw there a look I had never seen in those eyes before—sinister, wrathful, menacing. He turned away, went out through the sash door of the study; and as he passed toward the fields under the luxuriant chestnut-trees, I heard his musical, barbaric chant—the song by which the serpent-charmer charms the serpent—sweet, so sweet, the very birds on the boughs hushed their carol as if to listen.

THE WAR IN KENTUCKY.

WE continue our series of illustrations of the war in Kentucky with a picture of the ARRIVAL OF THE ROUTED TROOPS AT LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, on page 668; and another of GENERAL SHERMAN'S HEAD-QUARTERS at Lebanon Junction, on the railroad south of Louisville, on page 667, both from sketches by our correspondent, Mr. Henry Mosler.

A correspondent of the Tribune thus writes of the camps:

The States of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois have sent many regiments and batteries of regiments to the United States encampment south of this city, on the railroad. I have not been able to preserve any regular estimate of the number, having been absent part of the time. But I can correctly be far wrong in saying that there are 12,000 to 15,000 men under command of General Sherman, including Home Guards. The force may exceed my estimate.

The reception of the Forty-Ninth Ohio at Louisville is thus described in the Louisville Journal:

A detachment of this force, under the command of Colonel Gibson, passed through the city this morning on their way to the seat of war on the Louisville and Nashville railroad. They paraded our streets, and their appearance was warmly greeted by the Union men and women of Louisville. They were under compliments to General Anderson at the Louisville Hotel, who appeared on the balcony, and, in a few feeling and eloquent remarks, thanked them for the compliment and welcomed them to Kentucky. He told them that they had come at a time when Kentucky needed their services, and that every true Kentuckian would properly and truly appreciate their motives in coming among us.

The response of Colonel Gibson was most touching. He alluded to the gallant manner in which Kentucky had come to the rescue of the Stars and Stripes in Jessamine Co., and said that Ohio designs now to show that she has not forgotten those kindly feelings, but is here with her blood to protect the constitutional rights of her neighbors.

Both General Anderson and Colonel Gibson were warmly applauded during their respective speeches. The detachment took up the line of march for the Nashville depot, from which point they embarked for General Sherman's head-quarters.

OUR MAP OF KENTUCKY.

THE southwestern portion of Kentucky and the western portion of Tennessee (of which we publish a Map on page 662) are mountainous; the middle portion is rolling and well-watered, through which the rivers run in deep channels, with high precipitous banks. In Kentucky this table-land breaks abruptly at the western edge of the Salt River and its tributary forks, which drain the plain westward to the Ohio River. The rise from this plain to the mountains land is about 200 feet, where the Louisville and Nashville Railroad ascends Mudrough Hill. At this point is a railroad tunnel 1,700 feet in length. The bridges of Rolling Fork were burned by the rebels. The Union forces, however, gained possession of the summit, and now hold that very important position, which is the key to the fertile and wealthy region of Northern Kentucky.

The Union and Rebel camps are designated on the Map.

SKIRMISHING ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

AS artist to whom we are indebted for many of the most interesting sketches we have published has sent us the picture which we reproduce on page 660. It represents a SKIRMISH WITH CANNON BETWEEN OUR AND SECESSION POSTS ACROSS THE POTOMAC, near Windsor. Here the cannon may be heard every day, and hardly a day passes without some dashing adventure on one side or the other. For the rest, the picture explains itself.

THE TREASURY BUILDING AT WASHINGTON.

IN view of the great success of the popular loan just issued by Government, we illustrate on page 665 the TREASURY BUILDING AT WASHINGTON, with vignettes of the most important offices.

Not in itself one of the most imposing and the largest buildings in the country. Its very appearance imparts solidity and stability to the Government which is beside it there seems to be no end to the long row of columns which stretch from Pennsylvania Avenue to a point parallel with the south side of Lafayette Square.

Our artist has shown us the Treasury Note at each stage. One picture introduces us to the clerks clipping the sheet of notes into the shape in which they reach the public; another exhibits the long rows of clerks who, by special act of Congress, are engaged to sign the notes; a third shows us a careful old gentleman counting the notes to see that none have disappeared in their travels through the building; and a fourth exhibits the note in its complete shape, with the last signature in the act of being affixed. Not less interesting than these is the vignette which introduces us to the vault where the coin is kept, and to the office where it is weighed. Since the war began the Treasury at Washington has done quite a lively business in specie. Before the war nearly all the bullion of the Government was kept in the Sub-treasury in this city.

The portraits of our excellent Secretary of the Treasury, MR. CHASE, and of the United States Treasurer, General SPINNER, of this State, will be recognized by who know those officials.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Portable Printing Offices

For the Army and Navy, Schools, Druggists, and all Business Men. Prices, from $12 to $50. Send for a Circular. ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 117 Fulton Street, N. Y.

The Fine Arts.

JUST PUBLISHED!

"The Defenders of the Union."

A beautiful picture, comprising twelve Portraits of the leading Commanders of our Army and Navy. Single copies on colors, price $1. Sent by Mail, Postage Paid, to Agents. At COQUILLO'S, No. 179 BROADWAY.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

GARDINER'S RHEUMATIC AND NEURALGIC COMPOUND

A 25 Cent Sewing Machine!

And 5 other curious inventions. Agents wanted every where. Description Circulars sent free. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Howard Association, Philadelphia,

For the Relief of the Sick and distressed, afflicted with Vicious and Chronic Diseases. Medical Advice given gratis by the Acting Surgeon. Valuable Reports on various Diseases, and on NEW REMEDIES employed in the Dispensary, sent in sealed letter envelopes, free of charge. Address, DR. WM. H. MCCLINTON, Howard Association, No. 2 South Ninth St., Philad'a, Pa.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—A Preacher of the Gospel, having cured his son of Consumption in the worst stages, after being given up to die by the most celebrated physicians, desires to make known the mode of cure, which proves successful in every case to those afflicted with Coughs, Colds, and Consumption, and he will send it free of charge to all who desire it and will forward him their address. Address REV. DANIEL AGEE, 373 Pearl Street, New York.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance, which can be had free for 25 cents. Address F. William & Co., Publishers, Box 2240, Philad.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have in Press and will publish

THE SILVER CORD.

A NOVEL.

By Shirley Brooks.

Illustrated.

(Uniform with WILKIE COLLINS'S "WOMAN IN WHITE.")

SVO, PAPER, 75 cents; Muslin, $1 00.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

ANY Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. ANY Volume, comprising SIX Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, or Express, free of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Single Volumes will be sent by Express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, at a Dollar and a Half per Volume. Complete sets, from the Commencement, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to June, 1861, now ready.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one year to any person who will procure—to five subscribers at $4. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will also be sent gratuitously.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three Copies for One Year (each) . . 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

"A STRANGE STORY,"

By Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

NOTWITHSTANDING the great extent of space devoted to illustrations of the War, Harper's Weekly commenced its Vol. XXI. dated August 10th, 1861, with the SERIAL TALE, by SIR EDW. BULWER LYTTON, entitled, which will be continued from week to week till completed.

"A STRANGE STORY,"

Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in cloth extra, Price $2 50 each, will now be ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at FIFTY CENTS each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. discount to Booksellers and the Trade.

 The postmasters and agents getting up a Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, to a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.

☞ Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.

As HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, Numbers can be supplied from the commencement.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

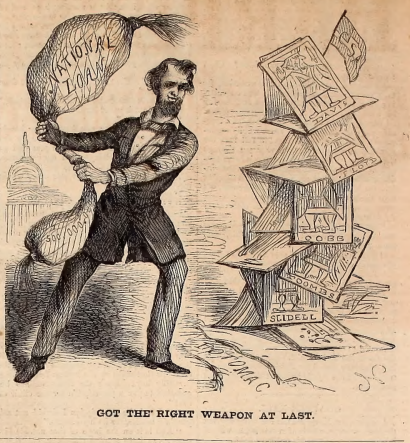
HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will also be sent gratuitously.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

OLD SECESH CROSSING THE POTOMAC.

This River is hard to Cross. If I can keep my Head above Water, however, a little longer, some of my Foreign Friends will recognize me and lend a hand. Meantime, I can go neither Forward nor Backward.



GOT THE RIGHT WEAPON AT LAST.

PUTTING OUT THE LAST PEACE PIPE.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Each Number Complete.

Beadle's Dime Novels, No. 30.

Putnam Pomfret's Ward;

OR, A VERMONTER'S ADVENTURES IN MEXICO

on the

BREAKING OUT OF THE LAST WAR.

Price Ten Cents. All of Beadle's Dime Books are sold by all Booksellers, News Dealers, Country Merchants, and Army Sutlers. Send for a Catalogue. All true.

BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.

WARD'S

Perfect Fitting Shirts,

MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN.

Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, drawings of different styles of shirts, sent free everywhere.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

1776 1861 UNION

WEDDING CARDS.

These Cards are "Stamped Cardboard only" — Gilt Edged only — Silk Fringed — Envelopes to match — and Envelopes

Beautiful Portraits, finely engraved on steel, printed on paper 19x15 in., of Gens. Scott, McClellan, Wool, Banks, Fremont, Sigel, Anderson, Dix, Butler, Sprague, Lyon, Com. Stringham, Col. Ellsworth, &c. Price 15 cts. each. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Liberal terms to Agents. Send for a Catalogue.

J. C. BUTTRE, 48 Franklin Street, New York.

DEVLIN & Co.

Having made an important and desirable change in our firm, we beg to inform our friends that our entire resources are now employed in an extensive and vigorous prosecution of the CITY RETAIL and CASH WHOLESALE Men's and Boys' Clothing Business.

We enter on the Fall and Winter Season with a large and well-assorted Stock in every department; stylish ready-made Clothing for men and boys, great varieties of cloths, cassimeres, beavers, vestings, &c., to make to order. And also a complete assortment of all descriptions of Army and Navy Cloths, &c., to supply the largest orders.

The rates and terms in every department of our business shall be in keeping with the spirit of the times, viz.:

LOW PROFITS, PROMPTNESS, CASH.

DEVLIN & CO.,

Cors. of BROADWAY and WARREN and GRAND Streets.

Elliot's Pocket Revolver.

The most compact and powerful Pistol ever made, weighs only thirty ounces, while length from muzzle to percussion is 1 inch of pin at one hundred and fifty yards. Price $10, with 100 Cartridges. Lowest cuash for illustrated circular.

T. W. MOORE, 493 Broadway, N. Y.

ALL WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Wedding Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 182 Broadway. Samples by mail.

GAME, MEATS, FISH, &c., improved by the use of Lea & Perrins's Worcestershire Sauce.

JOHN DUNCAN & SONS,

Union Square and 14th Street, Sole Agents.

JEWELRY! JEWELRY!—The Head-Quarters for all Cash Buyers of fine and cheap Jewelry, Miniature Pins of all the Heroes. Persons wishing to see Samples, enclose stamp for full particulars. W. A. HAYWARD (Manufacturing Jeweler), 593 Broadway.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS.—SELLHORN'S Patents, 589 Broadway, New York.

Send for a Circular.

Dr. Tumblety's Pimple Banisher.

Old Faces made to look Young and Beautiful.

You may obtain a handsome complexion, exempt from Pimples, Blotches, &c., by using Dr. TUMBLETY'S PIMPLE BANISHER. Price One Dollar per Bottle. Sent by mail or Express to any address. Office 499 Broadway, New York.

MAKE MONEY BY DOING GOOD.—Ten intelligent, honest MEN wanted in each State to supply SCHOOLS with Maps, GLOBES, APPARATUS, FURNITURE, and everything needed. Address F. C. BROWNELL, 95 Howard Street, New York.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Herrmann's Soirees de Prestidigitation

Every Evening.

Notice.—During the coming winter it is the intention of Mons. Herrmann to visit the following cities in this State and the West, viz.: Albany, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, and St. Louis.

Friends of Soldiers!

Send by Harnden's Express (the oldest Express), 74 Broadway, as they charge only half rates.

Agents Wanted.—Something New.

Articles of REAL MERIT wanted in every family: "Clark's Patent Indelible Pencil," for marking linen; "Patent Match Safe," for vest pocket; "Downer's Patent Hemmer and Shield;" "Coffee Strainer and Economizer;" "Egyptian Cement," for family use; "Patent Work-Holder." Satisfaction given or money refunded. Address (with stamp) RICE & CO., 83 Nassau Street, N.Y.

Ladies are invited to call and examine the splendid stock of fair fine and shilling's fancy hats now open at TERRY'S, 397 Broadway, New York.

AGENTS WANTED—MALE AND FEMALE, to sell the Union Prize Gift Package, which contains $5 valuable recipes, Union envelopes and stationery, in colors, a splendid likeness (6x10) of General George B. McClellan, the Napoleon of the present war, and a gift of superb jewelry. Agents are now making from $5 to $10 per day. Send stamp for our mammoth circular.

RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street.

AGENTS WANTED.—For the BEST WAR MAPS, VIEWS, and PORTRAITS.—35 Maps, 7 Views, 5 Portraits. Samples of all sent on receipt of $1. Circulars sent free. Address E. ELLIOT, 108 Broadway, N. Y.

$150 PER MONTH made by enterprising agents selling DOWNER'S HEMMER and SHIELD for hand sewing. Protects the finger and makes a beautiful hem. Sample sent on receipt of 25 cents. Address A. H. DOWNER, No. 442 Broadway.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT TO HIRE AGENTS in every County at $75 per month and expenses, to sell a new and cheap Sewing Machine. Address (with stamp) S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

"Great Discovery."—For particulars send stamp to D. A. WILLIAMS, Lowell, Mass.

CIVIL and MILITARY COLLEGE at BEAVERWICK MANOR, near ALBANY, N. Y. This institution will be opened on the 23d day of October, under the direction of Prof. B. FRANKLIN GREENE, Civil Engineer; Prof. JAMES HALL, N. Y. State Geologist; Prof. AMOS DEAN, LL.D., and other associate members of the Professional Corps. For Circulars and further information, address B. FRANKLIN GREENE,

Director, etc., Albany, N. Y.

Commercial Agents wanted. Large commission, honorable business. Circular sent. A.W. Harrison, Phila.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have Just Published;

THE SILVER CORD. A Novel. By SHIRLEY BROOKS. Illustrated. (Uniform with Wilkie Collins's "Woman in White," "No Name," &c.) 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Muslin, $1 00.

LIFE IN THE SOUTH PACIFIC. Life and Adventure in the South Pacific. By a ROVING PRINTER. Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

THE HOUSE ON THE MOOR. A Novel. By the Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of My Life," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

FARADAY'S CHEMICAL HISTORY OF A CANDLE. A Course of Six Lectures on the Chemical History of a Candle, to which is added a Lecture on Platinum. By MICHAEL FARADAY, D.C.L., F.R.S. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

SEASONS WITH THE SEA-HORSES; or, Sporting Adventures in the Northern Seas. By JAMES LAMONT, Esq., F.G.S. With Map and numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $1 75.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage free (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 252.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE FIGHT AT CHICKAMACOMICO.

We publish herewith a portrait of LIEUTENANT BRAINE, U.S.N., commander of the Monticello, and on page 677 an illustration of the SHELLING OF THE REBELS near Chickamacomico, North Carolina, by the Monticello. The details of the conflict are thus accurately described in the Herald's letter from Hatteras:

On the morning of the 4th instant, about daylight, the look-outs of Colonel Brown's encampment, consisting of about eight hundred men of the Twentieth Indiana regiment, located some thirty miles above this place, reported six rebel steamers, with schooners and flat-boats in tow, sailing straight for the encampment. There was no time to be lost, for it was evident their numbers were too great to resist without artillery, reported as they would be by the guns of the steamers. The Colonel immediately dispatched a courier to inform Colonel Hawkins, at Fort Hatteras, of his situation, stating that he would retreat to the light-house on the Cape, and there make a stand.

The steamers landed about fifteen hundred men three miles above Colonel Brown, and then came on down, throwing shells into the tents, destroying them, also a house which had been used as a hospital, killing what sick remained therein. They then passed on down and commenced landing troops below, intending to cut off all retreat, and, having them between their two forces, make sure, no doubt, of bagging Colonel Brown and his men at their leisure. But they were not quick enough; for Colonel B. hastily destroyed what he could not carry off with him, and left on the double quick, and succeeded in reaching the light-house about nine in the evening, having performed a rapid march through the heavy sand.

Colonel Hawkins, upon receiving the information from Colonel Brown, dispatched a note to Captain Lardner, of the Susquehanna, informing him of the condition of affairs, and then started on the double quick, with six companies of his Zouaves, to reinforce the retreating troops. Captain Lardner immediately got the Susquehanna under way, at the same time ordering the Monticello to do the same, and proceeded up and anchored in Light-house cove, about eight o'clock in the evening, within half gunshot of the light. At the request of Colonel Hawkins, Capt. Lardner remained at anchor to protect the troops against such superior numbers as were supposed to be in pursuit of them. He at the same time ordered the Monticello to sail out of the cove, and proceed close along the shore, and see if he could discover any traces of the enemy. He had proceeded but a short distance when the rebels were discovered in full plume and within half gunshot; the Monticello opened fire on them at once with shells that exploded with the utmost precision, scattering them in all directions, killing and wounding them by hundreds. The fire continued till night, when they escaped.

LIEUTENANT BRAINE, U.S.N., COMMANDING THE "MONTICELLO."
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY MORAN, OF BROOKLYN, N.Y.]

LIEUTENANT DANIEL LAWRENCE BRAINE was born in New York, May 18, 1829, therefore is 32 years of age. His mother was a Miss Hamilton, and father A. L. Braine, both New Yorkers. He entered the navy, as midshipman, May 20, 1846, at the age of 17; received his present commission in 1855. Of the fifteen years in the navy nearly twelve have been passed at sea. Was on board the John Adams at the bombardment of Vera Cruz; on board the St. Louis when Duncan N. Ingraham demanded the release of Koszta; on coast-survey duty at Charleston and James River, under J. N. Moffit's command, for two years; then ordered to the coast of Africa; returned with a slaver. Was a few months on board the receiving ship North Carolina, and was ordered from there to join the Ironsides, stationed at Aspinwall. He sailed in the North Star October 20, 1859, to join his ship. She ran aground, and Lieutenant Braine took a boat and went to Fortune Island for assistance to the steamer. He was two days in an open boat. Returned to the United States with the Japanese Embassy; and again received orders to the North Carolina, where he remained until last spring, when he volunteered to join Captain Ward's flotilla; but ere the flotilla sailed Lieutenant Braine was detailed by the flag-officer to take command of the Monticello at one day's notice, and the Monticello sailed for Fortress Monroe. The Monticello was in the expedition to Hatteras, where she got aground; eleven shots struck her, and she was sent to the Philadelphia Navy-yard for repairs. She has captured several vessels; and this last affair at Hatteras Inlet shows that her first lieutenant—now ordered by the Department commander of the Monticello—has ever been active and prompt.

Our portrait of LIEUTENANT BRAINE is from a photograph by Messrs. A. MORAND & CO., of 297 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., whose establishment is one of the best and most extensive in the country.

A NIGHT RECONNOISSANCE ON THE POTOMAC.

THE "GREAT EASTERN" IN THE STORM.

On page 685 we publish a couple of illustrations of the "GREAT EASTERN" IN THE STORM which disabled her, from sketches by Mr. C. F. Hayward, F.R.I., of London, England. We have already mentioned the circumstance in our news columns, but in order that our readers may the better understand the state of affairs, we condense the following account from the Liverpool papers:

The rudder-pin having been broken, the ship fell into the trough of the sea. The passengers were cast down to shelter, and from that moment commenced a chain of breakages which lasted without intermission for three days. Every thing movable was destroyed. Furniture, fittings, services of plate, glasses, piano—all were involved in one common fate.

It may be known when the rudder was unmanageable.

About six o'clock the vessel had to be stopped again, owing to two cries of shoot hail, weighing one hundred weight each, which were in the engine-room, rolling about with every oscillation of the vessel with fearful force. These having been secured, another shot was made, when a transom-plate may be heard under the paddle-boxes, which had become twisted, and the floats were grinding against the side of the ship. The paddles were clipped, and therefore/and the scene is described as fearful in the extreme.

The ship rolled so violently that the boats were washed away. The cabin, besides undergoing the ravages of fire from the smoke and collisions which were constantly going on, had shipped, probably through the port-holes, a great deal of water, and the stores were floating about in utter confusion and ruin.

Some of the smokers fell down with a crash. A large mirror was smashed into a thousand fragments, rails of bulwsters, bars, and numerous other fittings were flung into numberless pieces. Some idea of the roughness of the night's labor may be gathered from the fact that the chain cables polished themselves bright with friction on deck. A spare hatch big gave way on the cable deck and knocked a hole through the ship's side. Two oil tanks also on the cable deck were so much damaged by another concussion that two hundred gallons of fish oil contained in them run into the hold, and continued during the rest of the unhappy voyage a most intolerable odor.

The baggage of the passengers in the lower after-cargo space was lying in two feet of water, and before the delivery of the ship was effected all the cabin baggage was reduced to rags and pieces of timber.

Two separate instances of limbs occurred from the concussions caused by the tremendous lurching of the vessel. Cuts and bruises were innumerable. One of the cooks on board was cut violently by one of the hatches against the paddle-box, by which he sustained fearful bruises on his arms, pulling it out of his power to protect himself.

Another lurch drove him against one of the machines, by which concussion one of the poor fellow's legs was broken in three places.

The baker received injuries of a very terrible character in vital parts; and one of the most striking incidents was the case of this poor, brave man crawling in his agony to extinguish some portion of the baking gear which at that moment had caught fire.

Two cows, with their cow-houses, and a swan were washed into the lower cabin, and added much to the terror of the lady passengers.

The final conduct of the great ship and her safe arrival at Queenstown have already been noticed.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1861.

WHY THE WAR MOVES SLOWLY.

A GOOD deal of impatience is expressed by the people at the slowness with which the war progresses. Our excitable citizens would like at least a battle a week, and can not understand why nearly three months have elapsed since the affair at Bull Run, and nothing worthy to mention has been done by General McClellan to efface the stain of that day. These murmurs have found utterance in one or two of our city journals.

Many reasons—amply sufficient to account for our slowness—will at once occur to the candid reader. In April last, only six months ago, we had neither money, nor army, nor navy, nor commissariat, nor transportation, nor medical bureau, nor any thing else requisite for military operations on a great scale. Now the Government has as much money as it needs, a well-appointed army of 350,000 men, a well-armed navy of some 200 vessels, and transportation, commissariat, etc., in good condition and ample amount. To have created a large and good army and navy in six months is evidence not of slowness but of unparalleled dispatch. The great armies and navies of Europe are the fruit of years of toil.

But a still better excuse for the apparent slowness of our military and naval movements is derived from the extent of country covered by the war. It is safe to say that there never was a war before prosecuted on a line of such length. From Fortress Monroe, Virginia, to Lexington, Missouri, is over 1000 miles, and we may be said to be guarding every foot of this distance. Our pickets are almost within hail of each other along a line as long as from Havre, in France, to Gibraltan, in Spain, or from Vienna, in Austria, to Brest. If we compare this distance with that occupied by the lines of the great armies whose campaigns are written in history, we shall see how unprecedented our present circumstances are. The whole of the great Italian war of 1859—in which over 800,000 men were engaged—was waged in an area less than that of New Jersey or of Vermont, and neither belligerent ever occupied lines extending over 150 miles in length. The Crimean war of 1854-'5 was waged in an area about the size of Manhattan Island, and the lines guarded by sentinels seldom extended, on either side, beyond 20 miles front. Wellington, in the Spanish Peninsula, covered a front line of some thirty miles; and Napoleon, in Italy and Germany, about the same. Even the operations of the great French army of 1813 were narrow and contracted in comparison with those of the army under General Scott.

So with the navy. In the Crimean war the combined fleets of England and France devoted their whole energies to the blockading of three isolated sea-ports, and the assault of three isolated forts. In the old European wars there never was an attempt made to perfect a blockade of a long coast line. England never attempted to close, with ships of war, every French port. She blockaded a port here and a port there, and left the others to be looked after by flying squadrons. We have a close coast-guard extending along a line from 2000 to 3000 miles, and hermetically sealing at least twenty-five established ports of entry. The lines of our "blockade" would encircle all Europe, with the exception of Russia. When it is remembered that, at the outbreak of the rebellion, we had but one available ship of war in a loyal port, it must be confessed that this is doing pretty well.

Signs indicate that the impatient among our fellow-citizens will very soon be gratified by the occurrence of startling events. The day rapidly approaches which was long ago appointed for the commencement of active offensive operations by the Government. If, however, fresh delays should intervene, people must not institute disparaging comparisons between the movements of our armies and those of the European hosts which, in past times, have waged wars in holes and corners where the struggle could not relieve each other without jostling the enemy.

THE LOUNGER.

"THE ORNAMENT OF BEAUTY IS SUSPECT."

AT least the American people ought to insist upon fair play. General Washington was in New York when the battle of Brooklyn was lost, one of our most disastrous defeats: he was driven from the city, from the island, from the Hudson River, Fort Washington fell, and he retreated across the Hackensack, and the Raritan, and the Delaware: had not Rivington's New York Gazette been forcibly suppressed by the Sons of Liberty, it would have reveled in alone of him, and have scornfully challenged the friends of America to confess that they had been guilty of employing a military genius like this Virginian surveyor, all of whose military exploits had been upon the frontier.

But let us be more lenient, and, until then, his friend, Joseph Reed, to General Lee, deprecating Washington; the Conway cabal against him; the letters of Gates, of which, as he has published in London, could not shake him in his purpose, nor ruffle the pure current of his patriotism. His duty was to serve his country, and to satisfy a partial or ignorant criticism. He was not ignorant of these enmities; he sometimes spoke of them with deep feeling; and his letters to Reed, the President was to put upon record in the State Department a solemn denial of the letters shamelessly ascribed to him. There is no more established letter of Washington's in which he speaks in these calm words of blows that might easily have harmed more than himself, for they might have reached his country:

"We have some among us, and I dare say Generals, who wish to make themselves popular at the expense of others, or who think the cause is not to be advanced otherwise than by fighting: the peculiar circumstances under which it is to be done, and the consequences which may follow are objects too remote for their attention. But as I have the great end in view, I shall, against all the strokes of this kind, steadily pursue the means which in my judgment lead to the accomplishment of it, not doubting but that the candid part of mankind, if they are convinced of my integrity, will put the most favorable construction upon my imperfections and frailties. I will agree to be loaded with all the obloquy they can bestow if I commit a willful error."

Whenever in our history we shall see any other leader upon whose ability great hopes have been reposed, checked by circumstances which he could not control and will not explain, let us not at once throw to the winds all the confidence which we have gladly given him, but patiently wait until it shall be incontestibly proved that confidence was ill-founded. Nor then will every generous soul not a disappointed office-seeker, capacity, or rascal to an honest man his due because he does not seem to have the qualities which it is no shame to lack.

THE LONDON "TIMES" AND GARIBALDI.

IF some ingenious fellow should tell the London Times that President Lincoln was intriguing to succeed Jeff Davis as head of the rebellion, the London Times would instantly swallow the story and discharge a full broadside of horror at the awful duplicity engendered by American institutions and the fundamental principle of popular government. If another ingenious fellow should date from the city of Maine, in the State of San Francisco, and inform the same Times that the rights of civil liberty were prostrate in the dust beneath the heel of a worse than Asiatic tyranny, because some foolish scribbler had been arrested and put out of harm's way, the London Times would publish it in full, and gloat over the superior happiness enjoyed under a real despotism. The history and lying reports, and all the tragical detail of English poverty, so amply attest.

But a more ingenious fellow than either sent the word of a mare's nest to the London Times, and the Judicious and honeyed sheet straightway led off in this style: "As if despairing of native genius or enterprise, the President at Washington has actually sent to Garibaldi to accept the post of Commander-in-chief, throwing into the bargain the emancipation of the slaves. It costs an effort to take in the extravagant oddity and the humiliating character of this proposal." But the Times is perfectly capable of the effort, and away it flies into a judicrous programme of the possibilities and consequences of his acceptance.

There would certainly have been nothing remarkable or dishonorable in the offer of a position in our armies to one of our most illustrious naturalized citizens, and one of the most celebrated of living soldiers. It would in this case have been peculiarly appropriate, that Garibaldi is famous for his unwavering opposition to the efforts of despotism to destroy the unity and liberty of his native land, and may be supposed to cherish the warmest sympathy with the effort of his adopted country to maintain her unity and liberty. It was no reflection upon the valor or ability of Washington, or Gates, or Putnam, or Greene, that the Continental Congress offered a Major-Generalcy to Lafayette. The foreign officers in our revolutionary service were noble men and faithful friends, but it so chanced that they did not win the decisive battles.

The amiable slanderer of the American people and its government, which is so horror-struck by the thought that a gallant hero may have been summoned to fight the battle of constitutional liberty in this country, has not a word about the efforts of its friends the rebels and the foes of constitutional liberty to gain the support of the Indians. Why should it have? The London Times is the exponent of the British public opinion which allowed George Third to hire Hessians to fight his battles against the sons of Englishmen. It can of course only exhibit approval of the attempts, striving to destroy the safeguards of constitutional liberty, in order to make slavery the corner-stone of a new government raised upon its ruins, summon savages to their aid.

THE OPERA.

EVEN since the introduction of the Italian opera into England, the days when an enthusiastic admirer gave fifty guineas a thousand dollars for a single ticket, and a rapturous devotee of music could cry, "One God, one Farinelli"—ever since those days the opera manager has been one of the powers of fashion. We have no doubt in this country, but none who have worked more indefatigably for the public amusement than Mr. Ullman. That he has worked to make a profit as he has apparently hoped. Nobody was ever so churlish as to grudge Mr. Burnum the money he may have made by his Jenny Lind speculation.

But civil war and the opera are not friends. We hear frequently, indeed, that the Parisian theatres were never more crowded than now, is here. But it is Paris which supports those theatres, not the rest of France. With us it is different. The opera audiences of New York, Philadelphia, and of Philadelphia is recruited from the other parts of the country. This is particularly so in New York. The sailing ships of Liverpool, and Glasgow, and Sharon, and all the springs and shores, has annually left thousands of strangers tarrying in New York until the cold weather. But October and October and November has been a study of our varied nationality.

But this year the South, as a body, is in arms against us, and waging a bloody and cruel war against the common Government. The autumnal visitors are not here. But the Academy is open, and Mr. Ullman is here, and his lease is here. Of course he concluded his engagement with the authorities of the Academy with the expectation that the usual peace would prevail. In that he shared a very general error. In order, therefore, that he may help himself to pay his rent and fulfill all his promises—among which is that of Ristori for September, 1862—Mr. Ullman has proposed to the Directors of the Academy that they let the Academy, upon condition—or rather, with the hope—that every stockholder will dispose of a certain amount of tickets at one dollar each to the poor, for every share he may hold. The chorus, orchestra, employés, and several artists, volunteer their aid; the use, of course, will be a sacrifice. The actually will be small, and the income will—not to put too fine a point upon it—put Mr. Ullman upon his legs. There will be few performances in the year, upon the 17th of October, will have passed before this paper is published; the second will be on Monday evening, the 4th of November, when the comic opera, "now the rage in Paris," and an opera of Donizetti's, "Betty," never before sung in America, are to be produced by Madame Ponisi, Miss Kellogg, Miss Hinkley, Signor Briguoli, Signor Mancusi, and Miss Carlotta Patti, to whom the famous children is a guarantee of success. The manager's appeal, and calls upon the shareholders to show that, "despite the treasure promptly found to supply  war's expensive requisites," there is enough left to support the opera.

The reasoning is good; and we sincerely hope that Mr. Ullman's benefit may be truly beneficial.

LIEUTENANT BRAINE.

THE late Mr. Secretary Toucey did his share in inaugurating the conspiracy against the Government by emptying the national ships to the ends of the earth, so that when we were compelled to turn to all our resources there were, thanks to the estimable efforts of that distinguished patriot, but six available ships at the service of the country. We have had, consequently, to create a navy. The old American renown upon the seas was to vindicate itself if it could: and Commodore Stringham and Lieutenant Braine have proved that it can.

The brilliant affair of six weeks and more since at Hatteras Inlet was beginning to pale in the public appreciation, because it seemed only the beginning of a good thing which was not completed, and because of the capture of the Fanny, which seemed to indicate something like treachery. But the affair of Saturday week was an equal vindication of the pluck and skill of our naval officers. It was managed by a Lieutenant, and was a disastrous blow for the rebels.

Coming in force to recapture the forts, supported by sloops and steamers, they laid and are marching over the sand, driving a scant of loyal men before them. Suddenly the Monticello steamed around Cape Hatteras, and approaching the low shore opened a hail fire. The stricken and appalled enemy turned and fled—but the ship moved steadily along their flank, pouring in the deadly hail of shot and shell. The fated traitors took refuge in a wood; but the fiery storm smote them there, and they ran wildly to the beach. Then own ship's level to return the fire; but left helpless themselves, and they desisted. As they struggled at the boats they were still within range, and two of the boats were sunk by the terrible cannonade. The rout and slaughter are pitiful to hear of. But the victory was complete, and the lesson must tragically sobering.

Will they learn it? Will they see in those sad four hours upon the fatal sand spit the work and the fate that is before them? Or do they suppose that the hand which fell upon them there so heavy? Or is likely to be weakened as months pass? When the expedition is sailed—when the American navy is nibbling at their shores and the array is driving them back—when universal apprehension leads to the rule or law of any Confederate Congress can control—when the whole world, and even reluctant England, turn their backs, and declare that we have vindicated upon a certain result are more and more doggedly setting themselves to the work—then Lieutenant Braine's performance at Cape Hatteras will be seen to be but a promise and a symbol.

A FRIEND INDEED.

THERE is one newspaper which, during the bitter difficulties of the last few months, has been in less forcible and eloquent in stating and defending the cause of this nation than faithful to the great principle of constitutional liberty. Its course has endeared it to every patriotic American, and the name of the London News will be as much honored by our children as that of the London Times will be despised. Waywardness of opinion and profound ignorance are always to be expected of the Times, as upon every question of the past for the last dozen years known; but such deliberate, reckless, and malignant slander as has marked its course toward us we did not think even that paper had prepared us to anticipate.

The London News has done the inestimable service of placing the cause where it would fail. What might be said in our journals in reply to the Times and kindred prints could only be known to the English people through the representations which they might choose to make. But the News has sturdily stood our friend. And as, in the older day, Edmund Burke was the most eloquent as when he spoke for justice in America, so the News, which is always able, was never so brilliant and powerful as in its advocacy of American civil liberty, assailed by traitors at home and by the foes of liberty everywhere.

The latest and most striking illustration of the faithful friendship of the London News is the following. The London Times, speaking of the Russian letter, says:

"We shall be curious to see how this well-meant intervention will be received in the United States, for as yet nothing can be known of the contents of Mr. Seward's short dispatch. Were we to argue from the treatment to which England has been exposed, we should have little sanguine as to the result. Every thing we have done or omitted to do, every step we have had or not said, has been subjected to the same coarse misrepresentation and the most unprovoked insult. The press of the United States has never been weary of attributing to us designs which we never entertained, and recognitions in Southern States, the harboring their privateers, the breaking the blockade, and of otherwise treating that territory by their threats and insults, we had reluctantly given up our authorized title. Had Earl Russell been so unwise as to the Emperor as to us, he will receive a very ungracious acknowledgment for his well-meant intervention. We are, however, sanguine enough to believe that this will not be the case, and that the offer will be doing injustice to the people of the States if we should assume that the treatment which they have given to their border is to be the measure of their courtesy to foreign nations. On the contrary, we have reason to believe that we stand in the United States on the footing of the least favored people of the earth."

To this the London News answers:

"If any European counsel could have been of use to the United States, it would have been that of his Imperial Majesty. Under the circumstances, we should evidently disregard an opportunity of expressing to the Government and people of a friendly power which is with them the best interests of their rivals. In the case of the English Government this was manifestly impossible, if from no other cause than the mean and base motions which found prominent expression in a certain portion of the London press. But the American troubles, which have provided a malignant and unfailing entertainment to one phase of their development, and in the light of which every official manifestation would be judged."

THE RETURN OF DR. HAYES.

DR. HAYES'S Arctic expedition has returned, after an absence of fifteen months. The explorers were unable to penetrate much beyond the eighteth degree of latitude, and the detailed results of the voyage are yet to be learned. Probably it has added little to our previous knowledge; for the course of the expedition was not unusual, nor did it reach or touch at points not known others. It has no romance and the heroism are always the same, and every voyage does as the great service of destroying the terror which invests the silent world of ice.

The Hayes's expedition is saddened upon its return by the death of two of its members. In Mr. August Sontag we lose an artist and an enthusiast. His name was not unfamiliar to those who know any thing of our artists; and he entered with great ardor into the Arctic scheme in which he has perished. Whether he has left many sketches of northern scenery we have as yet no means of knowing. But the Doctor will doubtless prepare a volume of his adventures, and it will be naturally illustrated by such drawings as Sontag may have made.

The Arctic enthusiasm has doubtless died away for the present, both here and in England. It is periodical rather than persistent, like so many other great undertakings. Moreover, the alienation of national feeling, which will be the inevitable result of the conflict in which we happen to be in our dark day, will for many a year prevent any hearty co-operation in arduous enterprises, as it will sully with the foul blood and the tears of the days to the exist between England and America, and which, by our action, would never have been interrupted.

THE LAST STROKE OF THE BELL.

A GENTLEMAN who recently made his way to the North from the South was stopped in Nashville at the outset by the Vigilance Committee. A Vigilance Committee of rebels, whose chairman was John Bell, the late "Union" candidate, by disunion votes of the South and the Northern Democracy. Mr. Bell was desirous that the permit should be granted at once, but the Committee were not so courteous, and it was only after a close examination and due deliberation that it was granted.

There is something so pitiful in the position of this man that others who do not like Mr. Bell and the one national honor demands that the lesson of his example shall not be lost upon the young and aspiring men of the country. In 1860 Mr. Bell meant precisely what Mr. Stephens meant—the dominance of his section. The Chairman of the Convention was nominated upon that basis, and the great question which was the real issue of the last election—namely, the extension and confirmation of the power of slavery in the Federal Government—"a miserable abstraction." The Chairman differed in his views from the ablest men of all parties in the country. So little is the favorable abstraction was it, that it was vital enough to imperil the very existence of the Government.

If by "United" Mr. Bell had meant the nation, the Government, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws at every cost, against Jeff Davis, and Floyd and Cobb, and the whole crew of officers who might be false to their flag, and were trying to ruin the Government for the benefit of slavery, as well as against secession, he would have scientiously treat as criminals men whose only crime was the misfortune of being born—if this had been the Union which Mr. Bell stood upon ground where he could stand just as firmly to-day.

But Mr. Bell's doctrine was Mr. Buchanan's—that the Union existed by sufferance; thus it was very naughty to break it up, but it could not law-fully be forced to remain. Upon that basis Supose he had been elected President—where would this nation be to-day?

The moral is, that every man should clearly understand that there can be but two grounds; either the absolute unity of the nation and the unconditional support of the Government of the national affairs, or the absolute independent supremacy of the State governments. Between the two there is no holding. The position which Mr. Bell hoped to hold was exactly Jeff Davis's position. He thought that it was better for Mississippi to go out, but absolutely right for any one to do it by any national permission. So the citizens of Kentucky thought that it was better for her to stay in, not because she had no more right to secede from the nation than the city of Louisville has the right to secede from Kentucky, but by right of her own sovereignty. It is an error from which they seem to have nobly recovered. There are now no two sovereignties. Some of the attributes of sovereignty—such as the right of war, for instance, are retained by the State; but the great, final, supreme powers of sovereignty have been delegated by the people of the States to the national Government; and that Government has no power which they do not necessarily revert to the States, but to any number of people over those who can succeed in organizing and sustaining a new Government.

Mr. Bell has fallen as few public men fall. Deserted by his old friends, despised by his new, the last stroke of the bell to us as the appointed representative of patriotism, and, therefore, worthiest to be President of the United States, hastens to disunion, we greet him, and disappointed in the history of his country, the inefficient leader of a gang who seek their country's dishonor and destruction.

"GREAT EXPECTATIONS."

MR. DICKENS'S admirable tale "Great Expectations," which was introduced to the American public in the columns of Harper's Weekly, has been dramatized by Mr. Aiken, and will be played at Barnum's Museum. It is an effective play, and is having a good run. Plays based on Mr. Dickens's stories rarely contain high dramatic merit, but offend the most fastidious taste or the nicest sense of morality.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

VERY LIKE A WHALE.—They had better have stuck to the naval Expedition to Port Royal. Seems, for it seems that the Shareholders are doomed to blubber.

A BRUTE.—Our cynical friend Snobgrass, whose antipathy to married ladies is only to be equaled by his admiration for ignorant ones, declares that the preference which strong minded women show for blue stockings serves entirely to the fact of their requiring less washing than white ones.

TO BE FACETED WITH, for the veriest trifle, a LONG AND LAMENTABLE EPISTLE.—Is a misfortune indeed quality. The advertiser can highly recommend it, as it has been in his possession now for the best three years, and has never left him, either day or night, for a single minute. The only motive for parting with it, is because the owner has recently joined a Choral Society, and he finds that his fellow-songsters strongly object to his practicing with them. Six dozen bones of rough lamegrass will be thrown in, as a warranty, with the whole. Immediate possession can be had, and a month's trial allowed for approval. Letters to be addressed to "A. HARDEN, Esq., care of the Secretary of the Tonic Sol-Fa-Fiddle-de-dee Association."

ANECDOTES FROM BATH.

BY OUR TRAVELING COLLECTOR.

The fascinating Miss *, being taken to the Hippodrome, inquired the meaning of the incessant cry, by the riders, "Stump it!" She was informed that it merely meant "Come on." This young lady is one of the few who never forget any thing, not even themselves. Next day, the fifth, she exclaimed at the hotel * * * * was at once as much surprised as delighted at hearing a sweet voice, from an upper landing, cry, "I can't stump it, young gal!, hoop it!"

A London cockney passing the shop of M. Houtetour, Jun de Rivels, publisher of engravings, remarked that you would naturally go there for High Art.

The name unfortunately enough, having heard that heretofore is eaten at certain Parisian hotels, evinced the utmost horror, looking round, he cried, "I'm a Velluntary, I came to the bon Garçons. He says that a soldier of nation is the surest approach he can bear to equestrian viands.

In all the Roman Catholic churches are now put up placards inserted in a frame, thus printed: "But as every body passes them, Brown says that we are all denizens of the Strand, and therefore, we have a right to the notion.

"I see a paragraph, mon ami," said the spirituel Visconte de * * * * to an English friend, "I see a paragraph in one of your papers, which I quote in the eye of grace." "Yes," said his English friend. "Well, mon ami, I do not know what it is, but I am told that when you sit designing a line in a muddy river all day are gone in the eyes of grace." "Ah, then, to be sure," said the Englishman.

L'Argent fait Peur is the title of a new Parisian piece. Seeing the name on a bill, Jones remarked, "Ain't there? Why I'll take it, of course, if it's in English I should be a-dropped!" "Who care?" said his friend Robinson.

SECESSION.

BY CŒAR.

What fun dis hard secession am,
For olderry nigger, Pompy!—Yes, Sar!
Massar summon'd de Union Sun
'Pon you and me sumcode from Massar.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

ADVANCE OF THE UNION ARMY.

THE Union army in front of Washington is now in possession of all the points lately occupied by the rebels—namely, Leesville, Bull Run, Fairfax Court-House, Taylor's, and Maxwell's hills, from which positions the enemy have retreated without showing fight. No rebels are visible within six miles of our front. The late heavy rains have rendered the roads impassable to fifteen days above a forbidden depth, thus rendering all movements of either army across the country impossible.

THE GRAND ARMY TO BE DIVIDED INTO CORPS D'ARMIE.

It is now understood that the army of the Potomac is to be at once divided into corps d'armée, each encamping from 30,000 to 40,000 men, the opposition has been made to this plan by the older Generals, but the counsels of M'Clellan, ultimately, will be prevailed.

AFFAIRS IN KENTUCKY.

The accounts of Buckner's strength are found to have been greatly exaggerated. He has not been so unfortunate as to be without arms and shoes, and but few of them are unarmed. Gallatin, on the northern border of the State, Tennessee by way of the Cumberland Gap, is known to have received a large force from Georgia—his original purpose probably being only the procurement of supplies in the section. He now numbers 15,000 men. On the other hand, the National forces are rapidly increasing, not only by the recruits now constantly arriving, but mainly by the re-enlistment of the Kentuckians themselves, who, seeing the necessity of the occasion, are now flocking to the National standard by thousands. An instance of the spirit which animates them may be found in a skirmish at Barbourville, in the mountains, which took place near Hillsborough, in Fleming County, ninety-one miles east of Louisville, a few days ago. A body of three hundred rebels were attacked by fifty Home Guards, and completely routed, leaving behind a number of Enfield rifles, sabres, pistols, and other articles of war.

RETURNED FROM THE FEDERAL ASSEMBLY.

The Louisville journals publish the documents referring to the retirement of General Anderson from the command of the Cumberland District, and to the appointment of General Sherman in his place. General Anderson deeply regrets that he is compelled to withdraw from the field, but feels health renders it necessary for him to do so, and the selection of Sherman is approved by his own recommendation, given his great satisfaction.

AFFAIRS IN MISSOURI.

General Fremont has advanced from Jefferson City toward Lexington. A scout has just arrived at Jefferson City, reporting that between Lexington and Independence there were only 1000 rebels at that place. He also learned that Hon. Hiram Walker, of Jackson County, with eight men, waiting for reinforcements from Arkansas. A large force of Kansas troops, under the command of Col. Jennison of William's creek, were with General Price at Lexington, and also with General Buckner. Ben M'Culloch expects to join General Price at Sac River about the 15th inst., when they will move from there on their march on Jefferson City. This information was credited at the Missouri capital.

AFFAIRS IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

The position of General Lowenstein in Western Virginia is ascertained to be at Gauley Bridge, twenty-five miles from Gouley, in a very strong position. He had recently advanced as far as Cotton Hill, but finding that he could subsequently fall back in order to draw out the rebels, who were strongly posted at Big Sewell, and induce them to give battle, but they declined the invitation. General Reynolds reports that Floyd's force is still encamped in front of the position, have been driven back as far as Greenbrier River, and have lost their horses and provisions. They had destroyed nearly all their camp equipage, and the rebels are living upon the stalks of our troops on the Huntersville Road upon their retreat.

ACTION ON SANTA ROSA ISLAND.

A New Orleans correspondent writes that a copy of the Natchez Daily Courier, which has by some means reached Baltimore, states that a battle has been fought on Santa Rosa Island, from several Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama regiments, stationed on the mainland, near Pensacola, and in Wilson's pickets, and shortly afterward engaged the enemy's regiment. The Secessionist is credited with having fought with great bravery, and the rebels admit a loss of forty killed and about double that number wounded. Indeed, the dispatch indirectly indicates that the rebels eventually got the worst of the fight, although they claim to have spiked the guns of the Zouaves, destroyed all their camp equipage, and committed great slaughter among them.

THE SOUTHERN BLOCKADE.

Dispatches from Fortress Monroe state that the whole line of coast, from Galveston to the Florida reefs, is in a perfect state of efficiency. The garrison at Fort Pickens is in a position to attack Pensacola and the adjoining forts of M'Rae and Barrancas.

CONDITION OF NEW ORLEANS.

The Government has secured a rendezvous on Ship Island, and one or two other points in the vicinity of the city, where troops can be easily landed, and where depots for provisions and ammunition can be securely placed; and besides the regular blockading force, there are at the entrances to the Mississippi River two United States sloops of war, a large propeller gun-boat, the steamer Water Witch, an armed schooner, and a gun-boat, all of which are ready for active operations. It is reported that the Government is erecting batteries on the sand spit which commands the mouth of the Mississippi.

NO COTTON TO BE TAKEN TO NEW ORLEANS.

The fear of a descent upon New Orleans, and the desire to keep cotton out of the hands of the Yankees, have induced Governor Moore, of Louisiana, to issue a proclamation prohibiting the landing of any of the staple at that city after the 15th inst. He gives notice that, after that date, no cotton must be brought within the liner embracing that section of the State between the fortifications above Carrollton and those below the city, and extending back to Lake Pontchartrain. All cotton found, or other water-craft, arriving within the prescribed limits, will be seized by an armed force from the point indicated, whether the quantity of cotton carried by them be large or small; and summary steps will be taken to prevent a violation of the rule by the rebellion.

WHAT THE REBELS WANT.

The Richmond Examiner, on organ of the Rebel Government, says:

"Southern independence is already achieved; but the war can not be closed until we shall have recovered the Southern territory which was lately conquered to be the invader by Southern traitors. Until we shall have planted our standard upon the Potomac, and on the Ohio, the war must go on. Had this territory not been basely relinquished, the war would have ceased long since. All the lies, and treasure, and sickness, and suffering, which we shall henceforth cost our country, will be the property of the base men who betrayed their native soil, their homes, and their children, to the invader.

"It is idle to think of peace until we shall have reconquered the country which we held lying south of the boundary we have defined. Geographically, politically, and strategically, Kentucky is a part of the south, which can not afford to surrender to Northern control and jurisdiction. We can not afford to have imaginary lines and lines with the Yankees. The line of Kentucky and Tennessee is the mountain line to which the Confederate States, and 250,000 cartridges; 6000 pairs of shoes; 10,000 blankets; and 1,000,000 percussion caps; a large quantity of morphine, opiates, and other medical stores. The value of the whole is $1,000,000. The vessel is now lying out as a prize, to prey on the returning California steamers. It is said that the Government will take charge of her; also that two more iron-clad steam frigates are expected at Savannah from England by the 15th of the present month.

THE INDIAN FOR THE UNION.

Later intelligence from the Cherokee Nation contradicts the former statement relative to John Ross, who with 5000 Indians had gone over to the rebels. He, in short, has not taken place already between the revolted Indians and Ross's party.

CANNONADING AT CHARLESTON.

The Charleston Mercury of the 25th ult. says, that, late on the evening of the 24th, the Confederate forces on Sullivan's Island having ventured nearer than usual to the harbor, the interior of which is commanded by the guns of Fort Sumter, replied with spirit, but the distance being very great, the shots seem scarcely to reach the steamer and vessels named.

RETURN OF THE LAST POLAR EXPEDITION.

A dispatch from Halifax announces the arrival there of the Polar Expedition under Dr. Hayes, for which the United States sent two years ago. Two of the party have died during the absence of the vessel in search of it. The expedition spent last winter at Port Foulke, near Alexander, and proceeded thence on the last summer with dogs and sledges as high as lat. 81° 35'.

ACTIVITY OF COMMERCE AT THIS PORT.

From September 1st to 9th last there have been 229 sail of vessels arrived from foreign ports at this port. During the same time 230 sailed for the same places, also for foreign ports, of which 22 were for Liverpool, 11 for London, and 8 for Havre. There are now 35 sail up and loading for the port of Havre alone—all of which are loading breadstuffs.

THE SUTLER COMPETITION.

A Washington correspondent writes: "Secretary Cameron is taxing every nerve to relieve himself entirely of being a heavy owner in the Northern Central, to be charged with embezzling at the expense of the Civil road. Although the charge is unjust, he is anxious to avoid the semblance of any thing wrong or selfish, and will, it is said, insist upon the sale of his interest in the road at the earliest practicable moment for government purposes. The sutlers of the 3d Western Virginia, and of the Cameron gorge of the great West can come here by the way of Wheeling and Harrisburg, and thence to Baltimore. Every thing is obliged to pass over the Northern Central road, and such is the competition for the transportation of stores of goods, that not unfrequently a hundred dollars is paid for an ordinary freight car. So favored are they by the company, but to a shipper whose name stands first on the books."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE INTERVENTION IN MEXICO.

The London Times having announced that the three allied Powers contemplated an invasion of the soil of Mexico, the Government organ, the London Post, contradicts the statement, and reports the resolution that a grand armed demonstration will induce the republic, and the execution of the customs revenues to payment of the debts, and a full indemnity to England, France, and Spain. The treaty was not signed at the latest moment, and the Paris Pays says that the allies have resolved to adopt the closing on. A French war-ship had been, however, ordered from Brest to the Gulf of Mexico. The London Post says that President Lincoln approves of the intended demonstration.

ITALY.

AFFAIRS IN ITALY.

From Italy we acquire the news here regarding the precipitous condition of the Pope's health. At Bologna turbulent demonstrations are made, and the people refuse to pay taxes or provisions. Several arrests had been made, and private money measures had been proposed. In a circular, addressed by Count Ricasoli to the Italian Consular Agents, he states that the national flag of Italy covers 800,000 tons of shipping, manned by 60,000 sailors.

CHINA.

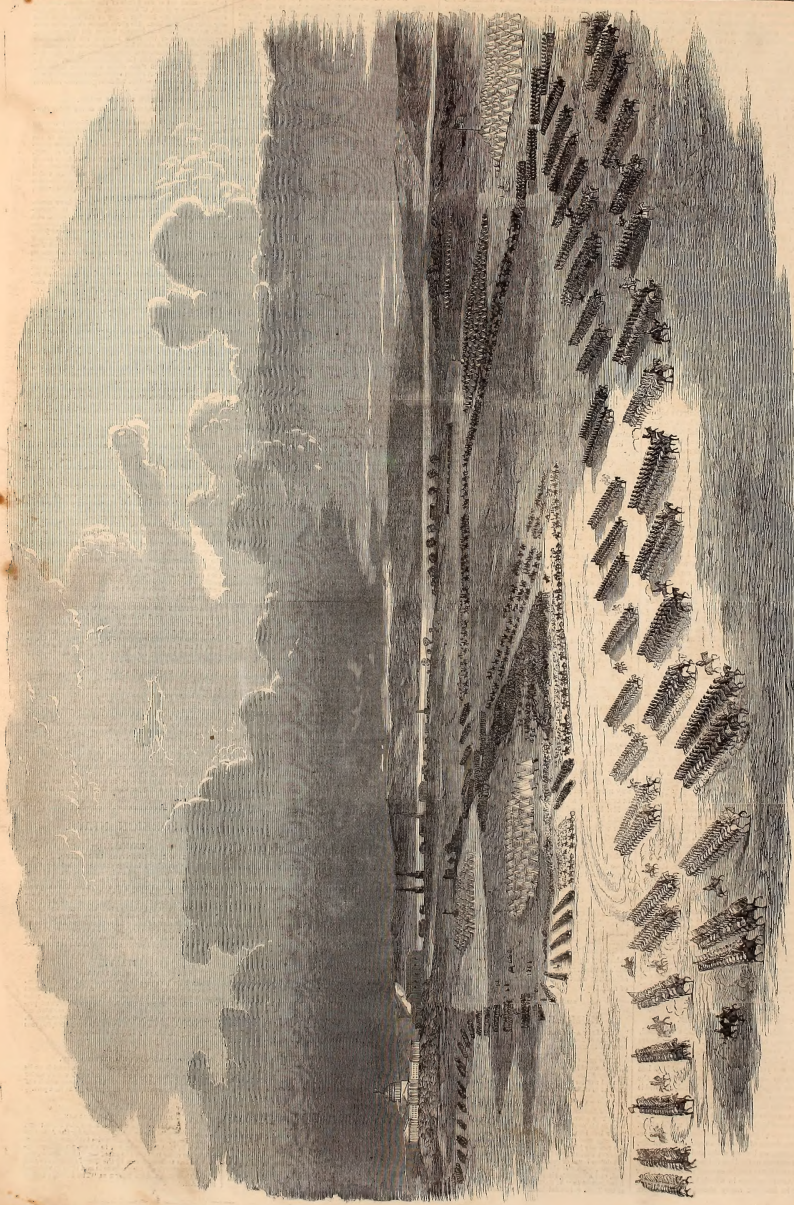
OUR SQUADRON COMING HOME.

The United States squadron on the China coast is on its way home. The steamer-of-war Powhatan, from Pekin, had gone to Shanghai to overhaul a schooner which was fitting out, it was said, as a rebel privateer in that port.

CANADA.

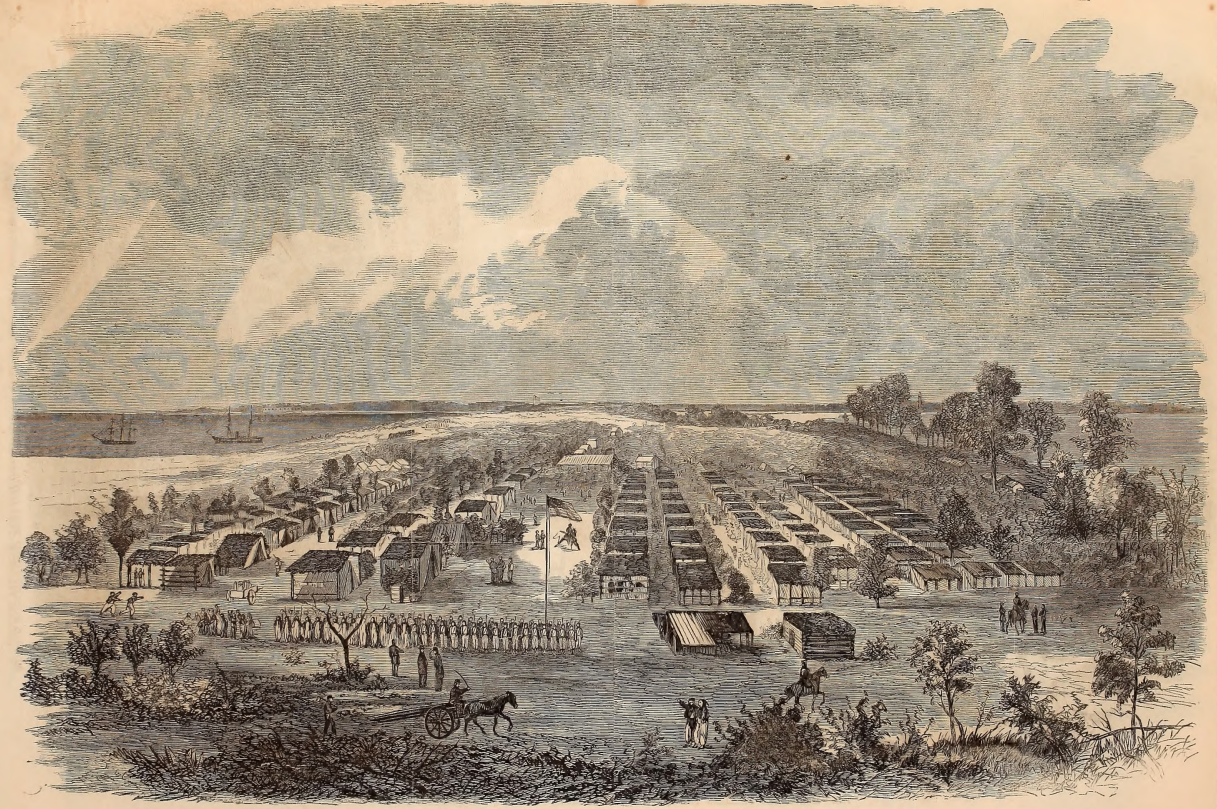
ARREST OF COLONEL RANKIN.

Colonel Rankin, member of the Provincial Parliament, has been arrested for enlisting recruits for the American army. The offense urged against him in the complainant's affidavit is, that he has agreed to accept a military commission to enter into the service of the United States, and that he has induced divers of the Queen's liegey to enlist in the same service. This offense is said to be in violation of the Canadian statute known as "The Foreign Enlistment Act."

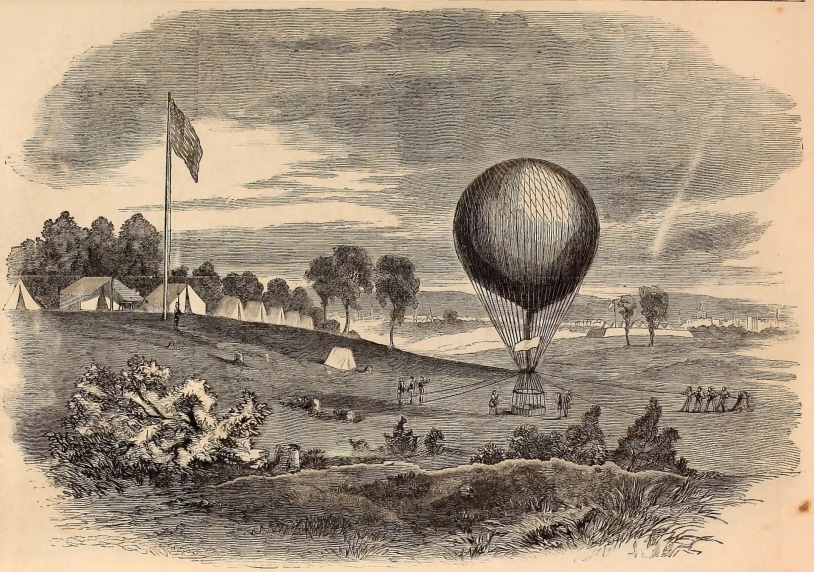


GRAND CAVALRY AND ARTILLERY REVIEW AT WASHINGTON, OCTOBER 8, 1861.—SECURED BY AN OCCASIONAL CONTRIBUTOR.—[SEE PAGE 667.]

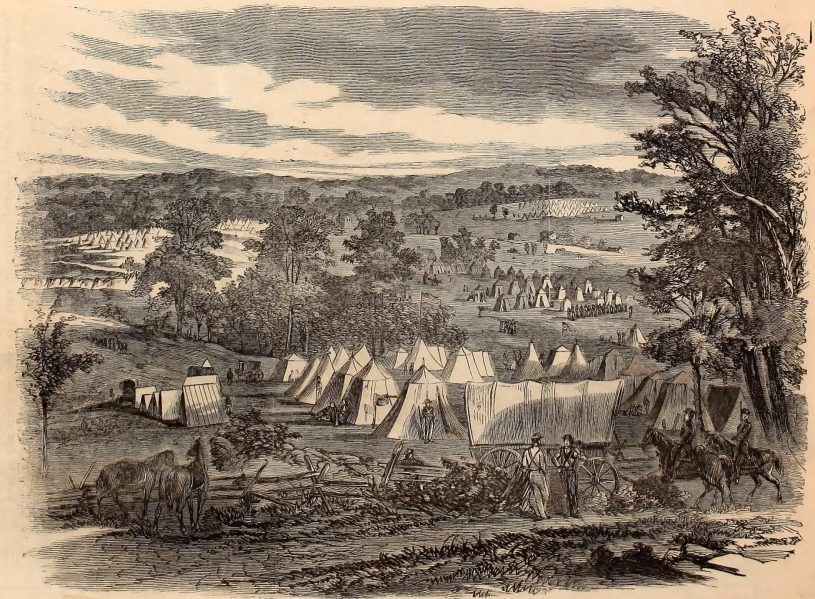
THE "MONTICELLO" SHELLING THE REBELS NEAR HATTERAS, OCTOBER 5, 1861.—[SEE PAGE 676.]



CAMP OF THE SIXTH REGIMENT NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS (WILSON'S ZOUAVES), ON SANTA ROSA ISLAND, FLORIDA, FORT PICKENS IN THE DISTANCE.—SKETCHED BY CHARLES F. ALLGOUER.—[SEE PAGE 687.]



THE WAR BALLOON AT GENERAL M'DOWELL'S HEAD-QUARTERS PREPARING FOR A RECONNOISSANCE.—Sketched by Ed. Pietsch.—[See Page 687.]



GENERAL FREMONT'S CAMP NEAR JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI.—Sketched by Alexander Simplot.—[See Page 687.]

Chippewa. Sciota. Huron. Ottawa.

OUR NEW

Nashville. Alabama. Quaker City. St. Jago de Cuba. Mount Vernon. South Carolina. Florida. Massachusetts.

MERCHANT STEAMERS CON

Seneca. Unadilla Sagamore. Tioga.

BOATS.

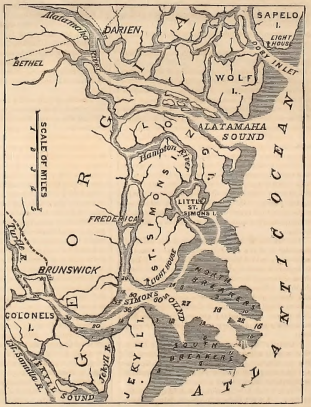
Augusta. James Adger. Monticello. Bienville. R. R. Cuyler.

TED INTO GUN-BOATS.

CHARLESTON AND BEAUFORT, SOUTH CAROLINA.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA.

MOBILE, ALABAMA.



BRUNSWICK, GEORGIA.

WILMINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA.

SOUTHERN HARBORS.

As it is well known that the United States Government is fitting out expeditions for the attack of one or more Southern ports, we publish herewith Charts of the harbors of WILMINGTON, N. Carolina, CHARLESTON, South Carolina, SAVANNAH and BRUNSWICK, Georgia, FERNANDINA, Florida, MOBILE, Alabama, and NEW ORLEANS, Louisiana. Of the only remaining harbor of any consequence in the Gulf States—Pensacola—we have published several charts during the past few months. The harbor of Beaufort, South Carolina, is shown on the chart of the harbor of Charleston.

Speculation is rife as to which of these harbors will be first attacked, but nothing positive is known on the subject. BEAUFORT, S. C., BRUNSWICK, Georgia, and PENSACOLA, Florida, are the only three harbors which large ships can enter. Beaufort was for a long time the rival of Charleston, and was only superseded by its more northern rival because before railroads existed the confluence of the Ashley and Cooper rivers gave Charleston a paramount advantage in regard to communication with the interior. Brunswick, Georgia, has an excellent harbor. Some years since it was proposed to establish a naval depôt there, and by constructing a railroad to build up a new cotton port. A landing there would develop the Union sentiment of Georgia. Of the advantages and the difficulties of landings at Savannah, Charleston, Mobile, and New Orleans, it is unnecessary to say anything. There is not water at any of these ports to float a ship like the Vanderbilt or the Great Republic. In fine weather, perhaps, these vessels might discharge their cargo of men, horses, cannon, and munitions of war, by the aid of small steamers and lighters, but in stormy weather, such as usually prevails at this season, the operation would be one of great hazard. It has been suggested that an expedition might be landed on the island which closes the mouth of Mobile Bay, or on the points now occupied by our troops at the delta of the Mississippi. These conjectures, however, are entitled to but little weight. But one thing is certain. The United States Government is going to cease to act exclusively on the defensive against the rebels who have attempted to destroy the freest and best government on earth. They are now going to feel the weight of its heavy hand in punishment where they are least prepared to resist it, and an example is going to be made which will be a warning to traitors forever hereafter.

SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

FERNANDINA, FLORIDA.

LOU AND THE LIEUTENANT.

"Lou! Lou! Louisiana!" down the wall, and over the trappings, and round the mounted cannon the words went calling.

"Lou! Louise! Louisiana!" amidst twenty laughing treble, and tramping feet, and busy bugle-notes.

Again and again he called, hunting this way and that all the time; but to neither of the three variations upon the name came there any response. Presently the laughing face grew grave, then anxious, and earnestly now he only called, in quick tones, "Louise!"

"It is very odd—very odd! She was here but a moment since. Can she have lost herself in the galleries?"

An officer came down the parade toward them, touching his hat to the ladies of the group as he approached them.

"A child lost?" he queried.

The gentleman of the party—him who had called "Louise!"—stepped forward. "My sister, Sir," was all his explanation. "She was with us a moment since."

"Oh, very likely she strayed off into one of the galleries, and has become bewildered with the various turns in the darkness. Don't give yourselves any uneasiness, I will soon find her for you;" and he passed on under the arch—meeting a brother officer, who says, "Any thing wrong?"

"No; only a child strayed off."

Just here, as the brother was about to follow in the search, one of the ladies took it into her head to faint, and so his hands were full, and Lieutenant Glenn was left to do the drill day at the Fort—no matter what for; only bear in mind that it was just a year from this year—in 1860.

While Lieutenant Carrington's brother, then, was attending to Mademoiselle Lemare, and fretting inwardly at the detention, Lieutenant Glenn was pursuing his way in those dark passages known as covered ways. As he went on, he called at intervals, "Louise! Louise!" as he had heard young Carrington call before; and he seemed to meet with little better success—no Louise responded to his call.

"I wish people would take better care of their children when they bring them here," he muttered, still going on, and still at intervals calling, "Louise!" At last he began to get a little anxious, and to say, "It is very odd—very odd!" and he wondered she didn't scream and cry: "Children usually do under such circumstances." Still he went on, more carefully now, calling, "Louise!" He had nearly given it up, when a faint sob—my! it thrilled through the young hero's bosom—smote his ear. He stopped, and sent his voice out again, softly, clearly, "Louise?" Then from afar responded, in broken tones, "Charlie! Charlie!" He groped in toward the voice, answering, "Here I am: don't move from where you are; I will come to you."

Very soon just the faintest gleam of a figure was perceptible in the gloom. In another moment a little thing was trying to limp, a soft face all wet with tears lying against his hand, and a soft voice, broken with faint gasps, crying, "Oh, Charlie, Charlie! I was so frightened!"

"It's no use to tell her it isn't Charlie," he thought, "for she is nervous enough now;" so he said, comfortingly, "Well, never mind, dear; it is all over now, and you are safe."

Yes, I know, but oh—oh—it was so dreadful, Charlie!—I—I couldn't scream when I found I had lost my way, and I thought—" But the recaction was too much. What she thought he never knew, for tears fell like rain, and the voice became hysterical gasps. "Poor little child!" he murmured, bending tenderly over her, smoothing away the hair and tangles, with a "There, there!" until she became more composed. Then, with his arm about her, all quivering and faint with her fright, he led her on.

They came toward an opening, and he looked down in the revealing light. The vision that met his eyes made him start with amaze, with embarrassment, and consternation.

He had got himself into a pretty scrape. This was no child at all, but a woman, young to be sure, and a very elfin sprite in shape and size. In that moment horrible visions of feminine wrath and misrepresentation, and he cashiered flashed upon him. And at the climax he uttered an exclamation. Whereat the sprite looked up, and meeting the amaze, the astonishment, the consternation, all looking out of the strange face, which wasn't Charlie's, she started back, herself uttered an exclamation, and then asked half a dozen questions at once, no one of which could be answer relevantly. She was far too frank and innocent to misrepresent him as he thought, and altogether too absorbed in her present risk and relief to feel embarrassed yet. She gathered enough of the circumstances, too, to comprehend that he came for Charlie; but where was Charlie? And failing to answer clearly, she shook him impatiently, in a little excitement of pique, and then shook him with her love for wee white hands reaching up to the great strong arm. Over her face fell the curl tangles, and she was tossing her head and stamping a little foot, half crying still, just like a baby girl.

"Say, where is Charlie?"

At this tone Charlie he got his courage and self-possession back again; and so satisfied her where Charlie was, and very succinctly rendered an account of the way he came in the matter. A long-drawn sigh "Oh!" was her only response, and with the wee white hand still clinging to his coat sleeve, much as a child will cling to the skirt of a garment, she hurried him on. Her entire preoccupation relieved him greatly; he was not vain enough to feel disappointed by it.

As they came out into clearer light he regarded her more scrutinizingly, and with perfect ease, for she never so much as gave him a look. A little blonde beauty clearly. Brown-gold hair, blue, blue eyes, and red roses. Her little odd ways charmed him—her little cloe, frightened clutch upon his sleeve, so unfearing and simple, charmed him still more.

And thus led by this tiny Omphale, our military Hercules came out upon the waiting group upon the parade—Charlie and the rest.

Mademoiselle Lemare had just seen fit to recover, so "Charlie" was at liberty to come forward and meet "my sister," to ask a dozen questions, and to thank Lieutenant Glenn for his "trouble"(?), during which time he was brushing cobwebs, and dust, and mould, from his clothes, and adjusting her plumed hat, and even wiping the tear-stained face with his handkerchief, half laughing as he did it. Louise herself giving the Lieutenant a little nod and a tired absent "Thank you," with her brother's.

Going out, the Lieutenant accompanied the brother, while the sister, just ahead, chattered in French to Mademoiselle Lemare of "that horrid place."

She shuddered with a shrug of her shoulders as they passed the officers' quarters, and ejaculated vehemently, "Oh, Marie, I wouldn't live here for any thing! How can girls marry these officers! Bah!"—and another little shrug—"I never could see so much romance in a pair of epaulettes!"

Lieutenant Glenn heard every word she said, and half laughed, half sighed. It was a dreary place, he knew. At the gateway they parted, the gentlemen exchanging cards and shaking hands. But Louise was in such a hurry to be away from "that horrid place," that she was half-way down the road at this parting.

In returning to his quarters a subordinate met him, touching his cap respectfully, and tendering a bunch of blue ribbons and a tiny glove smelling of violets. He took them, glanced over the wall: the carriage was far down the road, and a cloud of dust—too late to restore her property: he would take them in charge and give them to her brother. He took them "in charge" by stowing them away in his breast pocket—and in mere pocket-and by forgetting (?) all about restoring them when her brother dined with him three days after. Those days he after that he found and the brother at their host.

Sitting in their parlor waiting, he heard—and it sounded very funny now—the same voice calling, "Lou, Louie, Louisiana!" At this time there came a response, a tender treble filled with merry wonder—

"I shall never come while you call me such names, Charlie!"

Presently, without the rustle of a warning, there appears a vision all in waving ribbons—blue ribbons—and breathing violet odors. She drops a little "courtesy" to Lieutenant Glenn, standing half-way down the room from the door, then comes forward and settles her myriad skirts of white muslin into a low large chair just opposite him.

So more the jealous pettiness of the child, the queer but delightfully simple preoccupation, but a young woman: easy grace of manner; not fervid and florid with the Southern fervor, but natural and refined, tempered with a certain fresh coolness, which did not amount to coldness, but which none the less deer little impression upon the keen herself and any other. He wondered if she would ever remember that interview under the ground, and in consequence get conscious and mortified. She gave no sign.

He had come to invite them to a dress drill, or something of the sort: it was to take place the next day; would they do him the honor? Young Carrington looked at his sister; but that young person shrugged her delicate expressive head, and declined. Lieutenant Glenn would excuse her, she knew, and not think her ungracious. She was very silly, to be sure, but she was a child next to her now. She might get over it in time, but somehow she had a very nervous notion in regard to it.

"Charlie" tried laughing her out of it; told her that was all nonsense, she would get all over it if she went again. But the young Lieutenant Glenn stopped him by saying, with uncommon sympathetic kindness for a man,

"Don't—don't be urging her to go, Mr. Carrington. I don't believe in people doing violence, one way or another."

He was certainly repaid, though he little expected it, by the bright look—it was scarcely a smile—which lighted her face. How was he enchanted when, in the course of the same second of a little dream by coming close up to him, clasping both these wee, wee hands he remembered so vividly, and exclaiming in a pretty exultation—

"I know what we will do. They shall all go, Charlie and our cousins; and after, you will return with them here, and we will have a dozen quiet tête-à-tête fashion. Will that suit, Charlie?"

The young fellow nodded, declaring his pleasure; and at that she bent up into the guest's face, asking, "Will it suit you?"

He too declared his pleasure, inly wondering—He was it for Charlie, the bright plan, or to ease her rejection of his plan?

There was no telling. A little slim sprite, full of strange surprises, was Louise Carrington.

The next night he came to tea—such tea as he had never drank, served out of tiny cups, thin as paper and glittering with fairy frost-work. But neither the infusion of delicate amber nor the fairy cups sent him home intoxicated: it was a subtler charm infused through his veins, more than sweet finger-tips dropped lumps of sugar into his cup—a charm that had held him close and fast from the day they first entered upon his arm in that "beloved darkness!"

All the next day, and the next, and the next he went round humming

"A bunch of blue ribbons to tie up her bonnie brown hair."

And deep down in a deep drawer there they lay—the bunch of blue ribbons that had tied her bonnie brown hair in that "beloved darkness"—the bunch of blue ribbons he was perpetually forgetting to return.(?) And by the ribbons a little glove, violet colored and odored.

Not a week after this they bade each other "good-by." He regretfully, and with the regret shining clear out of clear hazel eyes; she simply, politely, that was all—all at least apparent.

Holding her hand a moment longer than he needed to have done, he said, "I hope your adventure, or misadventure, at the fort that day will not make the whole place so distasteful to you that you will never come again."

"Oh no;" she should in all probability come again next year. It was Charlie's favorite resort, and she always went where Charlie went.

"Next year!" We all know what happened then—the year of our Lord 1861.

What is happening now every day—"war, war, and the rumors of war." It happened, too, that Louise Carrington and her brother were at the same place, just as they had been the August before. And here Lieutenant Glenn paid his respects to them.

This year that had produced such changes in the country had produced little change with them. The blonde beauty was a beauty still, after a whirl of winter dissipation in the shape of parties and opera goings. Charlie too, who had been "servant" since the April day, went on laughing and jesting with life; and Lieutenant Glenn, grave and in earnest always, was as much in earnest now over that "bunch of blue ribbons." Charlie, who had been "serving" as volunteer faithfully and well, was now promoted to the regular service, and was at present stationed somewhere under Glenn's First. This brought the three much more together than before, though even yet Louise could not decide "that horrid place" having all this power, or after all this time, Glenn was no nearer his object than a year since. He was not a man to woo and to win, and Miss Carrington was not a girl to be won without wooing. Affairs, then, in this direction looked rather unpromising for our military hero, and from day—over those fabulous "one days" which do sometimes act as pretty changes in the drama of life, as in the story-tellers sense—the train of circumstances wrought the wonder for which he hoped.

Charlie stood at the foot of the stairs calling of "Louisiana! Louisiana!"

Louise stood at the mid-time mediating vengeance on this calling of names, responded not.

"Louisiana! Louisiana!" he kept on. At last opening the door at—at mid-time appeared a vision "trailing clouds of splendor" in the skirt of a bright silk dressing-gown, and leaning over the railings exclaimed, now really wrathfully, and in earnest,

"Charlie, you ought to be ashamed of yourself calling me by such names, for the very reason that the writer had during that time been in Virginia with her Southern relatives. Opening this unexpected letter she found it to contain the outpourings of girlish gossip—"that delightful ball," and "that charming Mr. S. and M."—the whole new fashions of the season, and the state of the country, principally, it seemed, for the falling off of these dear follies. But woven up with all this was an idea of intelligence that startled her—a such vital importance to the country that the reader thrilled as she perused it. It was like a torch of flame in the hand of the breathless writer, in her careless gayety, little thought what it meant. Louise Carrington, deeper souled and better trained, read its importance. And now what to do with it. She started up, but Charlie had gone! Then she must go after him! She left there was no time to lose. Binding up the "bonnie brown hair" with a bunch of blue ribbons, disgularly enough, she dressed herself as speedily as possible, and, in her excitement, never thought of the possibility of Charlie's not being at the fort. He not only was not there, but was on some sort of military service that would detain him away from the place, as well as the fort, for several days.

"I must see Lieutenant Glenn, then," she said. Lieutenant Glenn also was not there, but expected back within the hour. She tore a scrap from an unwritten portion of the letter, penciled this brief message:

"Come to the —— House, if possible, before night. I wish to see you.

"LOUISE CARRINGTON."

And gave it in charge of the sentry in waiting, to be delivered immediately on Lieutenant Glenn's return.

Arrived at home she read "the letter," finding still more importance in it than at first.

One, two, three, four hours passed, and night was fast approaching without bringing her the desired visitor. Twilight passed, and the hours went by until nine o'clock came. She was by this time in a HOT impatience: he would not come now, she was sure, for unfortunately she had specified before night; and besides, it was raining heavily. A little knot in Virginia Glenn.

Standing by her parlor-window, trailing a little finger down the moist window pane, while she looked out upon the stormy night; perhaps, too, saying over a child's incantation:

"Rain, rain, stay away; Come again another day!"

for she looked not unmeet for such pretty play, a low, hasty knock fell upon her ear. She flew to the door.

"Oh, I am so glad—so glad! I was afraid you were not coming!" and she drew him into the room with just that close clasp upon his arm he had never forgotten. He had left his outer cloak in the hall, but his hair was dripping rain, and his face was cold.

"How did he ever get so wet?" she asked.

He could procure no carriage, and so—

"You walked in all this rain!" she exclaimed, horrified. "How good!" and the little hand went stroking down his arm. He thought he could have walked twice as far for such pretty payment as this touch and tone.

She roused him by coming to the subject of the letter, forming down the mere personalities, which contained nothing of importance, to the give it into his hands. As he scanned it his brow seemed into deep wrinkles. At length, looking up, "Will you give me this?" he asked.

"If it will be of service, certainly."

Rising immediately with soldierly alertness, he simply said, "Good-night," and left her without another word.

Mademoiselle Lemare got a score of her fair friends would have been highly incensed at this insensible, ungallant behavior. How did Mademoiselle Louise take it? She gazed upon the door with wide eyes a moment after he had thus departed, then whirled round upon her little high heels, laughing out a soft amused laugh, and saying aloud, "I like him!"

In his haste he had left his gloves behind him. She picked them up all crushed and wet as they were, and stroked them out, soliloquizing, "How soldierly that was, so direct and one-thoughted!" he looked very finely to-night; I like black hair." Then the wandering off to the piano she sang to a little drum-leat accompaniment,

"There's nothing like a soldier boy."

Then it is to be presumed she wandered away to bed, for it was high time after racing about half the day in search of these same soldier boys. And I have no doubt she dreamed of red sashes and gold epaulets all night.

Just after breakfast the next morning a me, says one was at the door a card. "Lieutenant Glenn." Would she see him a few moments?

He came in half deprecatingly, stood a second before her at parade rest, and then said:

"I believe I treated you very rudely last night, and I have come to offer my apologies, and to tell you—"

"No, don't; I don't want any apologies; I liked it a great deal better so."

He half smiled, looking a little mystified over this.

"I was not only rude," he went on, "but unkind, in withholding you, without a word of thanks for your great service; but I was so intent upon communicating upon the matter with General ——— that I actually forgot every thing else."

"I understood it," she made answer, "and as I said, I like it better so. I get so tired of men that always think of every thing, and I liked your way a great deal better," she finished, laughing a little, and blushing a good deal. He hesitated only a moment, then spoke out the thought of a year.

"I wish you would like me better than any other, as I do you, Miss Louise."

She caught her breath at this sudden avowal, so straightforward and direct, covered her face with her hands a moment, and said, softly, in her little odd child-way,

"I want to think! I want to think!"

Half-way down her little dimpled chin: God send it may be tenderly," he said, fervently.

A little space, and down came the hands—the wee, white hands—

"Arthur—" He lifted her up like thistle-down before she got any farther; she had never called him by his name before. "Arthur, I have liked you better than any body all along." She finished.

This while afterward, sitting there beside him, she asked, "Was the letter of so much service, then?"

"Invaluable, Louise;" and lifting her chin up in his broad palm, he went on: "Louise, to think such acute perceptions lurked in that little head! I wonder you could have passed over it at first over without seeing the significance of those items of information, and you, my little loveling, found it out. With such keen wisdom, I have to confess to say, do not mention this matter to any one else, not even to Charlie yet."

"I will not, General ——— was at the fort. It was drill day, and Louise was among the visitors. She was standing apart from others, when Lieutenant Glenn came up with the command. "This is Miss Carrington, General ———"

"The little girl who has the wisdom and discretion which many an officer might envy," was the General's gracious words, bowing over the wee white hand. And then, "I hear she is to belong to Lieutenant Glenn. I have already congratulated her lieutenant, let me congratulate her, for he is a good fellow, this lieutenant." They both laughed, then "Glenn" was taking off his hat for the compliment, and the little heroine giving the General a shy smile as she dropped her head in acknowledgment.

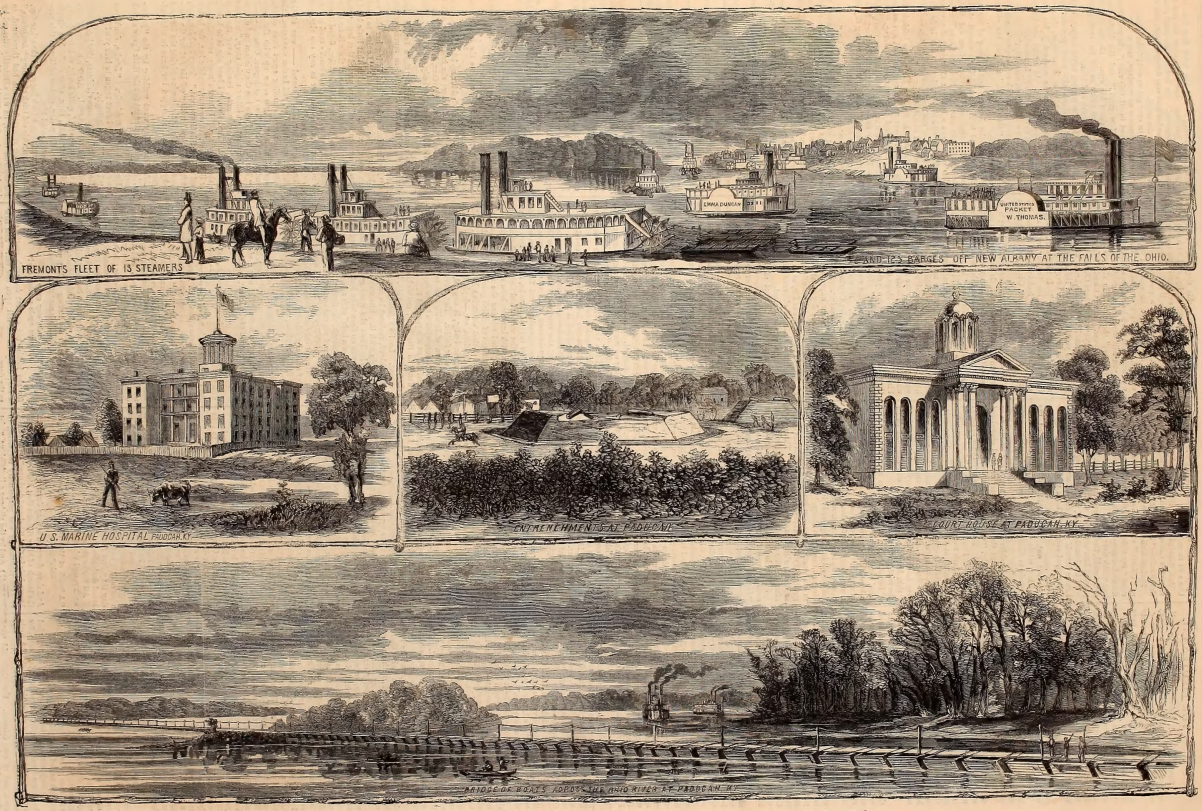
Afterward they went walking by the "galleries," and the Lieutenant felt the little figure shrink closer to him.

He bent down suddenly. "Louise, don't you know it was there I first began to love you?"

"There?" was wondering.

He recalled, with some vividness, that interview, and then she remembered. After a silence of several minutes she said, quite lowly, as if in a dream, "It is a dear dark, then, after all." The simple earnestness, the pretty, artless oddity in this confession, it enchanted him.

At her wedding, which happened the other day, Charlie began his old trick of calling "Louisiana," which being reported, as she had threatened, to his superior officer, he was effectually silenced by his brother-in-law's dubbing him immediately "Charleston."



THE WAR IN KENTUCKY—IN AND ABOUT PADUCAH.—Sketched by J. C. Beard and Bill Travis.—[See Page 685.]

GRAND SALOON OF THE "GREAT EASTERN" DURING THE GALE.—SKETCHED BY C. F. HAYWARD.—[SEE PAGE 674.]

OUR PADUCAH SKETCHES.

WE devote the previous page to illustrations of PADUCAH, KY., by Messrs. Beard and Travis. Mr. Beard writes, in explanation of his sketches:

The sketches I send are drawn on the spot from nature. The bridge at Paducah surpasses any thing of the kind ever before attempted in the United States. The river at the bridge is 2600 feet across. It is spanned by a hundred coal barges, strongly braced together, twelve feet apart, connected by trestle-work, and planked over; the planking is twenty feet wide. The bridge is constructed to carry the heaviest ordnance, at a point half a mile below the town. I also send you a sketch of Paducah, and the earthworks thrown up by our army on its outskirts. It is a beautiful little city, full of respectable and often elegant residences. It now wears, however, a deserted and melancholy appearance. Whole streets of tenantless buildings stretch from the landing to the intrenchments; and the few inhabitants who remain, although entirely unmolested and secure, look guilty and sullen. Some of our boys left the steamer Sunbury, and, wandering about the town, took possession of the deserted choir of a secesh church, and one of our number being a good organist, and most of us having assisted before on such occasions, we did our best to convince those within hearing that, although belonging to the "Northern rabble," we were not altogether heathen and benighted. Another of the sketches refers to the raising of the American colors in the little settlement of Alton, near Blue Creek, a characteristic sketch of the little river towns below Louisville. I must not forget to refer to the fleet of thirteen steamers, which, under Captain Phillips, brought down the material for the bridge, a rough sketch of which I obtained at New Albany.

Of the HOSPITAL, Mr. TRAVIS writes that it was built by the United States in 1850–51, at a cost of $50,000. Paducah is considered the most healthy place in the West, and hence the hospital has not had much business as yet. Dr. HAMILTON, Surgeon of the Ninth Illinois Regiment, mentioned to Mr. Travis that, on looking over the old books, he never found over sixteen patients reported on any one day. Paducah has been threatened by the rebels for some time, but has never been attacked, and probably never will be.

McCLELLAN.

So much thy Country loves thee, youthful Chief!
So wholly in thy Genius do we trust,
That all our hopes and fears on thee we thrust,
In one impulsive sweetness of belief.
So eagerly we drink the flattering tide,
Of all that thou art doing and hast done,
That on the wild wings of each Autumn gale
We list thy praises and beneath the sun
No man treads on this sacred soil to-day
Revered and loved as thou art. But we ask
A watch return for this great love: thy task
Is to reform thy Country! Hope and pray
And may the Great God, bending, smile on thine integrity!
He is our trust, and thou His chosen Instrument.
BLACKSTONE, MASSACHUSETTS, OCT., 1861.

DINING-ROOM OF THE "GREAT EASTERN" DURING THE GALE.—SKETCHED BY C. F. HAYWARD.—[SEE PAGE 674.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

A STRANGE STORY.

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proofs purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXX.

I CALLED that day on Mrs. Poyntz, and communicated to her the prospect of the glad news I had received.

She was still at work on the everlasting knitting, her firm fingers linking mesh into mesh as she listened to me. When I had done, she laid her skein deliberately down, and said, in her favorite characteristic formula,

"So at last—that is settled!"

She rose and paced the room as men are apt to do in reflection—women rarely need such movement to aid their thoughts—her eyes were fixed on the floor, and one hand was lightly pressed on the palm of the other, the gesture of a musing reasoner who is approaching the close of a difficult calculation.

At length she paused fronting me, and said, dryly,

"Accept my congratulations—life smiles on you now—guard that smile, and when we meet next may we be even firmer friends than we are now."

"When we meet next—that will be to-night—you surely go to the mayor's great ball the Hill succeeds to Low Tide—"

"No; we are oblig us affernoon—in less than hours—so shall be gone—a family engagement. We may be weeks away; you will excuse me, then, if I take leave of you so unceremoniously. Stay: a motherly word of caution. That friend of yours, Mr. Margrave! Moderate your intimacy with him, and especially after you are married. There is in that stranger, of whom so little is known, a something which I can not comprehend—a something that captivates, and yet revolts. I find him disturbing my thoughts, perplexing my conjectures, haunting my fancies—I, plain woman of the world! Lilian is imaginative: beware of her imagination, even when sure of her heart. Beware of Margrave. The sooner he quits L——, the better, believe me, for your peace of mind. Adieu. I must prepare for our journey."

"That woman," muttered I, on quitting her house, "seems to have some strange spite against my poor Lilian, ever seeking to rouse my own distrust of that exquisite nature which has just given me such proof of its truth. And yet—and yet—is that woman so wrong here? True! Margrave with his wild notions, his strange beauty!—true—true—he might dangerously encourage that turn for the mystic and visionary which distresses me in Lilian. Lilian should not know him. How induce him to leave L——? Ah—those experiments on which he asks my assistance! I might commence them when he comes again, and then invent some reason to send him for completer tests to the famous chemists of Paris or Berlin."

It is the night of the mayor's ball! The guests are assembling fast; county families twelve miles round have been invited, as well as the principal families of the town. All, before proceeding to the room set apart for the dance, move in procession through the museum—homage to science before pleasure!

The building was brilliantly lighted, and the effect was striking, perhaps because singular and grotesque. There, amidst stands of flowers and evergreens, lit up with colored lamps, were grouped the dead representatives of races all inferior—some deadly—to man. The fancy of the ladies had been permitted to decorate and arrange these types of the animal world. The tiger glared with glass eyes from amidst artificial reeds and herbage, as from his native jungle; the grizzly white bear peered from a mimic iceberg. There, in front, stood the sage elephant, facing a hideous hippopotamus; while an anaconda twined its long spire round the stem of some tropical tree in zinc. In glass cases, brought into full light by internal lamps, were dread specimens of the reptile race—scorpion and vampire, and cobra capella, with insects of gorgeous hues, not a few of them with venomed stings.

But the chief boast of the collection was in the varieties of the genus simiæ—baboons and apes, chimpanzees, with their human visage, mockeries of man, from the dwarf monkeys perched on boughs hooped from the arms of chandeliers, to the formidable orang-outang leaning on his huge club.

Every one expressed to the mayor delight, and to each other antipathy, for this unwonted and somewhat ghastly, though instructive addition to the revels of a ballroom.

Margrave, of course, was there, and seemingly quite at home, gliding from group to group of gayly-dressed ladies, and brilliant with a childish eagerness to play off the showman. These stuffed carcasses he appeared to animate into life by quick, short sentences of their habits when blood circled through their veins. Many of these grim fellow-creatures he declared he had seen, played, or fought with. He had something true or false to say about each. In his high spirits he contrived to make the tiger move, and imitated the lash of the terrible anaconda. All that he did had its grace, its charm; and the buzz of admiration and the flattering glances of ladies' eyes followed him wherever he moved.

However, there was a general feeling of relief when the mayor led the way from the museum into the ballroom. In provincial parties guests arrive pretty much within the same hour, and so few who had once paid their respects to the apes and serpents, the hippopotamus and the tiger, were disposed to repeat the visit, that long before eleven o'clock the collection was as free from the intrusion of human life as were the native haunts of its lifeless tenants.

I had gone my round through the rooms, and, little disposed to be social, had crept in to the retreat of a window-recess, and sat to think myself screened by its draperies—not that I was melancholy, far from it—for the letter I had received that morning from Lilian had raised my whole being into a sovereignty of happiness high beyond the reach of the young pleasure-hunters whose voices and laughter blended with that vulgar music.

To read her letter again I had stolen to my nook—and more than once had I raised its kiss it, I replaced it in my bosom. I looked through the parted curtain; the room was comparatively empty; but there, through the open folding-doors, I saw the gay crowd gathered round the dancers; and there again, at right angles, a vista along the refreshment-tables. Groups of the great elephant in the deserted museum.

Presently I heard, close beside me, my host's voice.

"Here's a cool corner, a pleasant sofa, you can have it all to yourself; what an honor to receive you under my roof! Lets no dog bark! You remember the quotation—Scott, I think. Where on earth is he? My dear Sir Philip, I am sure you would enjoy his conversation."

Sir Philip! Could it be Sir Philip Derval to whom the mayor was giving a flattering, yet scarcely propitiatory description of myself? Curiosity combined with a sense of propriety in not keeping myself an unsuspected listener: I emerged from the curtain, but silently, and reached the centre of the room before the mayor perceived me. He then came up to me eagerly, linked his arm in mine, and leading me to a gentleman seated on a sofa close by the window I had quitted, said:

"Doctor, I must present you to Sir Philip Derval, just returned to England, and not six hours in L——. If you would like to see the museum again, Sir Philip, the doctor, I'm sure, will accompany you."

"No, I thank you; it is painful to me at present to see, even under your roof, the collection which my poor dear friend, Dr. Lloyd, was so proudly beginning to form when I left these parts."

"Ay, Sir Philip—Dr. Lloyd was a worthy man in his way, but sadly duped in his latter years: took to mesmerism, only think. But our young doctor here showed him up, I can tell you."

Sir Philip, who had acknowledged my first introduction to his acquaintance by the quiet courtesy with which a well-bred man goes through a ceremony which custom enables him to endure with equal ease and indifference, now evinced by a slight change of manner how little the mayor's reference to my dispute with Dr. Lloyd advanced me in his good opinion. He turned away with a bow more formal than his first one, and said, calmly,

"I regret to hear that a man so simple-minded and so sensitive as Dr. Lloyd should have provoked an encounter in which I can well conceive him to have been worsted. With your leave, Mr. Mayor, I will look into your ballroom. I may perhaps find there some old acquaintances."

He walked toward the dancers, and the mayor, linking his arm in mine, followed close behind, saying, in his loud, hearty tones,

"Come along, you too, Dr. Fenwick, my girls are there; you have not spoken to them yet."

Sir Philip, who was then half-way across the room, turned round abruptly, and looking me full in the face, said,

"Fenwick, is your name Fenwick?—Allen Fenwick?"

"That is my name, Sir Philip."

"Then permit me to shake you by the hand; you are no stranger, and no mere acquaintance to me. Mr. Mayor, we will look into your ballroom later; do not let us keep you now from your other guests."

The mayor, not in the least offended by being thus summarily dismissed, smiled, walked on, and was soon lost among the crowd.

Sir Philip, still retaining my hand, reseated himself on the sofa, and I took my place by his side. The room was not deserted: now and then a straggler from the ball-room looked in for a moment, and then sauntered back to the central place of attraction.

"I am trying to guess," said I, "how my name should be known to you. Possibly you may, in some visit to the Lakes, have known my father?"

"No; I know none of your name but yourself—if indeed, as I doubt not, you are the Allen Fenwick to whom I owe no small obligation. You were a medical student at Edinburgh in the year * * *?"

"Yes."

"So! At that time there was also at Edinburgh a young man, named Richard Strahan. He lodged in a fourth flat in the old town."

"I remember him very well."

"And you remember also, that a fire broke out at night in the house in which he lodged; that when it was discovered there seemed no hope of saving him. The flames wrapped the lower part of the house; the staircase had given way. A boy, scarcely so old as himself, was the only human being in the crowd who dared to scale the ladder, that even then scarcely reached the windows from which the smoke rolled in volumes; that boy penetrated into the room—found the inmate almost insensible—rallied, supported, dragged him to the window—got him on the ladder—saved his life then—and his life later, by nursing with a woman's tenderness, through the fever caused by terror and excitement, the fellow-creature he had rescued by a man's daring. The name of that gallant student was Allen Fenwick, and Richard Strahan is my nearest living relation. Are we friends now?"

I answered confusedly. I had almost forgotten the circumstance referred to. Richard Strahan had not been one of my more intimate companions, and I had never seen nor heard of him since leaving college. I inquired what had become of him.

"He is at the Scotch bar," said Sir Philip, "and of course without practice. I understand that he has fair average abilities, but no application. If I am rightly informed he is, however, a thoroughly honorable, upright man, and of an affectionate and grateful disposition."

"I can answer for all you have said in his praise. He had the qualities you name too deeply rooted in youth to have lost them now."

Sir Philip remained for some moments in a musing silence. And I took advantage of that silence to examine him with more minute attention than I had done before, much as the first sight of him had struck me.

He was somewhat below the common height. So delicately formed that you might call him rather fragile than slight. But in his carriage and air there was remarkable dignity. His countenance was at direct variance with his figure. For as delicacy was the attribute of the last, so power was unmistakably the characteristic of the first. He looked full the age his steward had ascribed to him—about forty-eight; at a superficial glance, more; for his hair was prematurely white—not gray, but white as snow—soft, thick, rather long, and with a careless wave at the sides. But his eyebrows were still jet black, and his eyes, equally dark, were scarcely bright. His forehead was magnificent; lofty, and spacious, and with only one slight wrinkle between the brows. His complexion was sunburned, showing no sign of weak health. The outline of his lips was that which I have often remarked in men accustomed to great dangers, and contracting in such dangers the habit of self-reliance; firm and quiet, compressed without an effort. And the power of this very noble countenance was not intimidating, not aggressive; it was mild—it was benignant. A man oppressed by some formidable tyranny, and despairing to find a protector, would, on seeing that face, have said, "Here is one who can protect me, and who will!"

Sir Philip was the first to break the silence.

"I have so many relations scattered over England that fortunately not one of them can venture to calculate on my property if I die childless, therefore not one of them can feel himself injured when he shall read in the newspapers that Sir Philip Derval is married. But for Richard Strahan, at least, though I never saw him, I must do something before the newspapers make that announcement. His sister was very dear to me."

"Your neighbors, Sir Philip, will rejoice at your marriage, since, I presume, it may induce you to settle among them at Derval Court."

"At Derval Court! No! I shall not settle there." Again he paused a moment or so, and then went on. "I have long lived a wandering life, and in it learned much that the wisdom of cities can not teach. I return to my native land with a profound conviction that the happiest life is the life most in common with all. I have gone out of my way to do what I deemed good, and to avert or mitigate what appeared to me evil. I pause now and ask myself, whether the most virtuous existence be not that in which virtue flows spontaneously from the springs of quiet, every-day action; when a man does good without restlessly seeking it, does good unconsciously, simply because he is good and he lives? Better, perhaps, for me if I had thought so long ago! And now I come back to England with the intention of marrying, late in life though it be, and with such hopes of happiness in such a matter-of-fact man fern. But my home will not be at Derval Court. I shall reside either in London or its immediate neighborhood, and seek to gather round me minds by which I can correct—I fear I must not add, to which I can confide—the knowledge I myself have acquired."

"Nay, if, as I have accidentally heard, you are fond of scientific pursuits, I can not wonder that, after so long an absence from England, you should feel interest in learning what new discoveries have been made, what new ideas are budding the germs of discovery. But I beg pardon me if, in answer to your concluding remark, I venture to say that no man can hope to correct any error in his own knowledge unless he has the courage to confide the error to those who can correct. La Place has said, 'Tout a fini dans la chaine tenuese des vérités;' and the mistake we make in some science we have specially cultivated is often only to be seen by the light of a separate science as specially cultivated by another. Thus, in the investigation of truth, frank exposition to congenial minds is essential to the earnest seeker."

"I am pleased with what you say," said Sir Philip, "and I shall be still more pleased to find in you the very confidant I require. But what was your controversy with my dear friend, Dr. Lloyd? Do I understand our host rightly, that it related to what in Europe has of late days obtained the name of mesmerism?"

"RESTING ONE HAND ON MY SHOULDER, HE POINTED WITH THE OTHER TOWARD THE THRESHOLD OF THE BALL-ROOM."

I had conceived a strong desire to conciliate the good opinion of a man who had treated me with so singular and so familiar a kindness, and it was sincerely that I expressed my regret at the acerbity with which I had assailed Dr. Lloyd; but of his theories and pretensions I could not disguise my contempt. I enlarged on the extravagant fallacies involved in a fabulous "clairvoyance," which always failed when put to plain test by sober-minded examiners. I did not deny the effects of imagination on certain nervous constitutions. "Mesmerism could cure nobody"—credulity could cure many. There was the well known story of the old woman tried as a witch; she cured agues by a charm; she owned the impeachment, and was ready to endure gibbet or stake for the truth of her talisman—more than a mesmerist would for the truth of his passes! And the charm was a scrap of gibberish sewn in an old bag and given to the woman in a fever by the judge himself when a young scamp on the circuit. But the charm cured? Certainly; just as mesmerism cures. Fools believed in it. Faith, that moves mountains, may well cure agues."

Thus I ran on, supporting my views with anecdotes and facts, to which Sir Philip listened with placid gravity.

When I had come to an end, he said, "Of mesmerism, as practiced in Europe, I know nothing, except by report. I can well understand that medical men may hesitate to admit it among the legitimate resources of orthodox pathology; because, as I gather from what you and others say of its operation, it must, at the best, be far too uncertain in its application to satisfy the requirements of science. Yet an examination of its pretensions may enable you to perceive the truth that lies hid in the powers ascribed to witchcraft: benevolence is but a weak agency compared to the energy of magnetism perverted to evil may solve half the riddles of sorcery. On this, however, I say no more at present. But as to that to which you appear to reject as the most preposterous and incredible pretension of the mesmerists, and which you designate by the word clairvoyance, I is clear to me that you have never yourself witnessed even those very imperfect exhibitions which you decide at once to be impossible. A very imperfect, because it is only a limited number of persons whom the eye or the passes of the mesmerist can affect, and by such means, usually by other means, it is rarely indeed that the magnetic sleep advances beyond the first vague, shadowy twilight dawn of that condition to which only in its fuller developments I would apply the name of 'trance.' But still trance is as essential a condition of being as sleep or waking. Both have privileges peculiar to itself. By means within the range of the science that explores its nature and its laws, trance, unlike clairvoyance, as you describe it, is producible in every human being, however unimpressible to mere mesmerism."

"Producible in every human being! Pardon me if I say that I will give any enchanter his own terms who will produce that effect upon me."

"Will you? You consent to have the experiment tried on yourself?"

"Consent most readily."

"I will remember that promise. But to return to the subject. By the word trance I do not mean exclusively the spiritual trance of the Alexandrian Platonists. There is one kind of trance—that to which all human beings are susceptible—which the mind has no share in, and of this kind of trance, and was of this I spoke, some of the inferior animals are susceptible; and, therefore, trance is no more a proof of soul than is the distance of the mesmerist, or the dream of our ordinary sleep, which last has been called a proof of soul, though any man who has kept a dog must have observed that dogs dream as vividly as we do. But in this trance there is an extraordinary cerebral activity—a projectile force given to the mind—distinct from the soul—by which it sends forth its own emanations to a distance in spite of material obstacles, just as a flower, in an altered condition of atmosphere, sends forth the particles of its aroma. This should not surprise you. Your thought travels over land and sea in your waking state; thought, too, can travel in trance, and in trance may acquire an intensified force. There is, however, another kind of trance which is truly called spiritual, a trance much more rare, and in which the soul entirely supersedes the mere action of the mind."

"Stay," said I, "you speak of the soul as something distinct from the mind. What the soul may be I am not pretend to conjecture. But I can not separate it from the intelligence!"

"Can you not! A blow on the brain can destroy the intelligence; do you think it can destroy the soul? It is recorded of Newton, that, in the decline of his life, his mind had so worn out its fleshly tenement that his own friends had become to him unintelligible. Can you suppose that Newton's soul was as worn out as his mind? If your soul not distinguish mind from soul, I know not by what rational inductions you arrive at the conclusion that the soul is imperishable."

I remained silent. Sir Philip fixed on me his dark eyes quietly and searchingly, and after a short pause said,

"Almost every known body in nature is susceptible of three several states of existence—the solid, the liquid, the aeriform. These conditions depend on the quantity of heat they contain. The same object at one moment may be liquid, at the next moment solid, as the next aeriform. The water that flows before your gaze may stop consolidated into ice, or ascend into air as vapor. Thus is man also susceptible of three states of existence—the animal, the mental, the spiritual—and according as he is brought into relation or affinity with that coeule agency of the whole natural world, which we familiarly call HEAT, and which no science has yet explained; which no scale can weigh, and no eye discern; one or the other of these three states of being prevails or is subjected."

I still continued silent, for I was unwilling discourteously to say to a stranger, so much older than myself, that he seemed to me to reverse all the maxims of the philosophy to-which he made pretence, in founding speculations ingenious and abstruse upon metaphorical comparisons that would have been fantastic even in a poet. And Sir Philip, after another pause, resumed with a half smile—

"After what I have said, it will perhaps not very much surprise you when I say that but for my belief in the powers I ascribe to trance, we should not be known to each other at this moment."

"How?—pray explain.

"Certain circumstances, which I trust to relate to you in detail hereafter, have imposed on me the duty to discover, and to bring human laws to bear upon, a creature armed with terrible powers for evil. The monster—for, without metaphor, monster it is, not man like ourselves —has, by arts superior to those of ordinary fugitives, however atrocious in themselves, hitherto for years eluded my research. Through the trance of an Arab child, who in her waking state never heard of his existence, I have learned that this being is in England—is in London—I am here to encounter him. I expect to do so this very night, and under this very roof."

"Sir Philip!"

"And if you wonder, as you well may, why I have been thus reticent, and, while exacting no reserve, know that the same Arab child, on whom I thus implicitly rely, informs me that it is intimately through reliance on your agency or aid that the fearful career of the monster I seek to unmask and to terminate will be brought to a close."

"By my agency or aid—your Arab child named me, Allen Fenwick?"

"My Arab child told me that the person thus instrumental to my search was he who had saved the life of the man whom I then meant for my heir, if I died unmarried and childless. She told me that I should find many hours in this town, which she described minutely, before you would be made known to me. She described this house, and your future visits and absences. In her trance she saw us sitting together, as now we sit. I accepted the invitation of our host when he unsolicitedly invited me on meeting the town, confident that I should meet you here, without even asking whether a per on of your name were a resident in London. Now you know why I have so freely unbosomed myself of much that might well make you, a physician, doubt the sanity of the mesmerist you describe. In the same infant, whose vision has been realized up to this moment, has warned me also that I am here at peril of my life, that the very arts I have declined to learn, as I have ever declined to ask from the future what affects only my own life on this earth. That life I regard with supreme indifference, conscious that I have only to discharge, while it lasts, the duties for which it is imposed on me to the best of my imperfect power; and aware that minds the strongest and souls the purest may fall into the sloth habitual to protectionless ills if fortune or position close to the present hour to be awed and paralyzed by some grim shadow on the future! It is only where, irrespective of the duties I have assigned myself, a light not struck out of my own reason can guide me to disarm evil or minister to good, that I feel myself encouraged to unfold those mirrors on which things, near and far, reflect themselves calm and distinct as the banks and the mountain peaks that are mirrored in the glass of a lake. Here, then, under this roof, and by your side, I shall behold him who— Lo! the monster for whom I behold him now!"

As he spoke these last words Sir Philip had risen, and, startled by his action and voice, I involuntarily rose too.

Resting one hand on my shoulder, he pointed with the other toward the threshold of the ballroom. There, the prominent figure of a gay group—the tall dame amidst a flutter-wave of silks and lawn, of flowery wreaths, of female laughter, and female frippery—stood the radiant image of Margrave, whose features were not turned toward us. He was looking down, and his light laugh came soft, yet ringing, through the genial air.

I turned my astonished gaze back to Sir Philip—yes, unmistakably it was on Margrave that his look was fixed.

Impossible to associate crime with the image of that fair youth! Eccentric notions—fantastic speculations—vivacious egotism—defective benevolence—yes. But crime! No—impossible.

"Impossible!" I said, aloud. As I spoke the group had moved on. Margrave was no longer in sight. At the same moment some other guests came from the ball-room and seated themselves near us.

Sir Philip looked round, and observing the deserted museum at the end of the corridor, drew me into it.

When we were alone he said in a voice quick and low, but decided—

"It is of importance that I should convince you at once of the nature of that prodigy which is more hostile to the human race than the wolf to the sheepfold. No words of mine could as present suffice to clear your sight from the deception which cheats it. I must enable you to judge for yourself. It must be now, and here. He will learn this night, if he has not learned already, that I am in the town. Dim and confused though his memories of myself may be, they are memories still; and he will know what cause he has to dread me. I must put another in possession of his secret; and who but yourself, through whom his career is to be ended? Another, and at once. For all his arts will be brought to bear against me, and I can not foretell their issue. Go, then; enter that giddy crowd—select that seeming young man—bring him hither. Take care only not to mention my name; and when here, turn the key in the door, so as to prevent interruption—five minutes will suffice."

"Am I sure that I guess whom you mean? The young light-hearted man, from whom in this house there is naught to fear? The young man with the radiant eyes, and the curls of a Grecian statue?"

"The same. Him whom I pointed out; quick, bring him hither."

My curiosity was too much roused to disobey. Had I entertained a doubt, even in the heat of youth, had committed some offense which placed him in danger of the law and in the power of Sir Philip Derval, the strength of the old bondeers' black-mail loyalty to have given to the man whose hand I had familiarly clasped a hint and a help to escape. But all Sir Philip's talk had been so out of the reach of common sense, that I rather expected to see him confounded by some egregious delusion than Margrave exposed to any well-grounded accusation. All, then, that I felt as I walked into the ball-room and approached Margrave, was that curiosity which, I think, any one of my readers will acknowledge is that, in my position, he himself would have felt.

Margrave was standing near the dancers, not joining them, but talking with a young couple in the ring. I drew him aside.

"Come with me for a few minutes into the museum; I have to talk to you."

"What about? an experiment?"

"Yes, an experiment."

"Then I am your man for service."

In a minute more he had followed me into the desolate, dead museum. I looked round but did not see Sir Philip.

COLONEL WILSONS CAMP ON SANTA ROSA ISLAND.

On page 677 we illustrate the CAMP OF THE SIXTH NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS, COLONEL WILSON, on Santa Rosa Island, from a sketch by Charles F. Allgouer of the Sixth Regiment. It will be noticed that the tents are all provided with shelters to protect the inmates from the blistering heat of the Gulf sun. A letter from the camp says:

"We have encamped quite extensively among the men dug and a mouth or two since. A fresh supply of tents has been given us, and they have covered them with logs for shelter them from the rains. A prize schooner, laden with boards, went ashore on the beach opposite the camp, and the Government gave it to the soldiers to appropriate as much as they needed to the flooring of their tents.

"Very little sickness has yet appeared in the camp. There are but twenty of our men in the hospital. Two cases of typhoid fever have occurred, but the patients are doing well under nursing. We have not lost a man since coming upon the island.

A BALLOON RECONNOISSANCE.

On page 679 we publish a picture entitled a WAR BALLOON PREPARING FOR A RECONNOISSANCE, from a sketch by Mr. Ed. Pietsch.

The balloon shown in our picture is that which is sailed by Mr. Lowe, and is stationed on Arlington Heights, close to the head-quarters of General McDowell. Every day or two, or whenever the scouts bring in intelligence of a movement by the enemy, an accurate and full and accurate information is thus obtained of the state of affairs. Professor La Mountain is serving with his balloon at Fortress Monroe; much valuable information has been obtained by him in his various ascents.

The use of War Balloons did not become general until the Italian war, in 1859. During that war Napoleon used them regularly, and when the rebellion broke out in this country, our accounts had of difficulty in obtaining employment from Government. The War Balloon is attached to the earth by a strong but fine rope. It ascends from day to day carrying a man in the air, and is hauled down when its aims have been fulfilled. The importance of gaining such a height for observation can be appreciated by all readers of military annals.

THE WAR IN MISSOURI.

WE publish on page 679, from a sketch by Mr. A. Simplot, a VIEW OF GENERAL FREMONT'S CAMP AT SEDALIA, MISSOURI. It is known that Fremont left this camp some time since. The following account of it, when he was there, is from a letter in the Tribune:

"All the hills and slopes around Jefferson are dotted with tents, and our forces now here are not far below 10,000. Gen. Fremont's headquarters are in the Lindell Cottage, a mile south of the Capitol. The telegraph wire has been laid out to the encampments on Bolduc, Ironton, Cape Girardeau, and St. Louis. The wires will follow him westward as far as Jefferson City. Troops have (many of them now) are subjected to severe and systematic drill. General Fremont has taken possession of the Penitentiary, using all its work-shops in outfitting our troops for the field, and in a short time the men will be thoroughly organized and equipped, ready for a general forward movement.

"The distance from Jefferson to Lexington by road is 115 miles. About 15,000 of our troops have already gone forward to the terminus of the railroad, 60 miles west of this city, and are waiting for the remainder of the army to join them. From 1000 to 2000 are going forward daily. General Siegel, of Carthage fame, is in command of the entire advance, with his head-quarters at Sedalia.

THE GRAND REVIEW AT WASHINGTON.

WE publish on page 676 an illustration of the GRAND REVIEW which took place at Washington on 8th October. It was sketched by one of our correspondents from the roof of the Alms-house, east of the Capitol, and looking west. The review was thus described in the Washington correspondence of the Tribune:

General M'Clellan reviewed a portion of the cavalry and artillery on the north side of the Potomac to-day, on the broad plain east of the Capitol. Fifty-five hundred cavalry, preceded by squadrons and regiments on the left, and eighteen batteries, each by itself, on the right, marshaled by a staff officer arrived with his staff was announced by a salute about 2 o'clock. After riding rapidly along the line, he took a position on a gentle rise of land, and the artillery first, guns and caissons in battery line, swept by, followed by the cavalry. Among the batteries, none received more praise than that from Massachusetts, which arrived only two days ago. There were five batteries from Massachusetts and five from Rhode Island. The latter, under command of General Barry, Chief of Artillery. The cavalry consisted of ten companies of the 6th, eight of the 6th, two of the 4th, and one of the 2d Regular Cavalry; 1st, 5th, and 3d Rhode Island Cavalry regiments, with four companies of the 4th; 1st New Jersey, 2d and 3d (Lincoln) New York, and four companies of the 4th, six companies of the 1st Indiana, and three companies unattached, all under the immediate command of General Stoneman. Nearly four times as many were reviewed as on the previous occasion. General M'Clellan expressed himself more than satisfied. He noticed a marked improvement. The display of artillery was particularly fine, the guns, horses, and men being in the best condition. In many squadrons of the cavalry all the horses were of one color, which will be universally the case as soon as General Stoneman, Chief of Cavalry, can accomplish it. He will also furnish the various regiments, and number them as volunteer cavalry, ignoring States. The President and Mrs. Lincoln, Secretary and Assistant-Secretary Seward, Generals Banks, M'Dowell, Sickles, Hooker, and Porter were present.

THE SOLDIER'S LAST WORD.

BY PARK BENJAMIN.

He lay upon the battle-field,
Where late the clash of arms was heard,
And from his pallid lips there came,
In broken accents, but one word.

"Mother!" was all the soldier said,
Who fell from his wounded side.
The hot blood flowed, and bore away
His life upon its crimson tide.

Bravest among the brave he rushed,
Without a single throb of fear,
And loudest mid the tumult pealed,
In clarion tones, his charging cheer.

"On to the contest, comrades, on!
Our country is the Union, for fame!
Who lives will win his country's praise,
Who dies will leave a glorious name!"

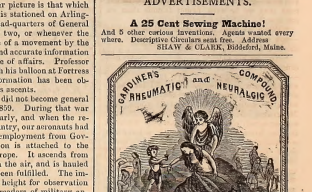
He fell amidst the clouds of strife
Among an undistinguished train,
Foremost upon the battle-field,
And first beneath the heaps of slain.

Dying, he turned him from the fray
Whose starry folds still onward waved;
Dying, he thought no more of fame,
Of victory won or country saved.

But of his home and her he loved
His sad, departing spirit sighed;
"Mother!" the soldier fondly said,
And, looking to the CROSS, he died.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A 25 Cent Sewing Machine!
And 5 other curious inventions. Agents wanted every where. Descriptive Circulars sent free. Address
SHAW & HOLMES, Biddeford, Maine.



A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Depot, Agents 37 WILLIAM St. (up stairs), 115 Franklin St., New York. Sold by Apothecaries everywhere.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to
HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance, which can not fail—free for 25 cents. Address T. WILLIAMS & Co., Publishers, Boston, Mass.

Friends of Soldiers!

Send by Drexel's Express (the oldest Express), 74 Broadway, as they charge only half rates.

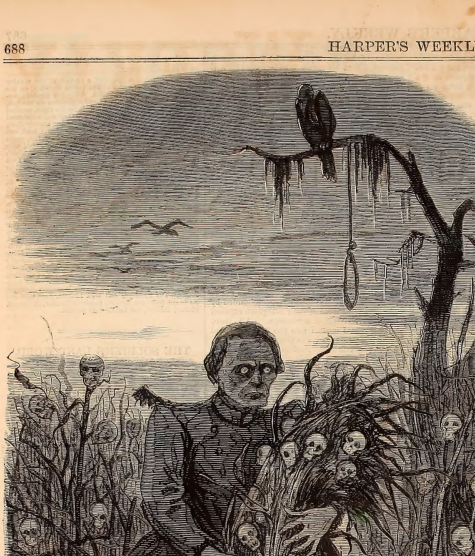
Ladies are invited to call and examine the splendid stock of fine furs and children's fancy hats now open at 187 BROADWAY, Metropolitan Block.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT TO HIRE AGENTS in every County at $75 per month and expenses, to sell a new and cheap Sewing Machine. Address with stamp J. S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

"Great Discovery."—For particulars send stamp to D. A. WILLIAMS, Lowell, Mass.

Commercial Agents wanted. Large commission, business lucrative. Circular sent. A. W. HARRISON, Philadelphia.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Ointment will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.



JEFF DAVIS REAPING THE HARVEST.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEADLE'S MILITARY HAND-BOOK
Embracing the Official Articles of War.—U. S. Army Regulations.—A Dictionary of Military Terms.—Duty List.—Salutes.—Equipments.—Courtesies, &c. Price 25 Cents. For sale by all Book and News Dealers and Army Sutlers.

No. 2. BEADLE'S No. 2.
DIME UNION SONG BOOK, No. 2.
A Collection of the Latest and most Popular Patriotic Songs. For sale by all News Dealers and Army Sutlers.
BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.

Cloaks! Cloaks!
BRODIE
has made his
Grand Opening
of
Fall and Winter Cloaks,
at his
OLD STAND,
300 Canal Street,
and
His Palace of Fashion,
Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,
Cor. of 23d Street,
New York.

ALL WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Wedding Cards and Envelops, by A. DEBARBIERI, Engraver, 193 Broadway. Samples by mail.

Barnum's American Museum.
Dickens's
"Great Expectations"
Has been dramatized expressly for Barnum's Museum, where it is produced every afternoon and evening, with great effect, by a talented company, with new and gorgeous Scenery, Properties and Costumes, and with a full Orchestra. All the other attractions of the Museum remain in full force, making the most interesting place of amusement in New York; notwithstanding which the price of admission remains at only 25 cents. Children under 10 years, 15 cents.

GAME, MEATS, FISH, &c., improved by the use of Lea & Perrins's Worcestershire Sauce. JOHN DUNCAN & SONS, Union Square and 14th Street, Sole Agents.

Portable Printing Offices
For the use of Business and Professional Men who would like to do their own Printing. Send for a Circular.
ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 11 Fulton Street, and 31 Park Row, New York.

GENERAL GEORGE B. McCLELLAN and our New Union Prize Gift Packages are to be wondered at. Seventy-five cents worth of indispensable articles for 25 cents. Agents are making from $5 to $10 per day. Agents wanted, male and female, everywhere. Address, with stamp for circular, RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York.

AGENTS WANTED.—For the NEW WAR MAPS, Views, and Portraits.—G. Mepps, 1 Dutch, 2 Portraits. Samples of all sent on receipt of $1. Circulars sent free. Address U. F. LLOYD, 205 Broadway, N. Y.

SNOWS No. 623 Broadway, a few doors below Bleecker Street, now the GREAT CANDY STORE
of this city, the public may select from an assortment consisting of more than 200 kinds of FRENCH AND AMERICAN CONFECTIONERY, more than fifty sorts, separate or mixed, for 25 cents a pound. EXTRA FLAVOR CHOCOLATES, CARAMELS, AND FRENCH BURNT ALMONDS, for 40 cents a pound, &c., &c.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York, have just published:
THE OKAVANGO RIVER: A Narrative of Travel, Exploration, and Adventure. By CHARLES JOHN ANDERSSON, Author of "Lake Ngami." With Steel Portrait of the Author, numerous Woodcuts, and a Map (not contained in the English Edition) showing the Regions explored by Andersson, Cumming, Livingstone, Burton, and Du Chaillu. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50; Half Calf, $4 00.
THE SILVER CORD. A Novel. By SHIRLEY BROOKS. Illustrated. (Uniform with Wilkie Collins's "Woman in White.") 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Muslin, $1 00.
LIFE IN THE SOUTH PACIFIC. Life and Adventure in the South Pacific. By a ROVING PRINTER. Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, $1 25.
THE HOUSE ON THE MOOR. A Novel. By the Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of My Life," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
FARADAY'S CHEMICAL HISTORY OF A CANDLE. A Course of Six Lectures on the Chemical History of a Candle, to which is added a Lecture on Platinum. By MICHAEL FARADAY, D.C.L., F.R.S. With numerous Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, 90 cents.
SEASONS WITH THE SEA-HORSES; or, Sporting Adventures in the Northern Seas. By JAMES LAMONT, Esq., F.G.S. With Map and numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $1 75.
FRAMLEY PARSONAGE. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Doctor Thorne," "The Bertrams," "The Three Clerks," "The West Indies and the Spanish Main," "Orley Farm," &c. With Illustrations by MILLAIS. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
CARTHAGE AND HER REMAINS: Being an Account of the Excavations and Researches on the Site of the Phœnician Metropolis in Africa and other Adjacent Places. Conducted under the Auspices of Her Majesty's Government. By Dr. N. DAVIS, F.R.G.S. Profusely Illustrated with Maps, Wood-cuts, Chromo-Lithographs, &c. &c. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50.
A DAY'S RIDE. A Life's Romance. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Gerald Fitzgerald," "The Martins of Cro' Martin," "Maurice Tiernay," "One of Them," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price.

The Graefenberg Family Medicines,
No. 2 Bond Street, New York.
LP Read the following: LP
From the N. Y. TIMES.—Many of the leading public men in the country have spoken in the highest terms of the Graefenberg Institution and its Remedial Agents. Others have permitted the Resident Physician to refer to them. Among those lost we have noticed the names of HORACE GREELEY, of the Tribune; PROF. M. P. HEWES, of the Vassar Female College, Poughkeepsie; Rev. E. H. CHAPIN, D.D.; Prof. WM. B. PRADDY, of Harvard University, &c.

The Graefenberg Vegetable Pills
will cure Liver Complaint, Costiveness, Indigestion, Headache, Fevers, Sour Stomach, Bilious Diseases. LP They are certain to cure pimples, eruptions, and all marks on the skin. LP Price 25 CENTS A BOX, WITH DIRECTIONS. SENT BY MAIL, FREE OF POSTAGE, ON THE RECEIPT OF 25 CENTS.
Address JOSEPH F. BRODIE, M.D., Resident Physician, Graefenberg Institution, No. 2 Bond Street, New York.

We pay $40 a Month and expenses to Agents. For terms address HARRIS BROTHERS, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED to sell our Patriotic Packet. A new article. Enclose stamp for Circular. HASKIN & CO., 36 Beekman Street, N. Y.

$150 PER MONTH made by enterprising men selling DOWNER'S HUMMING and SHUTTLE hand sewing. Protects the finger and makes a beautiful hem. Sample sent on receipt of 25 cents. Address A. H. DOWNER, No. 442 Broadway.

WARD'S
Perfect Fitting Shirts,
MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN.
Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, fourfolds of different styles of Shirts, sent free everywhere.
S. W. H. WARD, from London,
No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
Herrmann's Soirees de Prestidigitation
Every Evening.
Notice.—During the coming winter it is the intention of Mons. Herrmann to visit the following cities in this State and the West, viz., Albany, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, and St. Louis.

JEWELRY! JEWELRY!—The Head-Quarters for all Cash Points of Sale, and cheap Jewelry, Miniature Pins of all the Heroes. Persons wishing to see Samples, enclose stamp for full particulars. W. A. HAYWARD (Manufacturing Jeweler), 208 Broadway.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS — SOLDIERS Patent, 539 Broadway, New York. Send for a Circular.

WEDDING CARDS.
These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only by EVERDELL, 302 Broadway, N. Y.
Specimens by Mail, on receipt of 3 stamps.

Man-of-War Manual.
Manual of Internal Rules and Regulations for Men-of-War. By Capt. U. R. Levy, U.S.N. Cloth, 30 cents. Sent free by mail on receipt of price.
This day published by
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
192 Broadway.

OUR WAR MAPS, VIEWS, AND PORTRAITS—Colored.
NOW READY.—A new edition of the choicest Maps, Views, and Portraits published in HARPER'S WEEKLY since the commencement of the War, printed on colored paper, beautifully colored. Price only 20 cents. Size of Sheet, 40×50 Inches; contains 13 Maps, 6 Views, 4 Portraits:—PICTORIAL MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR IN VIRGINIA; Correct Topographical Maps of MISSOURI, VIRGINIA, the UNITED STATES, the COAST LINE, etc.; Views of FORTRESS MONROE, FORT PICKENS, &c.; Portraits of GENERALS MCCLELLAN, MCDOWELL, FREMONT, and LYON. All were drawn and engraved expressly for HARPER'S WEEKLY, and are the best War Maps, and most beautiful Views and Portraits that have been published. They will be found useful for reference, and as a work of Art highly ornamental.
Agents wanted everywhere, who will be supplied at the following liberal rates, viz.: Single Copies 25 cents; Six Copies $1; Forty Copies $6; 100 Copies $12 50. Sent anywhere on receipt of the money. Cash must accompany all orders. Address EDWARD F. LLOYD, Exclusive Agent, 205 Broadway, New York.

Le Bon Ton Journal de Modes.—Best and only reliable Fashion Book. Subscription $3; single copies 50c. S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 401 Broadway, N. Y.

Close of the Twenty-Third Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
For November, 1861.
CONTENTS.
BENEDICT ARNOLD. By BENSON J. LOSSING.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Portrait of Arnold.—Arnold crossing the St. Lawrence.—Arnold's Birth-Place.—The Assault on Quebec.—Place where Arnold was Wounded.—Leaving the Congress.—Map of the Battle on Lake Champlain.—Arnold at Saratoga.—Meeting of Arnold and Andre.—Capture of Andre.—Arnold and Balcarres.
THE PENNIMAN HOUSE. By FRANCES O'BRIEN.
ILLUSTRATION.—The Dinner at Ormolu's.—The Abuse of Fire.—Burning of the Tenement House.
MAKING MONEY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The United States Curious-House and Assay Office, New York.—The Weigh-Room.—The Court-Yard.—The Melting-Room.—Old Crucibles.—Cupellation and Parting Silver.—The Assay Weigh-Room.—Refooting.—Melter and Refiner's Vault.—Pouring out Acid.—The Parting House.—Interior of Vault.—Casting Fine Bars.—Precipitating and Parting Silver.—Grinding and Separating the Dust.—Kent's Gold Separator.
THE WOMEN OF WEINSBURG. Illustrated.
ABOUT THE FOX AND FOX-HUNTERS. By T. B. THORPE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—A Fox-Hunter.—Portrait of Reynard.—The Meeting.—Riding to Cover.—The Chase.—The Death.—Over the Fence.
OLLY DOLLY.
NIGHT REVELERS.
MODERN AUSTRIA. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.
WHEN HIGH SLEEPEST. By CHARLOTTE BRONTE.
CAUSE AND EFFECT.
THE GAME OF CHESS.
THE ANGEL SISTER.
ORLEY FARM. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE.—Illustrated by J. E. MILLAIS.
CHAPTER XXV. Mr. Furnival again at his Chambers.
CHAPTER XXVI. "Why should I not?"
CHAPTER XXVII. Commencement.
CHAPTER XXVIII. Mokkton Grange.
CHAPTER XXIX. "Why should I not?"—Mokkton Grange.
KENNETH; OR SAXE-COBURG-GOTHA. By BAYARD TAYLOR.
LITTLE SCHILLING'S RECEPTION.
THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. By W. M. THACKERAY.
CHAPTER XXI. Treats of Dressing, Dining, Dying.
CHAPTER XXII. Relates to Love.
RECOLLECTIONS.—At the Loo.—A Quarrel.—The End.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.—With Eight Illustrations.
MR. DOWNEY IN SEARCH OF PHYSICAL DEVELOPMENT.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Bowling.—The Result.—Skating.—Its Effect.—Riding.—The Rest.—Rowing.—The Trial.—Batting.—Running.—Boxing.
FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Cloak and Boy's Dress.—Evening Costume and Walking Dress.

TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together one year, $5 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

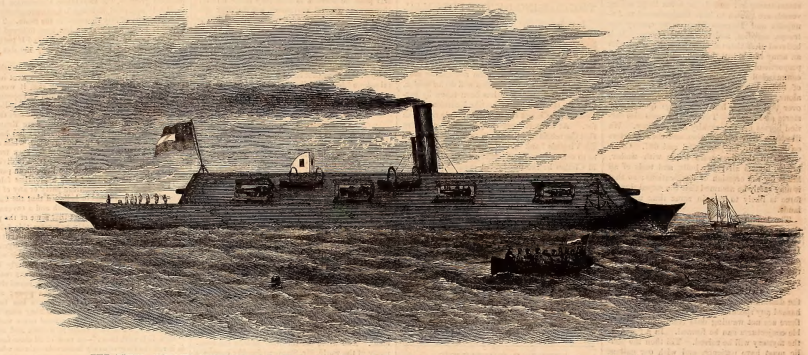
HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.
TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $2 50
Two Copies for One Year 4 00
Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.
HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will also be sent gratuitously.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

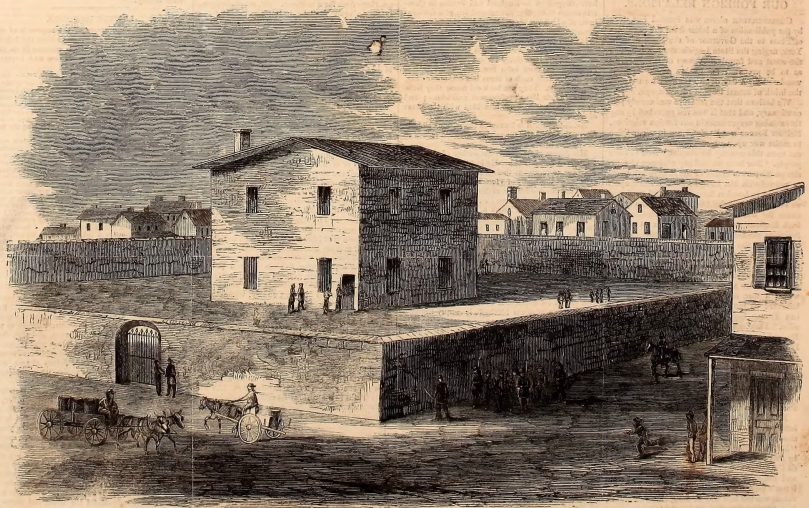
VOL. V.—No. 253.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.



THE REBEL STEAMER "MERRIMAC," RAZEED, AND IRON-CLAD.—FROM A SKETCH FURNISHED BY A MECHANIC WHO WAS EMPLOYED ON BOARD.

[SEE PAGE 699.]



HENRICO COUNTY JAIL, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—FROM A SKETCH FURNISHED BY A UNION PRISONER WHO WAS CONFINED IN IT.

[SEE PAGE 703.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1861.

THE GREAT NAVAL EXPEDITION.

BY the time these lines are read by the public the GREAT NAVAL EXPEDITION will have reached its destination, and we therefore violate no rule by the Government in illustrating its departure on pages 696 and 697. What precise point it is intended to attack no one knows but its leaders and the members of the Administration; but we may rest assured that it will deal a blow where it will be felt, and that the rebel army on the Potomac will not hear of its landing without emotions of very lively concern.

Some twenty-two or twenty-three first-class steam-transports and six or seven large sailing vessels are known to have rendezvoused at Annapolis and Fortress Monroe to convey the troops, supplies, and munitions of war. It is believed that these vessels have departed with an army of not less than 30,000 men, with due proportions of cavalry and artillery, the whole commanded by Major-General Sherman, late of Sherman's Battery. The Great Republic alone, which was towed by the Vanderbilt, took over 900 horses, besides a large quantity of stores and forage. Two other vessels also carried horses for the cavalry and artillery. We illustrate their embarkation and their quarters on board ship on pages 696 and 697. Other vessels in the fleet were laden with timber, bricks, lime, all ready built, and tools of all kinds for the erection of fortifications; so that it may safely be assumed that the expeditionary force is likely to remain some time where it lands.

The landing will be effected under cover of the fire of a powerful fleet of men-of-war. No one knows what vessels will constitute this fleet. It is whispered, however, that not less than 300 guns of heavy calibre will be brought to bear on the landing-place—enough to overpower any resistance that can fairly be anticipated.

Every one is distressing himself to discover the destination of the expedition. We will not hazard any speculations on the subject; though there are not wanting data from which plausible conjectures can be formed. In a few days the mystery will be solved. Till then the public must have patience, and wish our gallant countrymen of the expedition most heartily GOD-SPEED!

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS

CONSIDERABLE alarm was created last week by the publication of a letter from the Secretary of State to the Governor of the State of New York, urging the State Legislature to strengthen the coast and frontier defenses of the State, so as to be prepared for foreign wars. People wondered for a day or two whether we were on the brink of actual trouble with Europe.

We believe that the measure was merely precautionary, and that it was not provoked by any threatening occurrences in our foreign relations. Neither France nor England are in a condition to make war upon us, as they both find dependent upon this country for the daily food of their people. Nor have we had any evidence of a desire on the part of either of the two Governments to quarrel with Mr. Lincoln, though newspapers published in London have abused and maligned us in a very remarkable manner. Finally, no cause for war exists. The real trouble with both England and France is not now, we shall gladly revert to our old policy of raising money by revenue tariffs, and then Europe will receive the market she has temporarily secured; meanwhile, she should have exasperated our people beyond bearing.

It is asked why the letter was published if it was merely a measure of prudent precaution?

Mr. Seward's object in giving to the press a letter which, in the ordinary course of affairs, should have been kept secret, was probably to "head off" Messrs. Mason and Slidell, who are by this time arriving in Europe as the accredited Commissioners of the Rebel States to France and England. Whether the publication of a letter which, under the circumstances, implied a threat was the best way of achieving this object, is a question which may possibly involve some doubt. But Mr. Seward's fondness for coup-d'état and startling manifestoes is well known.

In connection with this subject, we may observe that much misapprehension exists in the papers on the subject of the combined French, British, and Spanish expedition against Mexico. This expedition will do immense good, and has, we doubt not, received the hearty assent of our Government. Its object is to put down the robbers and bandits who for many years have rendered all government impossible in Mexico; to enable the Mexican people freely and fairly to choose their own rulers; and to give to those rulers, after they have been chosen, armed support for a sufficient length of time to enable them to gain a solid footing in the country. The accomplishment of these objects will be as beneficial to the United States and the world at large as to Mexico herself. They would have been accomplished some years ago, but for the ambitious schemes of certain British politicians in Mexico on the one hand, and on the other the pro-slavery dreams of the Southern Junta at Washington. The time has now arrived when the right thing can be safely done, and it is going to be at least attempted.

THE CLOSING OF THE POTOMAC.

IT is known that the rebels have some fifteen miles of batteries on the south shore of the Potomac, and that every vessel passing for or pass is fired upon. Hence general alarm is felt throughout the North at the "closing of the Potomac," and loyal citizens are asking each other what General M'Clellan will do to-day.

If General M'Clellan has been taken by surprise by the erection of hostile batteries on the Potomac, he is not the man people take him for. At least we can only form the argument that the rebels had the power to plant cannon on the Virginia bank of the river, in such positions as to seriously menace passing craft. Whether M'Clellan be the slaughtering general people believe him to be, he was prepared for what has happened, and is provided with a remedy.

But there is no reason why the erection of batteries on the Potomac should be regarded as closing that river. Balls and shells are unpleasant things to come into contact with, no doubt. It is, however, the business of vessels of war to encounter them, and their captains can no more complain of being under fire than private soldiers. With one or two exceptions, the rebel batteries are in no case free from cannel. At this distance the most experienced gunners will not sink one craft in twenty. It will be time enough to consider the Potomac closed when every craft which tries to pass the batteries is sure of being sunk or destroyed.

THE LOUNGER.

A PRECIOUS PAIR.

MR. JAMES M. MASON and MR. JOHN SLIDELL have slipped off to England and France as Commissioners to implore the recognition of a Government of which the second in command declares the corner-stone to be slavery.

It is to be hoped that every gentleman in this country who has correspondents in either England or France will carefully inform them that these persons have not been Members of the United States, and that each of them has one distinction, and one only. They are both old men; they have been all their lives professional politicians; and there is but a single act identified with the name of each.

Mr. John Slidell is known to the nation solely in connection with the Plaquemine election frauds in Louisiana, in 1844.

Mr. James M. Mason is the author of the Fugitive Slave Bill of 1850. He is fitly chosen by the rebellion to represent their essential principle and purpose at the Court of Victoria.

"That the institution of Slavery is abominable in the eyes of Englishmen . . . is not for a moment to be doubted," says a late London Times. And how will Earl Russell, the Foreign Secretary, the descendant of Lord William Russell, who died for striking for liberty against a despotic English Government, look upon this man who strikes for slavery against the free and beneficent Government of the United States?

These gentlemen are not likely to be overtaken by the steamers which our Government has sent after them. But the Commissioners' instructions show its disposition to take every step. To maintain an absolute blockade is simply impossible; and when an injunction to prevent escape is the only possible measure is to dispatch another after it.

OUR INCREDULITY.

LAST spring, after Sumter, no more dismal a story was, the more readily we believed it. So after Bull Run there were those who really thought this Government was gone. But since our peaceful encampment along the Potomac our spirits have been gradually rising, taking stocks with them, until at last we have seen a drug face and so buoyant a heart to the war that a man might believe that all his neighbors had in his pocket confidential news of the overthrow of the rebellion.

Four bad reports came together last week. Wilson's Zouaves had been cut up upon Santa Rosa Island. Yeah! yeah! Halleck had routed the Prairie Dogs and peppered the fleet at the mouth of the Mississippi. Stuff! Hollins is a bragster. The Nashville had gone to sea with Mason and Slidell. Don't believe any such story. The Saranac went ashore in a storm. Canard!

It was truly refreshing to observe the airy way in which these stories were set aside, and the lie cheerfully given to Madame Rumor. "Dear Madame," said the public incredulity, "if you wish to be believed to our disadvantage, you will please speak through some other mouth-piece than a rebel newspaper.

Fas est et ab hoste doceri, as the Latin Grammar justly remarks. There is no harm in being taught by the enemy in any way. There is especially no harm in believing the worst he says. Above all things, it is of the utmost use to remember that the chances of war must often go against us. The rebels will sometimes run the blockade; they will sometimes surprise and overpower skirmishing and inferior numbers of our men; they will suddenly unmask batteries; they will occasionally sink and pepper our ships; they will occasionally poison wells and food which are likely to fall into our hands, whenever they can. We are very unwell, very united, and of overwhelming numbers and means. But the rebels will for a long time seem to live without food and buy without money. They will make forays and ambuscades. They will stop a train in Missouri; run the blockade at Charleston; make a dash at Hatteras, or fire from a battery on the Potomac.

These things we must expect, and we must anticipate a various fortune in them. But the central point to observe is that they make no very threatening general movement, nor do their motions indicate any grand design. Thus far it is fierce guerrilla skirmishing upon their part, except at Bull Run, where we were both beaten. Civil wars do not end in a few months, nor are the victories all on one side. We can keep an even temper, not supposing that a report is "a lie" because it is disagreeable; nor that Hollins can not drive a vessel ashore because he is a bragger; nor that Mason and Slidell can not escape to Europe because we do not wish them to.

SIDE-LIGHTS.

WHILE we are engaged in a great civil war occasioned by a few conspirators who say that the political power of the Slave States is passing away—a war made by them originally to found a new government, and now waged of necessity to destroy them—it is interesting to mark the movements of the rest of the world in relation to the original cause of this war. That cause is simply the old question of Despotism and Liberty. It reappears in the history of every nation. In European nations it has often come to open war between the friends of the multiple-power assault in England, and France, and Italy. But more agreeable is the spectacle of a Government yielding to the deepening sentiment of justice, upon which alone permanent power is founded.

It is humiliating that such things should have been said by an American to-day. Does it not merely touch the surface of which Russia is participating, we are waging a terrible war to prevent the destruction of the Government by a far worse slavery than the Russian? Russia! The most barbarous of civilized powers entrusts that which called itself the most enlightened not to fall a prey to despotism, but to the Russian Government makes the direct appeal, Spain, with expressive silence toward us, announces, by the letter of Marshal O'Donnell, the decree of the Queen Isabella, to the Governor of Porto Rico, "that her Majesty has been graciously pleased to declare that slaves entering from the United States shall be received with their masters must consider themselves emancipated without the consent of their owners being indispensable; that the freedom granted to such slaves, in virtue of the decision of the 25th March, 1836, is not revocable; and that they acquire by their entrance into the Spanish Country, without other act being necessary to confirm it, the quality of freemen, even should they return to a country where slavery is established by the laws."

So says Spain, the blue blood of national honor mantling once more in her withered cheeks. Hear now Alexander H. Stephens: "This, our new Government, is the first in the history of the world based upon this great physical, philosophical, and moral truth [of slavery]. This truth has been slow in the process of its development, like all other truths in the various departments of science."

Very slow, Mr. Stephens, but never quite so slow as at this present moment.

OLD TREASON WITH A NEW FACE.

ALL efforts to make the partisan political capital during the war are open aid and comfort to the enemy. No service is so grateful to a foe as sowing dissension in his camp. If he can divide or dispirit his enemy, he can conquer them. That is precisely what Jeff Davis would like to see among the friends of the Government at the North. It would cheer his melancholy soul, if he could see us so intent upon deciding what party is chiefly responsible for the war, that we forget to fight; or fighting, secretly wish him to conquer, that the party opponent may be made to suffer.

Simple justice requires any observer of the times to admit that the Republican party and papers have not been forward in this kind of treason. They have accepted the war, and have forborne to explore its proximate causes in our own neighborhood. They have frankly taken the ground that the Union was to be defended at all costs, and if emancipation should become a military necessity, then men and women held as property should not be allowed to be the rebellion any more than horses, grain, or any other property.

While this is true of their papers, Mr. Sumner is the only leading Republican statesman who advocates universal emancipation as the truest policy of the Government. And he takes care only to state his views, and to add that it is for the Administration as to the method in which, and the time when, the object he seeks shall be accomplished.

Still further, the party at large have been first to repudiate party divisions, and their offer of union being refused in this State by the Committee of the other great party, the people of both parties repudiated the Committee, held a Convention, and named candidates of all parties, which, with one exception, and that exception based mainly upon personal grounds, the Republican Convention immediately approved, although it had undoubtedly a clear majority of fifty thousand in the State. The patriotic policy of Syracuse has been followed in the county and local nominations; and if party-spirit rages any where, it is certainly not due to the action of the Republicans.

In full view of these facts, and of those other familiar facts, that the Republican party went into the Presidential election declaring that it would peacefully abide by the result, while its opponents declared in advance that if defeated with ballots it would appeal to bullets—in view of the fact that some of the leaders in the rebellion are Republicans, and that not a single Republican has been taken in arms against the Government, while all the papers that have been suppressed for treason and all the speakers who have tried to divide us, were strongly opposed to the Republican party—in view of the fact that it is a perfectly false-hold to say that the Republican party or any of its members have ever said or believed that the Constitution was a league with death and a covenant with hell—in view of the fact that some of the papers which most incessantly reiterate this falsehood were those which to support the cause of the United States only by fear of an indignant people which was murmuring beneath their winnowing; that the same papers publicly believed to have secession flags in their offices ready for display when the revolt, which they hoped they could secured in the city, should be ripe, and that the recent course of those papers has been such as to beget the suspicion that they were industriously trying to stab the national cause under the fifth rib, while they smile in its face and ask, "How is it with thee?"—in view of all these facts, is it not the duty of every loyal man to watch whether his party sympathies may have been, to bear his testimony against this covert treason? It is the expiring effort of that party for power which has brought the country to this condition, to destroy the Gover ment, and with it the hope of constitutional liberty.

LECTURE PROPOSALS.

THAT other evidence of the approach of the Lecture Season is evident enough from the following letter, which the Lounger commends to the careful deliberations of Committees and Lecture agents:

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—I will write a few words to you in the fullest confidence. I do not write this because I have doubts of my own ability, but for the reason that I desire an opportunity to make my powers widely known. A friend of mine, who understands, has advised me to enter the public lecturing. Will you have the kindness to ask me to send me a list of the Committees and the last prices?

"During the summer I have prepared a lecture upon the 'Internal Convulsions of Nature, and their Relations to the Progress of Society.' I think I am a man of intellectual reflection to produce a profound sensation upon a refined audience. I do not wish to speak to small towns or before shilling audiences. I do not desire to be invited out to 'tea,' and shown around like a show in a caged animal. I do not wish to write my name and a few sentiments in the album of every young lady and gentleman in the town. I do not wish to be introduced when I say 'epicurean' and do not mean 'slavery.' I do not wish to be called an 'infidel' because I write down not chime with the bell of every church. I have delivered this lecture once or twice in my native county, and they pronounced it sublime. Our newspaper has a fitful item within on my lecture (evidently written by me), and says that Beecher, Chapin, and Gough are small caddies compared to me. Yours, T. HARRISON BRISTLE."

THE LYCEUM LECTURES.

THE Lyceum, or our system of popular lectures, will doubtless last the present winter. This, at least, is understood that in most of the cities the usual course will be given. The lecturers ought to remember that the audiences are earnest, and they does not chime with the bell of every church. I have delivered this lecture once or twice in my native county, and they pronounced it sublime. Our newspaper has a fitful item within on my lecture (evidently written by me), and says that Beecher, Chapin, and Gough are small caddies compared to me. Yours, T. HARRISON BRISTLE."

THE LYCEUM LECTURES.

THE Lyceum, or our system of popular lectures, will doubtless last the present winter. This, at least, is understood that in most of the cities the usual course will be given. The lecturers ought to remember that the audiences are earnest, and they does not chime with the bell of every church. I have delivered this lecture once or twice in my native county, and they pronounced it sublime. Our newspaper has a fitful item within on my lecture (evidently written by me), and says that Beecher, Chapin, and Gough are small caddies compared to me. Yours, T. HARRISON BRISTLE."

"I SHOULDN'T THINK IT WOULD, October, 1861.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—I will write a few words to you in the fullest confidence. I do not write this because I have doubts of my own ability, but for the reason that I desire an opportunity to make my powers widely known. A friend of mine, who understands, has advised me to enter the public lecturing. Will you have the kindness to ask me to send me a list of the Committees and the last prices?

"During the summer I have prepared a lecture upon the 'Internal Convulsions of Nature, and their Relations to the Progress of Society.' I think I am a man of intellectual reflection to produce a profound sensation upon a refined audience. I do not wish to speak to small towns or before shilling audiences. I do not desire to be invited out to 'tea,' and shown around like a show in a caged animal. I do not wish to write my name and a few sentiments in the album of every young lady and gentleman in the town. I do not wish to be introduced when I say 'epicurean' and do not mean 'slavery.' I do not wish to be called an 'infidel' because I write down not chime with the bell of every church. I have delivered this lecture once or twice in my native county, and they pronounced it sublime. Our newspaper has a fitful item within on my lecture (evidently written by me), and says that Beecher, Chapin, and Gough are small caddies compared to me. Yours, T. HARRISON BRISTLE."

These days hang so heavy with results that the man who tries to turn the mind of his audience away from the great theme that enchains us all, under the plea of diverting them, will find that his instinct has been at fault. Let him play his tune in the key which circumstances have already set. Let him take his text from the times, and improve it as a wan and putrid and scholar should, wisely, earnestly, and fearlessly. Treat men as cowards, and they are so. Appeal to their heroism, and they are heroic. An audience relishes wit, humor, rhetoric, even fustian, upon occasion; but if you look at it closely the greatest orations are those of Demosthenes, and those are as simple heroic.

Probably neither Demosthenes nor Cicero, nor Chatham nor Mirabeau, will lecture in our Lyceum this winter. Even though they may say yes, we speak in the honesty and eloquence of orators who know that a nation of cowards is already moribund. It has been found necessary for the public welfare in some instances to suspend papers and restrict free speech. But in every case the papers were those which, in the sound tradition of our system, had endeavored to put down free speech by brute mob law. A wise man would have been sure, at any time during the last few years, that the papers which so struck at that sacred right would instantly prove traitors in the hour of national peril. There is no wonder that they have so proved: the surprise is that we did not see it before.

Let that free speech be heard in the Lyceum this winter, used with a sacred sense of its responsibility. Let every word spoken be a blow at the heart of treason, and the cause of the country shown to be what it is, the cause of mankind. Then they who speak will be justified in opening their lips at this moment. For whoever, by a timely word, shows another man the beauty of "the good old cause," fires his heart and nerves his hand to strike for victory.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

EPIGRAM-ical.

GEORGE BLUNT and WARD BEECHER while journeying to Norridge,
Got off at Hyde Park to see "railway peerage."
The latter was hot but the sensible lover spoke: "Ward you like it?"
Fired was Blunt, "Pray, George, how would you speak it?"

Semicolonic the wrong of their 'tare and their 'tret?"
"Quite easy," quoth Blunt, "for 'tis said you do preach
A two-hours' sermon of Port Lafayette!"
"Ha, ha," cried the Priest, at the humorous duel,)
"Yet, hold, that won't do, since 'twill be illegal."
Adds Blunt: "for it would be what General Siegel Inflicted on Price, Sir—a punishment cruel!"
"Quite! quite!" cried Beecher; "no more shall I carp,
Your sense should be changed from George Blunt to Jack Sharp!"

A KICK IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION.—What is Italy to do with his old Holiness the Pope? Surely she has had enough of him by this time. She must have the point and edge of him as long as he remains with her. Now that quarter-day has come, she has better let her house of him. The bad company he keeps is clearly quite enough of an excuse for getting rid of him. We think the Duke of Italy could not do better than set about the task in kicking out his Holiness Pope Pius.

THE NATION THAT TURNS OUT MOST NEGATIVES.—By the recent Census we are informed that in Paris there are no less than 75,000 persons who get their living from photography and the photographic process. An old fogey, who has never been able to get over the stupid prejudice against the French, upon being told of the above fact, exclaimed, in a tone of the greatest triumph, "Egad, it's just like 'em! I always said those French fellows were the cleverest dupes in the world for making faces!"

FAN, MOMUS, TOLCHESTER, AND CO.'S LIST OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"The Fight over the Skein of Silk." By the Author of "The Mill on the Floss."

"Indecencies of the Queen." By the Author of "Idylls of the King," etc.

"The Young Person in Pink." By the Author of "The Woman in White."

"The Tale of the Household." By the Author of "The Head of the Family."

"Wealth, Wile-Hunting, and Womanscrift." By the Authoress of "Health, Husband, and Handicraft."

"Droll Buildings." By the Author of "Gryll Grange," etc.

"Enormous Realizations." By the Author of "Great Expectations," and other works.

59 Fleet Street, E.C.

BRITISH LION SHOWS HIS TEETH.
SECRETARY SEWARD LOOKS UP HIS TOOTH EXTRACTOR.

A WARNING TO SERVANT-MAIDS.

A certain young woman in service did dwell;
The place Wolverhampton, a true tale to tell.
She was mingling, one Sunday, her master's door nigh,
When lo and behold a young workman came by!

He seemed a respectable sort of young man,
Going after his beer, as he carried a can.
He said unto her, "Why art thou stickin' there?"
She answered, "I'm not, sir, I should do better."
So after some talking and chaffing about,
She invited him in while her master was out.
How many there is as will open the door
To them as they never set eyes on before!

Down they went to the kitchen together straightway;
And he for himself had got so much to say,
That, in his persuasion inclining her ear,
He filled up his can with her master's own beer.

Thereafter he kissed her, which she did return;
And her master, who was in a mood also to be,
Whereupon he prevailed of her desk to get hold,
Containing the postal half a sovereign in gold.

He asked her to lend it; she answered him, "No!"
To which he remarked, "You'll be forced to do so."
Then away from her bound and her knife-bottle too!
Which having accomplished, he bade her adieu.

Upon the next Sunday she met him again,
And axed him to give back her property in vain.
He told her 'twas spent; she would see in no sense:
No doubt he'd served others the same way before.

So thinking it wisest to make a clean breast,
To her master she went, and he grieved and confessed:
He, missing his German pipe, found, to his grief,
The same had been likewise purloined by the thief.

Him, being detected, they had up in Court,
Or her, as a witness, the lawyers made sport:
But she was rewarded by the master's own vigor
With whom she was foolish enough to collogue.

Now all you young women whose masters is out,
Don't let in the first young man tempting shows,
For fear it should bring you to shame and disgrace,
And lose you your virtue, and answer your place.

GOLDEN SANDS IN TIDE'S HOUR-GLASS.—A strong-minded lady (a very light "blue") was asked what an "Educational Object" was? when she replied, "It need have not the smallest notion, my dear, but I conjecture that every Phase of Progress must be composed of nothing but Educational Minutes."

ADVICE TO MATCH-MAKING MAMMAS.—The first and only thing requisite is wealth; as Mrs. Glass very nicely says, "First catch your Hein."

NURSERY RHYMES FOR YOUNG AMERICA.

I.

He's a good boyey-poyey.
A pity he is so nosey;
He's a Secessionist
Show capital imps,
So crow along, boyey-poyey.

There was a boy of thriftiness who, being wondrous wise,
Put many in his copy-book a penny for to learn.
And when he found his cash was gone, with all his might and main
He went and wrote another form and took it out again.

VERY THIN-SKINNED.—Why does a certain eminent novelist dislike Quakers?—Because he objects to any one being of but little style.

The late Mr. Pat Lalor, who sat in Parliament for a short time as M.P. for an Irish county, was as inveterate a joker as ever took his seat in the House of Commons. When a new Parliament was elected, Mr. Peave, the Quaker, and the late Mr. Edward Baines were among the members returned to the House. "Indeed, Ned," said honest Pat, in his comic brogue, to a friend on his right, "they're getting very particular when it comes to up some new members—in the shape of Pays and Baines."

The late Mr. Nicholas Aylward Vigors, some time MP. for Carlow, was an F.R.S. and an eminent naturalist, and for many years honorary secretary of the Zoological Society. Some fast-and-loose years ago he was ejected from the representation of that constituency by Colonel Bruen. He wished on Sir Dyonis Sampson's vacant friend remarked, a propos of the circumstances, that Vigors need not have gone very far from his favorite Zoological Gardens in the Regent's Park to see Bruin at the top of the pole.

James Smith ("Rejected Addresses") gave the following reason for the election of Gully, the boxer, for Punch-Fruit:

"You ask me the cause that made Punchfruit sully
The fame by returning a Pugilist Gully?
The etymological cause, I suppose, is
That he broke the bridges of many noses."

If you use a fire-arm, take care that in shooting off your arm you don't shoot off your head.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Why are the bars of a convent like a blacksmith's apron?
Because they keep off the sparks.
Why should a quill pen never be used for writing secret matter?
Because it is apt to split.
When may oysters be said to be dump?
When it is one (one) in the morning, and missed (mist) in the evening.
When is love deformed?
When it is all on one side.
My first is the threshold of a door;
My second an article of food;
My whole is a thing we can do without:
My whole one of the United States?
Met-ap-tor-emphatic-ally-know.
Why is conscience like the check-string in a carriage?
Because it is an inward pull on the outward man.
Why is a short-waisted lady like a tall woman like an habitual going up Vesuvius?
Like a trying to get to the mouth of the crater (creature).
Why is a four-quart measure like a side-saddle?
Because it holds a gal-on (a gallon).
Why is a rose-bush like a poem on marriage?
Because he is averse (a verse) to matrimony.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

THE ENEMY RETIRING.

INFORMATION was received on the 15th that the entire rebel force lately stationed at Leesburg had been withdrawn, even to the sick and wounded. Tents and baggage with their pickets were withdrawn from Vienna and in front of Fairfax Court-House. A balloon reconnoissance on the 16th discovered no rebels anywhere this side of Fairfax, and but few there. The impression now is that Lee is believed to be with the right resting on the Potomac at Aquia Creek, and the left on the Blue Ridge.

A reconnoissance was made on 30th by a force of 2000 men from General Smith's division, with some of Meritt's and Ayres's regulars, to Pine's and Flint Hill, two and a half miles at this side of Fairfax Court House, where they found the rebel force (3,000 men) had been gone, leading to the belief that the main body of their reserve was close by. General M'Clellan, General Franklin, General Porter, Smith, and Hancock, accompanied the expedition, which proceeded as far as Vienna. The rebels had left on the right of that town, on the Leesburg turnpike, without discovering any signs of the enemy having been there.

THE POTOMAC CLOSED.

The Potomac appears at last to have been effectually closed by the rebels. The gun-boat Mount Vernon, which arrived at Washington from below on Wednesday night, reports that the rebels have erected strong fortifications, besides merchant vessels with coal, oysters, and other articles, were lying in the channel. Some twenty shots were fired at the Mount Vernon from the batteries at and near Shipping Point, but none of them struck her. The Pawnee and several other vessels were also fired at. There are three batteries at the lower point, mounting thirteen guns, and another has been discovered on Quantico Hill, a mile and a quarter from it. It is supposed that there is still another at the mouth of Quantico Creek. About seven miles from Shipping Point, shots were also fired upon, and the Pawnee was struck six times yesterday morning by rifle balls.

On Thursday night the Government steamboat Cossack and Leon, having the Long Island and Reliance barges in tow, left the steamers Fairfax and Lady Alan in tow, passed up and down the Fairfax locks here and drifted toward the shore, when the rebels in boats started out and captured the barges at the same time they were fired upon by the shore battery, and being unable to tender any assistance to the Fairfax, which was heavily loaded with hay. The Reliance finally proceeded, with the three steamers in safety, but was detained for the better part of an hour during which time shot a hundred and fifty shot and shell were fired at her. She, as well as the Lady Alan, was struck several times, but no one on board was injured. It is difficult to imagine how a chain of sufficient strength to stop the progress of a steamer could be stretched across the river without the knowledge of some one of the rebels. On Sunday the rebels allowed their coal-one vessels to pass up, only one of which they fired at.

THE ARREST OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

A very important question in relation to the arrest—under the suppression of the habeas corpus—of British subjects, has arisen between the British Government and Mr. Seward in reference to the case of a Mr. Patrick, of New York, and a Mr. Thompson, a boy and servant here from Nassau. Both these parties were sent to Fort Lafayette, but the latter was subsequently released. Lord Lyons takes the ground that the Constitution of the United States does not authorize the arrest or the arbitrary seizure of British subjects except authorized by act of Congress, and he requests of Mr. Seward the British Government against the "irregular proceedings" adopted in these cases, under advice from the legal adviser of the Executive Majesty.

MR. SEWARD'S REPLY.

Mr. Seward replies that the proceedings of which the British Government complains are based in the principles men were taken upon information conveyed to the President by the legal police authorities of the country, and he was not constituted until after he had proceeded the habeas corpus which he found it necessary to suspend, in view of the perils of the State, he deemed necessary. For the exercise of that discretion he, as well as his chief advisers, is responsible by law before the highest judicial tribunal of the republic, and amenable also to the judgment of his countrymen and the enlightened portion of the civilized world. Mr. Seward further reminds Lord Lyons that, although the United States recognize the right of expatriation by the forming of the legal subjects of the British Crown, or the justice of the decision of her Majesty pays to them, nevertheless, the British Government will hardly expect that the President will accept their explanation of the Constitution of the United States, especially when the Constitution itself provides that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus may be suspended by any law-making power in cases of rebellion or invasion, when the public safety may require it. Mr. Seward states that, in his opinion, the present emergency, the supreme law, and so long as the danger shall exist to all classes of society equally, the decision and the citizen must cheerfully acquiesce in the measures which that law prescribes."

THE BELLIGERENTS IN MISSOURI.

General Price is said to have been reinforced by a large body of rebels under Ben McCulloch, and their combined forces are said to be at Osceola, which they have fortified, and where they are awaiting the approach of General Fremont, who, at last accounts (Friday night), was at Warsaw engaged in organizing his forces. However, our whole General Siegel's division had already crossed.

RECAPTURE OF LEXINGTON.

On the 13th October Major White, of the First Missouri Regiment, with one hundred and fifty of his men, surprised the rebel garrison at Lexington, and recaptured the piece and all the sick and wounded Union prisoners. Major White also captured two cannon, a quantity of guns, pistols, and other articles which the rebels in their flight threw away.

THE FIGHT AT BOLIVAR.

Early in the morning of the 16th the rebels showed themselves on Bolivar Heights, overlooking the ferry, and commenced an attack with cannon upon three companies of the Thirteenth Massachusetts, stationed there. Gould, stood on the north side of the river. The firing was kept up for about three hours, when the steamer Ohio and Wisconsin crossed the river, charged upon the enemy, and succeeded in capturing one of their cannon. A subsequently arrested in good order to the river, as they were relieved by the Seventeenth and Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania, and, under command of Col. Geary, charged again upon the enemy, driving them from their position, and recapturing the cannon—a Dunbar cannon—which they had formerly returned across the river. Our forces had but three pieces of artillery, two of them on the north side of the river, while the enemy had seven pieces, together with a force of infantry and five hundred cavalry. They were completely routed, and driven back some three miles. Our loss was about seven killed and seventy-one, with that of the enemy was more than one hundred and fifty, including Colonel Ashby, who was killed in action.

Parties who arrived at Baltimore on 18th from Harper's Ferry report that the rebels had renewed their attack on the Union forces at Point Lookout, on Leesburg and Bolivar Heights, and that the fight was still going on. Major Gould felt confident that he could successfully withstand all rebel reinforcements arrived.

REPORTED NAVAL ENGAGEMENT IN THE MISSISSIPPI.

Information reached us last week from rebel sources, via the Norfolk Examiner, of a naval engagement between the rebel vessels off New Orleans, under command of Captain Hollins, in the ram Manassas, and the United States blockading squadron, in which Captain Hollins claims that he sunk Farragut and drove the remainder of the squadron and sunk the sloop of war Preble with his iron-clad vessel. Captain Hollins claims the affair took place on the 12th, and reports that the fight lasted an hour, that he sunk the Preble with his iron-clad vessel, and destroyed them well."

The Petersburg (Virginia) Express publishes Captain Hollins's official dispatch, and then proceeds to give details of the action. It says that the fight took place on the 12th, ram against the Preble and sunk her without firing a gun. The whole fleet of Federal vessels are said to have come to injury to her iron-cased sides. She then turned on the other two vessels, and they left their fleet and went to the west aground. The Preble, it is said, can not be raised. According to the Express a large quantity of provisions, arms, and ammunition were taken by the Confederates. Fort Orleans surrendered on the night of the 14th in honor of the presumed victory.

ESCAPE OF THE "NASHVILLE."

The steamer Nashville, which succeeded to have run the blockade as Charleston and sailed for Europe, with James M. Mason, of Virginia, Confederate Commissioner to England, and John Slidell, of Louisiana, Commissioner to France, on board. It is reported by Robert F. Bunch, a grau, who was a lieutenant in the United States naval service, which he resigned in 1861, that the Nashville is a side-wheel steamer, 1120 tons burden, and was built in this city in 1853. She was originally owned by Charleston merchants, and has a pivot gun and seven broadside guns.

Per contra, it is stated in the Richmond Enquirer of the 19th that the Nashville sailed safely out of the port of Charleston in the Nashville, and that that steamer is still in the port of Charleston.

THE EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Government has at last virtually, though not directly, consented to an exchange of prisoners taken in battle or rebels, in custody at Washington and in this harbor—a measure recommended by General Dix, and which was released at Richmond on parole, and sent home under a flag of truce by way of Fortress Monroe—leaving the rebels to take up arms against the Government. The proposition was submitted to Washington Wednesday night by the Government; those released here were selected by the officer commanding the post.

IMPORTANT ORDER TO GENERAL FREMONT.

The Secretary of War has issued an important order addressed to General Fremont, which matters connected with that officer's command in the Department of the West. In this order the Secretary directs us to make the following officers, and are not to be transferred to irregularities service, or to leave the State without permission of the President, and are not under bonds. In the next place, he directs that the order for erection of forts were erected St. Louis and Jefferson City to be discontinued. The erection of barracks is also forbidden, and the order also directs the attention of General Fremont is further directed to the fact that the officers of General Lane's command have been committing depredations upon Union people in Western Missouri.

OUR SEA-COAST DEFENSES.

Secretary Seward has addressed a circular to Governor Morgan, and the Governors of other States, and a special board, recommending that the State authorities take measures to protect the fortifications and other harbor defenses—the expenses to be reimbursed by the General Government at some future period.

A TELEGRAPH TO SALT LAKE CITY.

A telegraphic dispatch, sent on 18th from Great Salt Lake City, the capital of the territory of Utah, was published in the papers of 19th as received from Brigham Young by Hon. J. H. Wade, President of the Pacific Telegraph Company, in Cleveland. The great Apostle of the Saints announces the fact that the line is built, and has succeeded, but is firm for the Constitution and the laws.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

BREAD TROUBLES.

CONSIDERABLE agitation existed in some of the Paris faubourgs on account of the high price of bread. Seditious placards were numerous, and some arrests had been made. Very formal precautions are stated to be not of employment in Lyons, and the authorities were taking measures to provide for them. The Rhone was reported very low in a very uncertain state. A protracted Cabinet Council had been held, at which the Emperor presided, and at which grain and bread furnished the principal topics of discussion.

PRINCE NAPOLEON'S REPORT ON THIS COUNTRY.

Prince Napoleon is now engaged on a tour of observation in this country, is said to have transmitted to the French Emperor an important State paper relative to American affairs. The character of the paper is not precisely known.

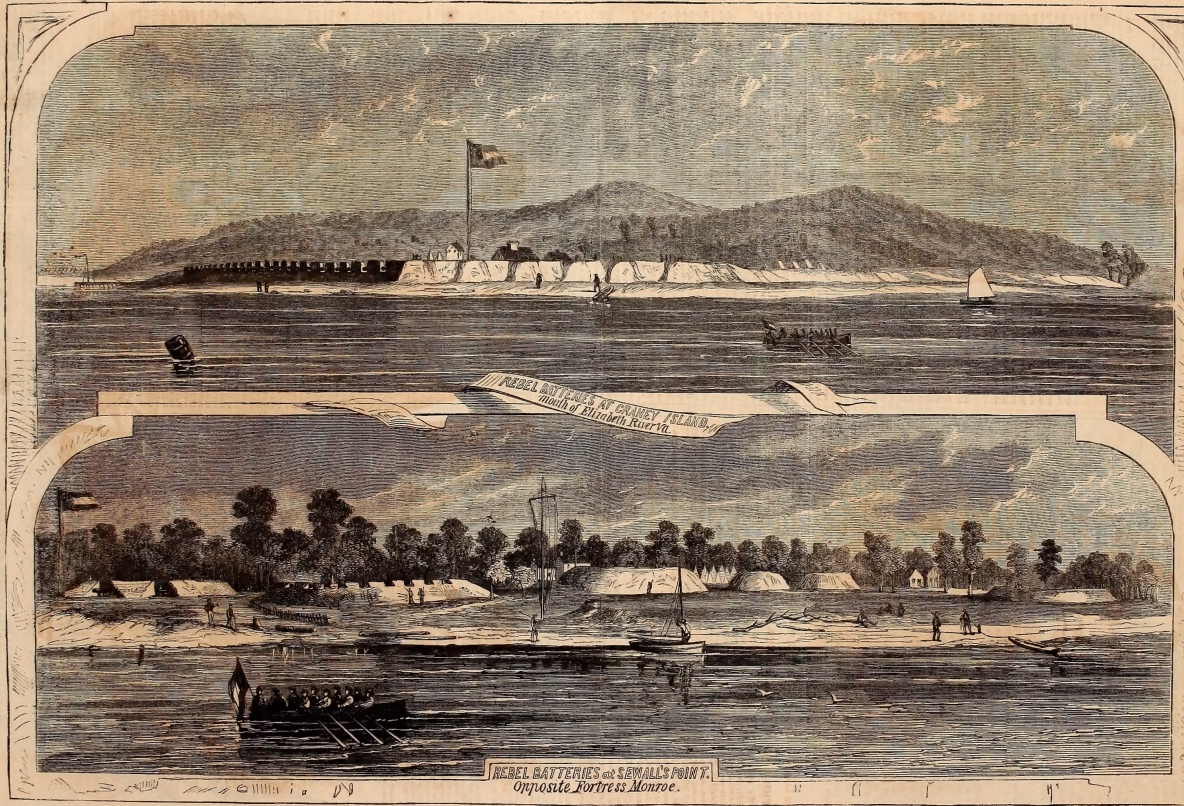
MOVEMENTS OF NOTABLES.

The King of Prussia has paid a private visit to Napoleon at Compiegne. The meeting is said to have been cordial. The King of Holland was expected in France on the 11th of October. Garibaldi has left Caprera, but his destination is unknown.

ITALY.

THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

From Italy we have the assurance that the relations of the Italian and French Governments are as satisfactory as possible, and that the delay in the settlement of the Roman question is due to the competency of the Pope on the part of France for a session of Italian territory. The Pope, at a recent Consistory, is said to have denounced compromise in the strongest terms.



THE REBEL BATTERIES ON SEWALL'S POINT AND CRANEY ISLAND.—FROM AUTHENTIC SKETCHES JUST TAKEN.—[SEE PAGE 699.]

THE LATE GENERAL E. D. BAKER, KILLED IN BATTLE OCTOBER 21, 1861.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE LATE GENERAL BAKER.

We publish herewith, from a photograph by Brady, a portrait of the late GENERAL BAKER, who fell gallantly at the head of his brigade, at the battle near Leesburg, on 21st October. General Edward D. Baker was a native of the State of Illinois, and a great personal friend of President Lincoln. He was a representative in Congress from Illinois during the years 1846 and 1847, and was subsequently Senator for the new State of Oregon. General Baker's military career shows that this is not his first campaign, for we find that in July, 1846, he was Colonel of the Fourth Regiment of twelve months' Illinois Volunteers in the Mexican war, and commanded the brigade of General Shields after his fall. He distinguished himself at the battle of Cerro Gordo. He received his discharge in May, 1847. In a military capacity he was not again known until the present troubles commenced, when at the monster meeting in Union Square he ascended the principal platform and boldly announced that, if he could get only a few followers, he would as boldly go forth and battle for the Union. How the words of the white-haired Senator told upon the loyal citizens of the North time has already proven. He organized the California regiment and led it to the field. When offered a Brigadier and even a Major Generalship, he refused both, preferring to lie at the head of the regiment he had organized; and although acting in this battle as a General, he was simply the Colonel of the First California Regiment which started from this city.

THE LATE COLONEL SMITH.

We publish herewith a portrait of the late COLONEL ALBE. SMITH, who commanded the Thirteenth Regiment New York State Militia during their recent three months' campaign, and who met his death so unexpectedly last week at Mechanicsville, in this State.

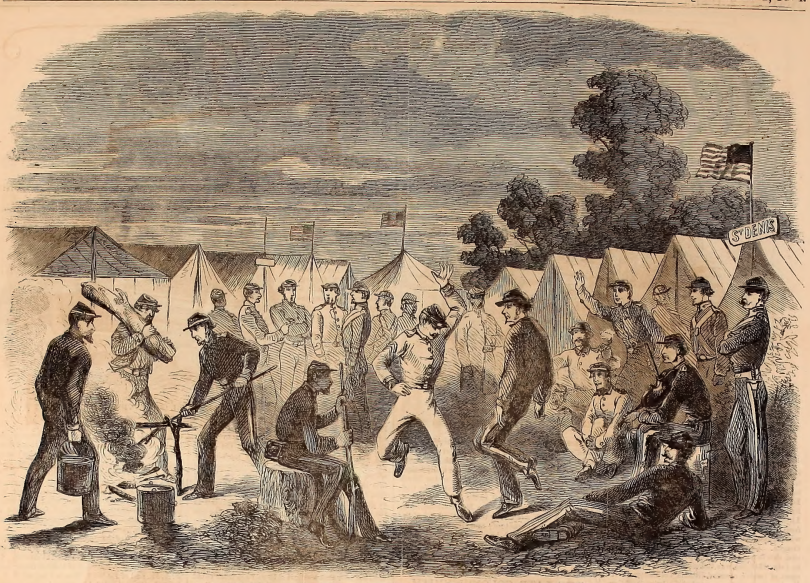
Colonel Smith was an old resident of Brooklyn, and was greatly respected. On his return from his three months' service he undertook to reorganize the Thirteenth Regiment for the war. We quote from the Herald:

"He was one of the first to respond to the call of the President, and proceeded to Annapolis with his regiment, of which post he was the commander for a time. He then, as on previous occasions, displayed great courage and discretion, and discharged his onerous duties to the entire satisfaction of the War Department. For several weeks past Colonel Smith had been actively engaged in reorganizing the Thirteenth Regiment, numbers of which, who were ardently attached to their Colonel, having rejoined his command; and it was in the act of rallying his men together that he met with the accident which, after a few hours of suffering, occasioned his death. The Colonel left New York last week for Whitehall, where a number of recruits were waiting to be conveyed to Brooklyn for his regiment. On reaching Mechanicsville, early on Friday morning, he got out, that place being but a short distance from where the friends of his wife reside. In getting into the railroad car, while the train was in motion, he slipped his foot, and the concussion was so great that terrible fractures were produced in the shoulder, arms, and legs. As soon as the car passed over he raised himself up, and supposing that he was not seriously injured, he tore his coat-sleeve off with the hand which was not injured, at the same time remarking, 'I guess I am not hurt a great deal.' He was immediately conveyed to the hotel near by, and though every thing was done for him that medical skill and kindness could suggest, he died in the afternoon of the same day. The mother of the late gallant Colonel Ellsworth was in attendance, and did all in her power to alleviate the sufferings of Colonel Smith—stimulated, no doubt, by the remembrance of the sad end of her noble son, whose memory will be ever green in the hearts of all true Americans. It is believed that the Colonel was unconscious during the time that elapsed between his being taken into the hotel and the moment he breathed his last. Intelligence of the accident was promptly communicated to his family, who reside in Lorimer Street, Williamsburgh, and his wife and son (Major Smith) proceeded to Mechanicsville, but arrived too late to see him alive. They accompanied his remains to Brooklyn."

THE LATE COLONEL SMITH, OF THE THIRTEENTH REGIMENT N. Y. S. M. [PHOTOGRAPHED BY L. S. HIGBY, WILLIAMSBURGH, L. I.]

The funeral of the deceased took place on Tuesday, October 22, from the residence of his family, corner of Lorimer and North Second streets. Colonel Smith was a member of Corner Stone Lodge F. A. M., and of De Witt Clinton Chapter R. A. M. Both bodies attended his funeral. His remains were taken to Cypress Hill Cemetery, the Fifth Brigade N. Y. S. M. acting as an escort. The Mayor and Common Council of Brooklyn and a large number of friends attended.

UNIFORM OF COLONEL GEARY'S ARTILLERY (GENERAL BANKS'S DIVISION).—[SEE PAGE 703.]



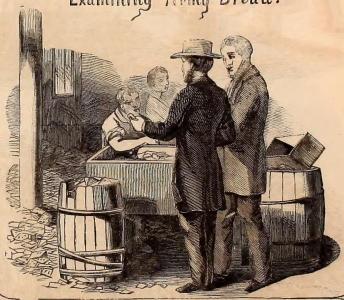
THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—SCENE IN CAMP AFTER EVENING PARADE.

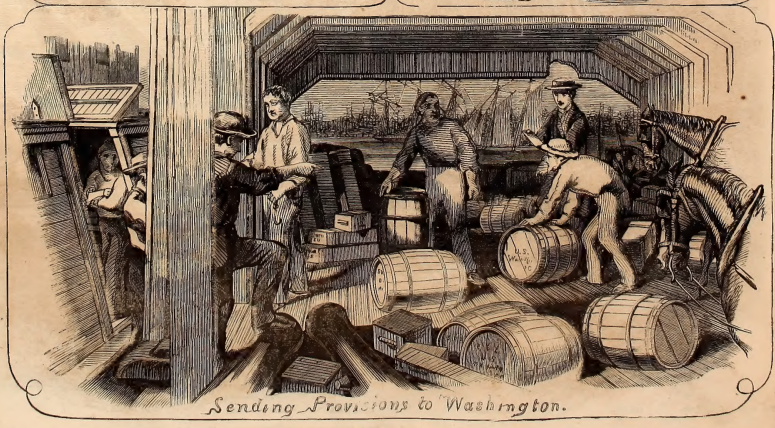
THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—THE PICKET-GUARD.

Testing and Weighing Salted Meats.

Baking Army Bread.

Examining Army Bread.





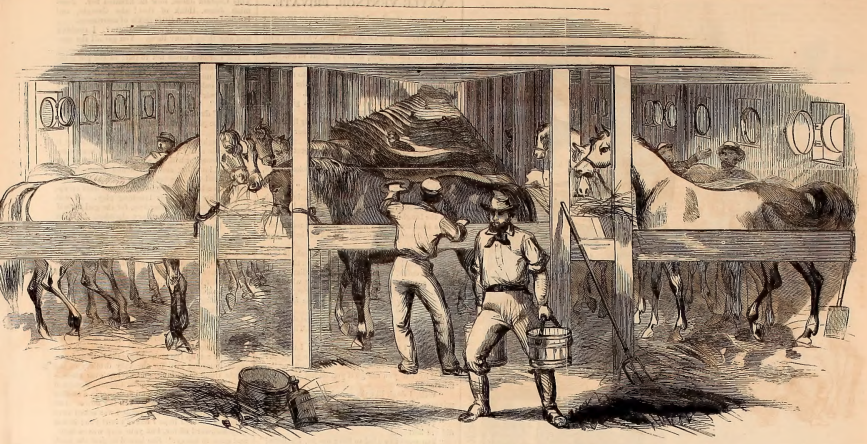
Sending Provisions to Washington.

PROVISIONS FOR THE ARMY.—[SEE PAGE 699.]

SHIPPING HORSES.

Curlew. Ocean Queen Oriental. Baltic. O. M. Pettit. Gem of the Seas. Great Republic. Wabas

THE GREAT N



HORSES IN STALLS BETWEEN DECKS

Seneca. Pembina. Connecticut. Mercury. Lindlin. Augusta. Alabama. James Adger.

L EXPEDITION.

CAMP OF GENERAL HUNTER'S AND GENERAL ASBOTH'S DIVISIONS (GENERAL FREMONT'S ARMY), AT TIPTON, MISSOURI.—[SKETCHED BY ALEXANDER SIMPSON.]

VAYLE VENTNOR, PRIVATE.

THE music wandered off from Flowtow to nearer home, playing the "Star-Spangled Banner" in bold breezy bursts. The large, long hall was filled with the sweet sharp shocks of the cymbals, the bright blowing of the bugles, and the great drum-beats rolling through.

People let their thoughts flow forth to meet the music, as suited them best, out upon the piazzas, in the parlors, or in the large, long hall.

Walking up and down the latter, a girl voice went singing the first line,

"Oh say, can you see by the dawn's early light?"

then ceasing, beating her palms together in time with the striking cymbals, she says,

"Oh, isn't it lovely?" lingering in a pretty drawl upon the "lovely."

The gentleman walking beside her looked down, smiling mischief, as he replied,

"Very lovely, Carlotta, sing it again."

"Nonsense! I do not mean my singing. Ah, but you know that I don't!" looking up laughing into the laughing face.

He bent lower, and more meaningly returned,

"But mean the singing. I like it better than the band."

"No, no, don't talk so, but listen—ah, it is divine! divine! better than any music in the world. I don't wonder, listening to it, that soldiers realize all the excitement and not the danger when they march to the battle-field to such inspiring strains. Raymond, how did you feel when the men were dropping round you at Manassas?"

"Oh, as most men feel; after the first shock and dread passes the nerves grow steady. Thus easily we get careless of human lives."

"Ah no, I do not think it is that; I think the soul rises to the occasion. But will you go again?"

"If I can get a commission, yes; if not, no."

"Why will you not go if you do not get a commission?"

"Well, I don't like the associations generally as private. It's too hard work, and if I risk my life I want to choose the way."

"Yes, I see," she answered, absently, as if she did not half see."

"You would be glad to have me go, Carlotta?" bending again, with eager interest. She knew what he meant, and a little color of crimson fused into the faint pink cheek, and she unfurled her fan with a quick, nervous slide, as she replied.

"I would be glad for every man to go that can, specially those without wives and children."

"They may have mothers; you forget that," he said, with an irritated, jeering sort of a laugh.

But she was very serious, almost solemn, as she returned,

"Yes, that is very true; I didn't forget. My brother went, you know; and he goes again, with our mother's consent."

"I know." That was all he said, but it was said in softer accents, under conviction.

Then in a moment more he began,

"And the tie of a lover, Carlotta." A little tinkling clash, and the pretty pearl fan was lying broken upon the floor, making grievous interruption. Swinging it to and fro, it had swung far out, and fell at a gentleman's feet who was sitting on one of the side couches. He brought it to her, and received a little airy "Thank you," and a smile of which her companion looked envious.

"I wonder who he is?" she exclaimed, watching the "gentleman" as he returned down the hall. "I've noticed him sitting there all the evening."

"Have you?" with satiric emphasis, to which she paid no attention, but went on heedlessly:

"Yes; and did you see what an air he has—how loftily he carries his head? Military, too, do you notice? He must be a new arrival."

"Very likely," was the reply, crossly enough now, and snapping two or three more sticks of the fan he had taken from her. Whereupon such a cunning little smile went flashing whiter pearls than he held into view, and a pair of merry brown eyes dropped their white curtains, for modesty's sake.

The gentleman who had been the innocent cause of all this, from his place on one of the side couches, observed the pantomime of the conversation with an odd smile curling his heavy mustache. It was evident that he understood.

On the next morning Miss Carlotta Delevan—in other words, Miss Charlotte, the sweet Spanish rendering being the work of her Cuban nurse—might have been seen, somewhere after breakfast, when the halls are mostly vacant, running her little finger down the list of arrivals, as she leaned over the office-desk.

There were Smiths, and Smythes, and aristocratic Howards, and Vans, and the Parisian De', but only one military Captain Jones; and following this, making it more noticeable from the sharp contrast of euphony, was one name, the last, Vayle Ventnor.

"Vayle Ventnor!" She ran it over in her mind. The oddest name in the world. But she had found what she sought; her military hero of the lofty carriage was Captain Jones. So, satisfied, she went sauntering out upon the piazza and met the military hero, "Captain Jones," sauntering too. She dropped her pretty head in pretty remembrance, and received a most graceful "reverence" in return; then with gentlemanly courtesy he turned off from his walk, leaving her alone.

So she sauntered slowly, thinking, "There's something fine about the man—not so handsome though as Raymond Mays; horrid name too, 'Jones!' Heigh-ho!" yawning; "I wish I had the morning's paper. Ah! there comes Raymond; I'll ask him. Raymond," nodding and smiling her greeting, "is that the paper you have? Yes? Thank you!" nodding again, and dropping into a chair to unfold and look it over, talking meanwhile to Raymond, who seated himself near.

Looking down a list of soldiers, what should she come upon but those two names again. First, among the officers, "Jeremiah Jones, Captain;" then, lower down, "Vayle Ventnor, Private." This Captain Jones, how he haunted her. Jeremiah Jones, think of that! she thought, and laughed outright, a little tinkle of merriment.

"What is it so funny, Carlotta? I couldn't find any thing funny there. You get all the sunshine of life. What is it?" bending over.

But Carlotta chose not to tell; so she put a little slim hand between his eyes and the paper, saying, with merry malice, "Curious?"

"No; only interested in what interests you. I want to catch your sunny way. Can't you teach me how?"

"Yes," demurely, "I'll teach you to catch it," rolling the paper into a ball, and tossing it lightly to him.

He caught the paper and the fun too, tossing it back again softly. And to and fro they kept it going a moment, until, in a backward bend of her head, all laughing and flushed and breeze-ruffled as the head was, she received a glance of admiration from a bearded face looking down from an upper window upon their laughing play. It was sheer admiration, nothing less, for the girl herself in all her bright momentary abandon. As she met it her color rose naturally; she dropped her eyes to raise them again furtively, but the gazer had withdrawn.

Captain Jones again. It was very funny.

And then there rushed over her mind—"CAPTAIN JEREMIAH JONES!" and another little peal of laughter tinkled forth.

"What does possess you, is Carlotta, this morning?" young Mays questioned, smilingly.

She drew a long face, and answered,

"Captain Jeremiah Jones possesses me, Raymond!" And flinging down the paper, she ran away, tinkling forth her laugh again to her hearer's utter mystification.

So she ran up the stairs, along the halls and passages, laughing still for the very drollery of the whole thing—laughing, and saying over gleefully, "Captain Jeremiah Jones, Captain Jeremiah Jones," when Captain Jeremiah Jones, in a sudden turn around a corner, nearly ran her down. Off came the plumed hat, and pardon was asked very humbly, with "I hope I haven't hurt you; it was very awkward of me, but your step was so light, and mine so heavy." She leaned against the wall, not hurt, but so startled that she couldn't speak for a moment.

She was hurt, then, he thought, and very gravely and respectfully he approached to offer some assistance, when she regained herself, and, explaining, sped away. Bursting into her room, the persistent oddity of the affair overcame her again, and she flung herself in another peal of laughter upon the bed. Her mother looked up in amaze, asking Raymond's question: "What does possess you, Carlotta?" With a little silver shout she answered, "Captain Jeremiah Jones possesses me, mamma;" and as soon as she was able to speak further she gave "mamma" a history of her adventures with the above gentleman. "Mamma" took the sunshine of life like her daughter; so there were a pair of laughers when she had ended.

The unconscious cause of all this, standing at the office lighting a cigar, heard the merriment, and, recognizing one voice, wondered what it was about.

After dinner a servant handed her a card: "Ward Wyman." She ran down gleefully, for Ward Wyman was an old friend, and there she found him in close conversation with Captain Jeremiah Jones, who was for turning away as the lady approached, but stood at the peremptory command of Mr. Wyman, and the words, "I want you two to know each other. Carlotta, this is my friend Ventnor—Vayle Ventnor, Miss Charlotta Delevan." The gentleman bowed lowly, "was very happy, etc.;" but Carlotta was too amazed to say a word, and all the while trying in vain to control the merriment that dimpled round her mouth. Through her mind went running, "Captain Jeremiah Jones!"

That night when Mays, Raymond Mays, came up to their hotel she had to tell him the whole story: it was too funny to keep. How he laughed! "Why, you little goose, can't you tell an officer's dress from a private's?"

"No, indeed; how should I?" she answered.

"Ventnor? Ventnor?" he repeated. "Ward"—to Wyman, who was just passing—"who is this fellow?"

"What fellow?"

"This Ventnor?"

Ward Wyman twinkled with suppressed amusement.

"This fellow, Mays, is the son of Richmond Ventnor, whose house you visited with me, in Paris, five years ago."

"The dickens it is! What in the world is his son serving merely as a private for?"

"You must ask him."

"Why his income must be a small fortune, and his associations in family advantages such that he might have almost any post. What does he mean?"

Thus, in his surprise, Raymond Mays ran on, unconscious that he was adding still more interest to the quondam Captain in the mind of Carlotta.

He saw his mistake by-and-by, when the hand struck up "Die Schonbrunner," and passing by, Vayle Ventnor, encouraged by the cordial smile that greeted him from Carlotta, approached and asked her, "Would she honor him with two or three turns?" adding, apologetically, "that he was exercising a fit cavalier for a lady in his rough soldi r's costume." But Carlotta thought differently, and said something very pretty and patriotic to him as she accepted the invitation. The fact was, Carlotta was wild with curiosity to know how such a Fortune favorite came to be in his present po ition, as "Vayle Ventnor, Private;" and so she determined to follow up the acquaintance till she had established her Eve-like propensity. It wasn't a pleasant waltz to one person there. Raymond Mays stood chewing the cud of bitter reflection. Poor Mays! he thought he was dying for Carlotta Delevan; and perhaps he was, but it would be an easy death—because Mays never took any thing hardly, not even the small-pox, which once visited him, leaving one white mark on the side of his handsome nose.

It wasn't pleasant to see Ventnor's splendid sliding ease of step as he whirled past with Carlotta. If he had made a bungle of it he could have forgiven him, but that perfect movement defied criticism. After the waltz the two strolled out upon the piazza, and here suddenly the gentleman reeled, and would have fallen, had it not been for the slight little arm that was linked within his. He sat down, and presently explained.

"I have been ill, Miss Delevan, and the change of air after the exercise made me head sick."

"Oh, you are off on furlough, getting well?" she asked, with some satisfaction.

"Exactly," he replied, and a little amused at her direct simplicity, "off on furlough, getting well—that is just it, Miss Delevan."

She colored a little—had she been too curious? But his manner was very frank and kind, so her mind eased itself, and the talk flowed so readily that she found it was eleven o'clock before she knew it. Rising to go to, she said to him:

"Come to our private parlor, Mr. Ventnor, and let me present you to my mother: she will be glad to make you comfortable if you are an invalid, and to ask you about the army, for our Will's sake."

He thanked her lightly. He liked the cordial freedom of her invitation, and told her how glad he would be to come.

So it came to pass that morning after morning "Vayle Ventnor, Private," might be seen half-sitting, half-reclining, upon Mrs. Delevan's own particular lounge in her own particular private parlor. On one of these mornings Carlotta was enlightened.

It began in this way: She had picked up an old paper, and her eye fell upon the two names again in a roll-call—"Vayle Ventnor, Private," and "Jeremiah Jones, Captain."

She laughed with the gleeful memory—then told him the whole story; but the telling is too naive to lose.

To his question, "What is it so funny, Miss Delevan?" she replied,

"Why, you must know that when you first arrived, this paper was picked up by—by fun, you remember, I thought you were Captain Jeremiah Jones."

"You thought—how should you think that?"

"Well, you see, when you restored my fan that night I remarked to Raymond Mays, as you went back to your seat, that you were military. The next morning, as I was looking over the list of arrivals, I came upon the two names—'Captain Jones and Vayle Ventnor;' and I supposed, of course, that you were the officer, as I had no knowledge of military dress-distinction, and there was but one military prefix, and I remembered your coolly speaking to some regiment. Do you see?"

"Yes, I see," he answered, trying not to smile at her straight simplicity.

"But who in the world is 'Captain Jones'—Captain Jeremiah Jones?" she suddenly asked. "I haven't thought of the real Captain actually since I discovered my mistake—how funny!"

He returned the next day after his arrival—you probably didn't see him. He is from the Captain of my company—a good fellow, and an excellent officer. But let me ask another question: How did you happen this time to be 'private?'"

"Why, I saw it in a paper—like this," and she handed him the one she held to him—then followed other little remarks—as the morning or the stairs, etc., till at last Carlotta asked a plump question, coloring prettily all the time,

"I wish to know how you came to be serving as 'Private'—will you tell me?"

"Why not so especially?"

"Because Will says you are rich and aristocratic. Richmond Ventnor's son."

He laughed.

"Yes, it is very true. I am rich and aristocratic, as the saying goes, and Richmond Ventnor's son; but what has that to do with it?" he concluded, determining to clear her out. She made her eyes very round at this; and then repeated the usual objections—the usual reasons why rich and influential men do not serve as "privates"—Raymond Mays's objections and reasons.

He heard her through, then his whole face changed, and he broke it toward her, and his light laughing words of a moment since changed to perfect seriousness as he answered:

"Miss Delevan, I hear the news reached me of my country's peril I was in Paris at my father's house. A steamer sailed on the next day for America. I went, very precipitately and unlike it is. My life had been a student's life: I knew nothing whatever of military drill; but I was able and strong, from being a good gymnast—so I set myself to learn my new trade by enlisting as a private at once."

"But you have been serving three months—surely you have some experience now?" she interposed.

"It hasn't made a good soldier of me yet, at all events. I have much to learn before I shall think myself fitted to command in any degree. In the mean time, the country calls for a larger army, and because I am unfitted for an officer, shall I wait at such a time for a commission?"

"But you would not have to wait, with your connections in the military and political world," she said; not half seeing yet his modesty—his manliness.

"No, I would not have to wait, it is very true," he exclaimed, with some sarcasm. "Miss Delevan," sitting upright now, and lighting with scorn, "I am sick and ashamed of the shallow advantages of position—of the miserable presuming expectations that grow out of it. It is continually putting men in the wrong place, and building up gigantic errors—such errors as we are to-day striving to amend. It humiliates me to think that to my position in the world do I owe perhaps any advancement, instead of to my own strength and powers as a man. I long sometimes to throw off these 'circumstances,' and for a time to meet the world face to face, and on its own terms. But pardon me for boring you with my theories;" and he sank back upon the lounge again to silence.

So Carlotta was enlightened.

As she sat there in the silence she pondered what she had heard. This did not sound like Raymond Mays; yet, certainly this was a brave fellow, and a manly one. She had never heard any one talk like this before; but it struck an answering chord in her nature. Of course she liked him better for it. He thought she didn't understand—that he had bored her with his earnestness on what he supposed were to her dry subjects; but in fact he looked upon her as only a sweeter specimen of the young lady genus, that bloomed in fashionable society.

By-and-by she said, in a dreamy, absent manner, as she sat, with her cheek leaning in her hand:

"I wish you would talk in this way to Raymond Mays."

"Why to Raymond Mays?" he questioned, in surprise.

"Oh," still dreamily, thoughtfully, "he is waiting for a commission. He says he don't like the associations of a private"—that it is too hard labor, and too generalizing; that if he is going to risk his life, he means to do it in a manner that is most agreeable to him."

"Personal ambition! that is it; it stands in the way of the whole thing. Every man for himself, instead of a people—a million of men. . . . But are you anxious for Mr. Mays to go?" and he bore looked at her rather curiously.

"I am anxious for all men to go who can," as I told him.

"As you told him? But pardon me."

"I have nothing to pardon in that. But why do you ask it?"

"I was surprised."

"Surprised! I am not curious. What is there surprising in that?"

Miss Delevan, I wish you would let me ask you a blunt question."

"I will."

"Are you not engaged to Mr. Mays?"

"Engaged to Raymond Mays? No. What put such a thought in your mind?"

"I can hardly tell; but I somehow receive the impression."

"And that is why you were surprised that I told him I was anxious for all men to go! Mr. Ventnor, I have never talked very earnestly upon any matter with Mr. Mays; you, not because I have doubted your earnestness, but because I have met so few persons who feel just as I do upon many things that I do. I am not anxious for Mr. Mays to avowal a moment since, I know you will understand me when I say that, were I engaged to Mr. Mays, I could not tell him that I was anxious for this issue, even awaiting a commission," she concluded, smiling. He looked at her with a new expression. His was true, and he told her so.

"I don't know," she went on, thoughtfully. "Sometimes I think perhaps it is because I haven't been tried in that peculiar manner. Women whose husbands and lovers have gone, and to whom I have expressed this, say I am unwomanly, or that it is because I have no call upon them."

"It is because you are unselfish!" he exclaimed, with energy. "That is the mistake half the women make. They are selfish, because they are selfless and unselfishness, where the heart is concerned. And you, Miss Delevan, are the first woman I ever met who is not selfish."

The honest admiration with which he regarded her at this point was unmistakable. It pleased her, of course, and she showed it by saying, simply, "I am so glad you think so."

He gave a quick look into her face. Such a mixture of frankness, reserve, he couldn't make out Miss Delevan. He presently said,

"Carlotta!" Then, recollecting, "Pardon me, Miss Delevan."

She waved her hand at him deprecatingly, and interrupted with, "No, no; call me Carlotta. I like people to call me Carlotta."

What was she about to say? I like people—I like to call me Carlotta? He wished he knew.

"But as I was resumed, "what you were going to say to Carlotta."

"Oh, just a fact which may sound like mere complement, but which I assure you is not, viz: that to-day I thought you something sweeter than most young ladies; but now you stand to me as a type of what women should be."

"Oh, that is a great deal to say; but I think you mean it as you assert."

"Yes, I mean it, Carlotta; and more—go on as you have to me; talk out such sentiments. Be brave and honest and true to whatever convictions you may have, however unpopular they may be. Will you?"

He was very earnest—not gallant as Raymond Mays would have been—but in hearty earnest for the truth's sake.

"I will try," she answered. Then she thought, "He called me Carlotta—how sweet it sounds! He is certainly very fine, and handsomer than Raymond Mays!"

Alas for Raymond Mays! Two or three more days went by, and the band played, and the carriages rolled, and people took life gayly in sound of the guns, and of surging and retreating fleets of fashion. In this time "Vayle Ventnor, Private," became better acquainted with la Carlotta. From the text of that morning they had gone on into the deeper waters of existence—had talked finer and freer, and thus discovered much more of each other.

In the mean time Raymond Mays, handsome fellow!—much handsomer he is known than Vayle Ventnor—mean time he chafed and fretted inwardly at this ripening acquaintance, and outwardly conducted himself in a most disdainful manner toward the former gentleman.

"The girl's head is turned with his wealth and position!" he blustered one night to Ward Wayman.

"No, no, Mays, be generous; I don't think that of Carlotta: besides, you don't know Ventnor—you won't know him; that's all it. There was never a finer fellow in the world."

Mays sneered and turned away.

It happened that very night that he was present at a club-room, and heard a conversation between Ventnor and another, wherein Ventnor gave his reasons and opinions pretty much as he had done before Carlotta Delevan.

Still Mays sneered and scoffed.

The conversation was interrupted off, a lieutenant of the regular army suddenly said,

"Here is Mays now who is waiting, and with better reason than most. Mays was in the Crimea, you know."

"No, I didn't know."

"Yes, he was in Europe at the time, and joined the allied forces out of sheer blood-thirstiness, I believe. Isn't it so, Mays? Here, come out of your corner, and tell us all about it."

Mays "came out," saying there was nothing to tell, modestly and a little crossly.

But Ventnor, with a courteous, and genial and frank, there was no resisting; so Mays told them all about it" that he knew.

"Berge says you were the best-drilled soldier of all the volunteers, Mays," the Lieutenant went on, "and that you had at one time the temporary command of a regiment."

"Why, I should think it was easy enough then for you to get a commission," one said.

Mays shrugged his shoulders, and retorted, "Bah! I haven't influential friends in the right department, you know."

Vayle Ventnor put forth in the same indignant protest that he had brought forward upon another occasion, and when he had ended there was a disconcerted pause around his firm-set mouth that told of a purpose.

When Raymond Mays left the club-room that night it was with the intention to Friendly not to Ventnor's cordial "Good-night!"

A few days more and the furlough would have expired. "Vayle Ventnor, Private," was a sound, hearty man again. There was no excuse now for delay, though he had gone to the Schuylkill every morning, memorizing strains, and the Star-Spangled Banner rolled through the halls.

Whistling the latter tunfor to get the former out of his head, he was rushing up the stairs and round a corner—that fatal corner—when swift came a silk gown and flutter of lace. He opened his arms in a flash—into them he took silk gown and all—all the pretty, pretty wearer. He gathered her up with a little exulting laugh, and set her down, and then he poured forth his love in a torrent of words that he had said, "Carlotta, le my Carlotta, you little darling!" and she had promised that she would.

"So you are engaged, Carlotta?" Raymond Mays remarked, a short time after this.

"Yes, I am," Raymond answered."

"Well, I give you my congratulations. Carlotta, look here." He handed her an open letter. It was read—an appointment to a Captaincy in the 4th Regiment.

"Oh, I am so glad for you!" she exclaimed. "How came you here?"

"It came by Vayle Ventnor, Private, though he does not know my knowledge of his influence."

Then he told her of a former conversation at the club-room, and how directly after that he received this appointment, through Governor ——— and Colonel ———, with the kind regards of "Vayle Ventnor." "And now, Carlotta, I have offered you my congratulations, I am going to him for the same purpose. I call him friend. He deserves his happiness, for he is a good fellow; but I wish he never had come here after all, Carlotta."

"They say he never will leave got your commission," she answered, slyly.

"But," bending down, "shouldn't have got Carlotta?"

"Oh no, no; we were both too old acquaintances, Raymond. You'll like somebody else much better than you ever did me."

He stoutly denied this possibility; but all the time he was adjusting his spoiled sash with infinite satisfaction to himself, and unto herself, "I'll risk his heart while it leads under that uniform."

He held out his hand. "Good-by, Carlotta; I sail to-night." He tried hard to look miserable, but all in vain.

"Good-by!"

Then suddenly, in a quiet flash of feeling, he bent nearer. The "good-by" was a kiss. She laughed.

"How dare you, Raymond?"

"For old acquaintance' sake, and because next time I see you you will be Mrs. Vayle Ventnor—Private."

REBEL BATTERIES IN THE CHESAPEAKE.

On page 692 we publish views of the new REBEL BATTERIES on the point at Mathias Point and on Cressy Island for the protection of Norfolk. They are thus described in a letter to the Herald:

The rebels are evidently acquiring some nerve. They are very busy at Sewall's Point; twenty large guns are mounted, and they are constantly adding to the number. Two will soon be put in place. At Cressy Island thirty-four guns have been mounted in their early batteries. This piece of work was built for the purpose of preventing shipping from coming up the Potomac. About twelve guns of the largest calibre bear on the approach to the mouth of the river, while seven bear directly on the passage up. It is almost an impossibility to pass this battery, which is beautifully constructed, and is certainly one of the finest pieces of earth-work I ever saw. With a proper force the rebels might be driven out by shell, but it would cost many lives and many vessels to do it. The batteries on Sewall's Point are composed of six distinct batteries—three facing the mouth and two guns in embrasures and one en parapet. The next seaside nine, all in embrasures, which are finished in fine style. The next battery is provided with three guns en barbette. Two of the batteries are built in rifle pits, each mounting one gun en barbette. The next battery mounts two guns en barbette. A heavy gun on a ship carriage planted on the beach completes the line of defence. With a proper management it would be a good matter, comparatively speaking, to drive the rebels out of this line of batteries.

The sawyer gun, on the kip Rogue, can trouble them very badly now. Although I have taken up this subject to-day, I do not wish to be understood that any active steps are to be taken in relation to these points; but as I have had an opportunity lately of having these batteries described to me, I thought it would be a matter of some interest to record the position of the rebels in this locality.

THE "MERRIMAC."

We publish on page 689 an illustration of the STEAMER "MERRIMAC," as she is at present. Our picture is from sketches by an officer who visited it in the following extract from the Herald correspondence from Fortress Monroe:

A mechanic who came over under a flag of truce last evening furnishes us with some very valuable information in relation to the steam frigate Merrimac. He says her hull has been cut down to within three feet of her lightwater mark, and a bomb-proof house built on her gun deck, and that she is not now looked as yet. Her bow and stern have been steel clad, with a projecting angle of iron for the purpose of piercing a vessel. Her armament consists of four eleven-inch navy guns on each side, with one Dahlgren Armstrong a rifle gun bow and stern. She has no masts, and only a pilot-house and smoke-tack are to be seen above the bomb-proof deck. Her draught now is three inches thick and made of wrought iron. He states that in his will say that they do not fear two vessels. The chains also to have worked upon her, and to have lived very near to him very much. He was taken as far as the Navy Yard and interrogated in relation to her, and gave his statement as above.

REBEL BATTERIES ON THE POTOMAC.

We illustrate on page 701 one of the fights which are now occurring daily on the Potomac. It is thus described in a letter in the Herald of 16th October:

The United States gun-boat Seminole, Commander F. Gillis, U.S.N., arrived this morning, bringing intelligence of the engagement with rebel rifled steam at Evanport, on the Potomac River, above Acain Creek. The Seminole left Washington yesterday with the Penguin, the latter being somewhat in advance of the Seminole. As the Pembroke passed the batteries at Evanport she received from a few rebels to see if the rebels would reciprocate, but they did not seem to heed it. But as the Seminole passed the batteries there belonging opened fire on her, throwing rifled shot and shell as hot as a tenemendous rate. She kept steaming on her way, and as soon as possible, throwing in shell among the rebels, verularly unsuspecting. During the engagement she was struck in several places. A heavy shell exploded close under the deck, and knocked a hole in the deck, throwing in large quantities. A ball passed through the rails over the engine-latch, another through the boiler-house, and several more in other parts of the vessel. A rifled ball struck the mainmast, and passed through it with the force of a cannon-ball. Fortunately, however, and will probably be in a few days. A few splinter wounds were all the casualties on board. Some of the rigging was cut by the shot. Captain Gillis reports that there were four boilers of troops marching up the river. Both of them were above Aquia Creek.

HOOPS ARE FED.

This public are but little aware of the extent to which the wants of our army are now supplied by the provision dealers of New York, and the illustration on page 695 will be viewed with interest. Clear it is that this class of our community must be profiting largely by the present state of the nation, whatever may be the amount of injury done to the business of other of our trade. Neither is the public aware of the sedulous care taken by the Government to secure the best class of provision or the precise way which this is effected.

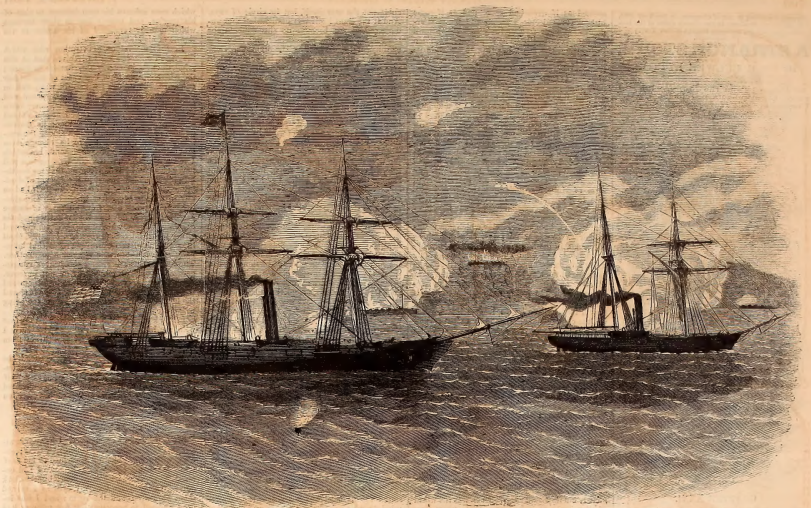
Major A. B. Eaton is the Commissary of Subsistence for the United States Army in the city of New York, and inspects, or causes to be inspected, every pound of cured meat, and each barrel of flour or army bread which is sent from this city to Washington. That this position is sincere may be judged from one fact alone. This is, that one baker who, at the commencement of the steps for the repression of the rebellion, was called on for only 50,000 pounds of army bread, or rather biscuit, per week, in isolated orders, is now fulfilling an order for 200,000 pounds per week, for the next two months. The salt pork is weighed and examined at Getty's yard, at the foot of Spring Street, by Major Eaton's agent; and we should not care to state the quantity which is daily subjected to his scrutiny, lest we might be accused of romancing.

In this way, however, mention that the whole of the meat is turned out of the barrel in which it is delivered there, and each portion scraped from the salt and carefully examined previous to its being packed again, subject to the orders of the Government. Beef, sugar, flour, and other necessary articles of daily consumption of our troops, are in contributed largely. From the care shown in the minute inspection of the provision, it must be obvious that any complaints so extensively raised by the volunteer regiments, respecting the quality of their provisions, can not have been attributable to the rejection of the meat or the refuse ground up with the flour that has been purchased in, and sent on from New York.

After the Commissary of Subsistence has fulfilled his duty and examined, or had the provisions purchased by him examined and packed under his supervision, they pass from charge in that of the Assistant Quarter-master General, Colonel D. D. Tompkins.

This officer has the superintendence of their transmission to Washington with the various military stores sent through New York to that city. He is able to give some idea of the amount of business which he has to do in these stirring times, we may say that the means of conveyance for army material and stores have, for the last five or six weeks, averaged two propellers per day. These boats sail from Pier No. 10 on the North River. Their average size is from 240 to 300 tons; so that we may say, on a rough estimate, somewhere about 3000 or 3500 tons of provision and military stores in bulk are transmitted weekly to Washington from New York alone. This fact may give some idea of the colossal nature of the internal struggle in which our Government is at present engaged.

WAR SCENES AT AND ABOUT WASHINGTON.



THE "SEMINOLE" AND THE "POCAHONTAS" ENGAGING THE REBEL BATTERIES AT EVANSPORT.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 699.]

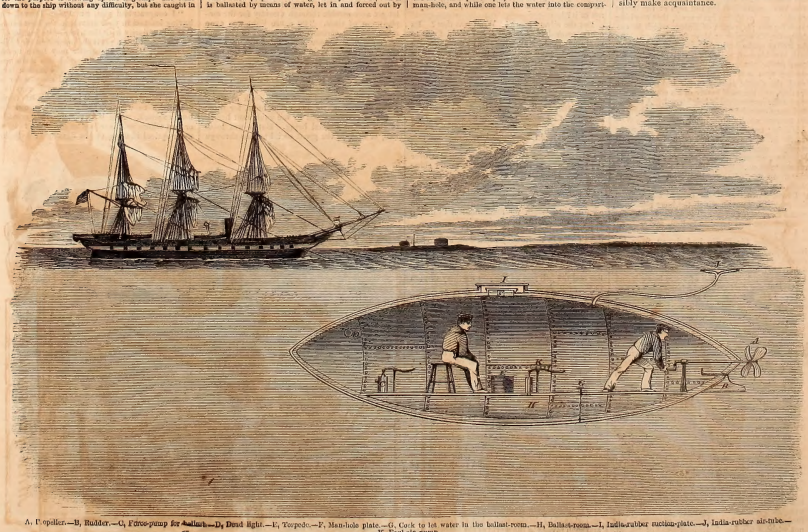
A REBEL INFERNAL MACHINE.

WE publish on this page an illustration of a REBEL INFERNAL MACHINE, with which it was attempted to blow up the flag-ship at Fortress Monroe a few days since. The following extract from a letter in the Herald, dated Fortress Monroe, October 12, will explain the affair:

Last evening a flag of truce came down, bringing sixty persons; among the number was a gentleman who brings the following intelligence: On Wednesday evening last an infernal machine was sent down from Sewall's Point for the purpose of blowing up the flag-ship. She came down to the ship without any difficulty, but she caught in the grapling always hanging from the jib-boom end of the ships. This was taken by those inside for the chain cable, and when they thought they were under the bottom of the ship they made preparations for severing the torpedo on the bilge, but, to their surprise, they found they were sadly mistaken, and they came near losing their lives as well as the machine. They, however, escaped, and worked themselves on shore on rebel ground, and the machine was carried back to Norfolk, to try the experiment at some future time.

From the gentleman who made the statement I learn the following particulars in relation to the machine. He states that it is built of iron, of a similar shape to the Roes Wimax cigar boat, of a sufficient capacity to accomodate two persons, who work it ahead by means of a small screw propeller. It is guided by a rudder, and it is ballasted by means of water, let in and forced out by means of a pump. A compass guides them, and a velocimeter shows how great a distance is run each moment. Bearings and courses are given the men, and they go on a hazardous voyage, with a large chance of accomplishment. An India-rubber tube, which is floated on the surface, furnishes them with fresh air, while a force-pump forces out the foul air. On arriving at the place desired, a grapple catches the cable of a vessel, and the machine is veered away until it is supposed to be near one of the magazines; the water-ballast is then pumped out, and the machine floats up under the ship's bottom. By means of an India-rubber sucking-plate this machine is attached to the bottom of the ship, while a man-hole plate is opened and the torpedo is screwed into the vessel. It is fired by the means of a time fuze. As soon as this is set in motion the men inside place a prepared sheet of rubber over the man-hole, and while one lets the water into the compartment to sink the machine, the other person screws up the plate, the grapple is let go, and the infernal machine is left to explode, while the machine is worked in shore out of harm's way. Commodore Goldsborough is informed of this article, and will of course take all the precautions to prevent an occurrence which would prove so disastrous to a fine ship and of so much importance to the enemy.

It is possible that before the time arrives for a fresh experiment with this machine the rebels at Norfolk may have occupation for their ingenuity nearer home. Commodore Goldsborough and his officers may perhaps have a little "infernal machine" of their own, with which rebeldom may possibly make acquaintance.



A, Propeller.—B, Rudder.—C, Force-pump for ballast.—D, Dead light.—E, Torpedo.—F, Man-hole plate.—G, Cock to let water in the ballast-room.—H, Ballast-room.—I, India-rubber suction-plate.—J, India-rubber air-tube.—K, Foul-air pump.

SUBMARINE INFERNAL MACHINE INTENDED TO DESTROY THE "MINNESOTA."

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

A STRANGE STORY.

By SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXXI.

MARGRAVE threw himself on a seat just under the great ancunda; I closed and locked the door. When I had done so my eye fell on the young man's face, and I was surprised to see that it had lost its color; that it showed great anxiety, great distress; that his hands were visibly trembling.

"What is this?" he said, in feeble tones, and raising himself half from his seat as if with great effort. "Help me up—come away! Something in this room is hostile to me—hostile, overpowering! What can it be?"

"Truth and my presence," answered a stern, low voice; and Sir Philip Derval, whose slight form the huge bulk of the dead elephant had before obscured from my view, came suddenly out from the shadow into the full rays of the lamps which lit up, as if for Man's revel, that mocking tomb for the playmates of Nature which he enslaves for his service or slays for his sport. As Sir Philip spoke and advanced Margrave sank back into his seat, shrinking, collapsing, nerveless; terror the most abject expressed in his staring eyes and parted lips. On the other hand, the simple dignity of Sir Philip Derval's bearing, and the mild power of his countenance, were alike unconsciously heightened. A change had come over the whole man, the more impressive because wholly undefinable.

Halting opposite Margrave, he uttered some words in a language unknown to me, and stretched one hand over the young man's head. Margrave at once became stiff and rigid, as if turned to stone. Sir Philip said to me,

"Place one of those lamps on the floor—there, by his feet."

I took down one of the colored lamps from the mimic tree round which the huge anaconda coiled its spires, and placed it as I was told.

"Take the seat opposite to him, and watch." I obeyed.

Meanwhile Sir Philip had drawn from his breast-pocket a small steel casket, and I observed, as he opened it, that the interior was subdivided into several compartments, each with its separate lid; from one of these he took and sprinkled over the flame of the lamp a few grains of a powdery, odorless and sparkling as diamond dust; in a second or so a delicate perfume, wholly unfamiliar to my sense, rose from the lamp.

"You would test the condition of trance—test it, and in the spirit."

And as he spoke his hand rested lightly on my head. His form, amidst a surprise not unmixed with awe, I had preserved a certain defiance, a certain distrust. I had been, as it were, on my guard.

But as those words were spoken, as that hand rested on my head, as that perfume arose from the lamp, all power of will deserted me. My first sensation was that of passive subjugation, but soon I was aware of a strange intoxicating effect from the color of the lamp, round which there now played a dazzling vapor. The room swam before me. Like a man oppressed by a nightmare I tried to move, to cry out—feeling that to do so would suffice to burst the thrall that bound me—in vain.

A time that seemed to me inexorably long, but which, as I found afterward, could only have occupied a few seconds, elapsed in this preliminary state, which, however powerless, was not without a vague luxurious sense of delight. And then suddenly came pain—pain, that in rapid gradations passed into a rending agony. Every bone, sinew, nerve, fibre of the body, seemed as if wrenched open, and as if some hitherto unconjectured presence in the vital organization were forcing itself to light with all the pangs of travail. The veins seemed swollen to bursting, the heart laboring to maintain its action by fierce spasms. I feel in this description how language fails me. Enough that the anguish I then endured surpassed all that I have ever experienced of physical pain. This dreadful interval ended as suddenly as it had commenced. I felt as if a something undefinable by any name had rushed from me, and in that rush that a struggle was over. I was sensible of the passive bliss which attends the release from torture, and then there grew on me a wonderful calm, and in that calm a consciousness of some lofty intelligence immeasurably beyond that which human memory gathers from earthly knowledge. I saw before me that still rigid form of Margrave, and my sight seemed with ease to penetrate through its covering of flesh and to survey the mechanism of the whole interior being.

"View that tenement of clay which now seems so fair as he was when I last beheld it, three years ago, in the house of Haroun of Aleppo!"

I looked, and gradually, and as shade after shade falls on the mountain-side, while the clouds gather, and the sun vanishes at last, so the form and face on which I looked changed from exuberant grace into infirm old age. There discovered wrinkled skin, the bleared dim eye, the flaccid muscles, the brittle, sapless bones. Nor was the change that of age alone. The expression of the countenance had passed into gloomy discontent, and in every furrow a passion or a vice had sown the seeds of grief.

And the brain now opened on my sight, with all its labyrinth of cells. I seemed to have the clew to every winding in the maze.

I saw therein a moral world, charred and ruined, as, in some fable I have read, the world of the moon is described to be, in which all was a brain of magnificent formation. The powers abused to evil had been originally of rare order; imagination, and scope; the passions that made the faculties that discover. But the moral part of the brain had failed to dominate the mental. Defective proportion of the organs of reason and cynical disdain of what is right and just; in fine, a great intellect first misguided, then perverted, and now falling with the dark ruin of a once ghastly but imposing ruins. Such was the world of that brain as it had been three years ago. And still continuing to gaze intuition, I saw in three regular emanations of light; the one of a pale red hue, the second of a pale azure, the third a silvery spark.

The red light, which grew paler and paler as I looked, undulated from the brain along the arteries, the veins, the nerves. And I murmured to myself, "Is this the principle of animal life?"

The azure light equally permeated the frame, crossing and uniting with the red, but in a separate and distinct path; exactly as in the outer world a ray of light crosses or unites with a ray of heat, though in itself a separate individual agency. And again I murmured to myself, "Is this the principle of intellectual being, directing or influencing that of animal life; with it, yet not of it?"

But the silvery spark! What was that? Its centre seemed the brain. But I could fix it to no single organ. Sometimes it appeared through the system, it reflected itself as a star reflects itself upon water. And I observed that while the pale light was equally diffused in the whole, and the azure light was confused, irregular—now obstructed, now hurrying, now almost lost—the silvery spark remained single and undivided. So independent of all which agitated and vexed the frame, that I became strangely aware that if the heart stopped in its action, and the red light died out, if the brain were paralyzed, that energic mind smitten into idiotcy, and the azure light wandering aimless as a will-o'-the-wisp hovers over the morass—still that silver spark would shine the same, indestructible by aught that shatters its tabernacle. And I murmured to myself, "Can that starry spark speak the presence of the soul? Does the silver light shine within those recesses in which the immortal has been promised by Divine Revelation?"

Involuntarily I turned my sight toward the dead forms in the motley collection, and lo! in my trance or my vision, life returned to them all! To the elephant and the serpent; to the tiger, the vulture, the beetle, the moth; to the fish and the polypus, and to yon mockery of man in the giant ape.

I seemed to see each as it lived in its native realm of earth, or of air, or of water; and the red light played, more or less warm, through the structure of each, and the azure light, though duller of hue, seemed to shoot through the red, and communicate to the creatures an intelligence far inferior indeed to that of man, but sufficing to conduct the current of their will, and influence the cunning of their instincts. And in them, from the elephant to the moth, from the bird in which brain was the largest to the hybrid in which life seemed to live as in plants—in none was visible the starry silver spark. I turned my eyes from the creatures around, back again to the form cowering under the huge anaconda; and to see the animation which the carcasses took in the awful illusions of that marvelous trance; for the tiger moved as if scenting blood, and the eyes of the serpent the dread fascination seemed slowly returning.

Again I gazed on the starry spark in the form of the man. And I murmured to myself, "But if this be the soul, why is it so undisturbed and undarkened by the sins which have left such trace and such ravage in the world of the brain?" And gazing yet more intently on the spark, I became vaguely aware that it was not the soul, but the halo around the soul, as the star we see in heaven is not the star itself, but its circle of rays. And if the light itself was undisturbed and undarkened, it was because no sins done in the body could annihilate its essence, nor affect the eternity of its duration. The light was clear within the ruins of its lodgment, because it might pass away but could not be extinguished.

But the soul itself, in the heart of the light, reflected back on my own soul within me its ineffable trouble, humiliation, and sorrow; for those ghastly wrecks of power placed at its sovereign command it was responsible; and, appalled by its own sublime fate of duration, was about to carry into eternity the account of its mission in time. Yet it seemed that while the soul was still there, though so fettered and so guilty, even the wrecks around it were majestic. And the soul, whatever sentence it might merit, was not among the hopelessly lost. For in its remorse and its shame it might still have retained what could serve for redemption. And I saw that the mind was storming the soul in some terrible rebellious war—all of thought, of passion, of desire, through which the azure light poured its restless flow, were surging up round the starry spark, as in siege. And I could not comprehend the war, nor guess what it was that the mind demanded the soul to yield. Only the distinction between the two was made intelligible by their antagonism. And I saw that the soul, sorely tempted, looked afar for escape from the subjects it had ever so ill controlled, and who sought to reduce to their vassal the power which had lost authority as their king. I could feel its terror in the sympathy of my own terror, the keenness of my own supplicating pity. I knew that it was imploring release from the perils it confessed its want of strength to encounter. And suddenly the starry spark rose from the ruins and the tumult around it—rose into space and vanished. And where my soul had recognized the presence of soul there was a void. But the red light burned still, becoming more and more vivid; and as it thus reprieved and recruited its lustre, the whole animal form which had been so decrepit grew restored from decay, grew into vigor and youth. And I saw Margrave as I had seen him in the waking world, the radiant image of animal life in the beauty of its fairest bloom.

And over this rich vitality and this symmetric mechanism now reigned only, with the animal life, the mind. The starry light fled and the soul vanished, still was left visible the mind—mind, by which sensations convey and cumulate ideas, and muscles obey volition—mind, as in those animals that have more than the elementary instincts—mind as it might be in men, were men not immortal. And, my eyes, in the vision, followed the azure light, undulating as before through the cells of the brain, and crossing the vital and subtle labyrinth of the nerves, I perceived that the essence of that azure light had undergone a change; it had lost that faculty of continuous and concentred power by which man improves on the works of the past, and weaves schemes to be developed in the future of remote generations; it had lost all sympathy in the past, because it had lost all conception of a future beyond the grave; it had lost conscience, it had lost remorse. The being it informed was no longer accountable through eternity for the employment of time. The azure light was even more vivid in certain organs useful to the conservation of existence, as in those organs I had observed it more vivid among some of the inferior animals than it is in man—secretiveness, destructiveness, and the ready perception of things immediate to the wants of the day. And the azure light was brilliant in cerebral cells, where before it had been dim, such as those in which harbor mirthfulness and hope, for there the light was recruited by the exuberant health of the joyous animal being. But it was leadlike, or dim, in the great social organs through which man suborns his own interest to that of his species, and utterly lost in those through which man is reminded of his duties to the throne of his Maker.

In that marvelous penetration with which the vision endowed me I perceived that in this mind, though in energy far superior to many though retaining, from memories of the former existence, the relics of a culture wide, and in some things profound; though sharpened and quickened into formidable, if desultory, force whenever it schemed or aimed at the animal self-conservation, which ever made its master-impulse or instinct; and though among the remembrances of its state before its change were acts which I could not comprehend, but which I felt were dark and terrible, lending to a will never checked by remorse arms that no healthful philosophy was placed in the arsenal of disciplined genius; though the mind in itself had an ally in a body as perfect in strength and elasticity as man can take from the favor of nature—still, I say, I felt that that mind wanted the something without which men never could found laws, frame laws, bind together, beautify, exalt the elements of this world by creeds that habitually subject them to a reference to another. The ant, and the bee, and the beaver cooperate and construct; but they do not improve. Man improves because the future impels onward that which is not found in the ant, the bee, and the beaver—that which was gone from the being before me.

I shrank appalled into myself, covered my face with my hands, and groaned aloud: "Have I ever then doubted that soul is distinct from mind?"

A hand here again touched my forehead, the light in the lamp was extinguished, I became insensible, and when I recovered I found myself back in the room in which I had first conversed with Sir Philip Derval, and seated, as before, on the sofa by his side.

CHAPTER XXXII.

MY recollections of all which I have just attempted to describe were distinct and vivid; except, with respect to time, it seemed to me as if many hours must have elapsed since I had entered the museum with Margrave; but the clock on the mantle-piece met my eyes as I turned them wistfully round the room; and I was indeed amazed to perceive that five minutes had sufficed for all which it has taken me so long to narrate, and which in their transit had hurried me through ideas and emotions so remote from anterior experience.

To my astonishment now succeeded shame and indignation—shame that I, who had scoffed at the possibility of the comparatively ordinary influences of mesmeric action, should have been so helpless a puppet under the hand of the slight fellow-man beside me, and so morbidly impressed by phantasmagorical illusions—indignation that by some fumes which had special potency over the brain, I had thus been, as it were, coerced out of my senses: and, looking full into the calm face at my side, I said, with a smile to which I sought to convey disdain—

"I congratulate you, Sir Philip Derval, on having learned in your travels in the East so expert a familiarity with the tricks of its jugglers."

"The East has a proverb," answered Sir Philip, quietly, "that the juggler may learn much from the dervish, but the dervish can learn nothing from the juggler. You will pardon me, however, for the effect produced on you for a few minutes, whatever the cause of it may be, since it may serve to guard your whole life from calamities to which it might otherwise have been exposed. And however you may consider that which you have just experienced to be a mere optical illusion, or the figment of a brain

"WHEN I FOUND MYSELF IN THE STREET, I TURNED ROUND AND SAW MARGRAVE STILL STANDING AT THE OPEN WINDOW," ETC., supercocted by the fumes of a vapor, look within yourself, and tell me if you do not feel an inward and unanswerable conviction that there is more reason to shun and to fear the creature you left asleep under the dead jaws of the giant serpent, than there would be in the serpent itself could the woman return to its breath?"

I was silent, for I could not deny that that conviction had come to me.

"Hesitate not, then, you recover from the confusion or anger which now disturbs your impressions, you will be prepared to listen to my explanations and my recital in a spirit far different from that with which you would have received them before you were subjected to the experiment, which, allow me to remind you, you invited and defied. You will now, I trust, be fitted to become my confidant and my assistant —you will strive with me now, for the sake of humanity, we should act together against the incarnate lie, the anomalous prodigy which glides through this world in the image of joyous beauty. For the present I quit you. I have an engagement on worldly affairs in the town this night. I am staying at L——, and shall return for Derval Court to-morrow evening. Come to me there the day after to-morrow, at any hour that may suit you the best. Adieu."

Here Sir Philip Derval rose and left the room. I made no effort to detain him. My mind was too occupied in striving to recompose itself, and account for the phenomena that had seared it, and for the strength of the impressions it still retained.

I sought to find natural and accountable causes for effects so abnormal.

Lord Bacon suggests that the ointments with which witches anointed themselves might have had the effect of stopping the pores and congesting the brain; and thus impairing the sleep of the unhappy dupes of their own imagination with dreams so vivid that, on waking, they were firmly convinced that they had been borne through the air to the Sabbat.

I remembered also having heard a distinguished French traveler—whose veracity was unquestionable—declare that he had witnessed extraordinary effects produced on the sensorium by certain fumigations used by an African pretender to magic. A person, of known healthy a brain, subjected to the influence of these fumigations, was induced to believe that he saw the most frightful apparitions.

However extraordinary such effects, they were not incredible—not at variance with our notions of the known laws of nature. And to the vapor, or the odors which a powder applied to a lamp had called forth, I was, therefore, prepared to ascribe properties similar to those which I had in conjecture ascribed to the witches' ointment, and the French traveler to the fumigations of the African conjurer.

But as I came to that conclusion I was seized with an intense curiosity to examine for myself those chemical agencies with which Sir Philip Derval appeared so familiar; to test the contents in that mysterious casket of steel. I also felt a curiosity no less eager, but more, in spite of myself, intermingled with fear, to learn all that Sir Philip had to communicate of the past history of Margrave. I could but suppose that the young man must indeed be a terrible criminal, for a person of years so grave, and station so high, to intimate accusations so vaguely dark, and to use means so extraordinary in order to enlist my imagination rather than my reason against a subject in whom there appeared none of the signs which suspicion interprets into guilt.

While thus musing I lifted my eyes and saw Margrave himself there, at the threshold of the hall-room—there, where Sir Philip had first pointed him out as the criminal he had come to L——to seek and discern; and now, as then, Margrave was the radiant centre of a joyous group: not the young boy-god, Iacchus, amidst his nymphs and satyrs, in Grecian frieze or picture, have seemed more the type of the sportive, hilarious vitality of sensuous nature. He must have passed, unobserved by me, in my preoccupation of thought, from the museum and across the room in which I sat: and now there was as little trace in that animated countenance of the terror it had exhibited at Sir Philip's approach, as of the change it had undergone in my trance or my phantasy.

But he caught sight of me—left his young companions—came gayly to my side.

"Did you not ask me to go with you into that museum about half an hour ago, or did I dream that I went with you?"

"Yes, you went with me into that museum."

"Then pray what dull theme did you select to set me asleep there?"

I looked him in the face, and made no reply. Somewhat to my relief, I now heard my host's voice:—

"Why, Fenwick, what has become of Sir Philip Derval?"

"He has left; he had business." And, as I spoke, again I looked hard on Margrave.

His countenance now showed a change; not surprise, not dismay, but rather a play of the lip, a flash of the eye, that indicated complacency—even triumph.

"So! Sir Philip Derval. He is in L—— he has been here before. So! as I expected."

"Did you expect it?" said our host. "No one else did. Who could have told you?"

"The movements of men so distinguished need never take us by surprise. I knew he was in Paris the other day. Natural he should come here. I was prepared for his coming."

Margrave here turned away toward the window, which he threw open and looked out.

"There is a storm in the air," said he, as he continued to gaze into the night.

Was it possible that Margrave was so wholly unconscious of what had passed in the museum as to include in oblivion even the remembrance of Sir Philip Derval's presence before he had been rendered insensible, or laid asleep? Was it now only for the first time that he learned of Sir Philip's arrival in ——, and visit to that house? Was there any intimation of menace in his words and his aspect?

I felt that the trouble of my thoughts communicated itself to my countenance and manner; and, longing for solitude and fresh air, I quitted the house. When I found myself in the street, I turned round and saw Margrave still standing at the open window, but he did not appear to notice me; his eyes seemed fixed abstractedly on space.

LINES ON DEATH.

The phantom shade whom men call Death
Pursues each thing that draweth breath
On this fair earth;
He deems the man of pride and might,
And insects fluttering in the light,
Of equal worth.

He marks the man of many days,
Who bath grown old in the world's ways,
And his mate's one;
The summons dread must be obey'd,
Departure may not be delay'd—
That call is doom.

He tears the mother from her child,
No cry of grief and anguish wild
Will stay his hand;
But calm and still his victims lie,
No vital thing beneath the sky
May break their rest.

Full well he loves the battle-field,
Armor of proof and massive shield
He laughs to scorn:
The man of skill to forge the plate
That might avert the shafts of fate
His ne'er been born.

Where hosts encounter hosts he stands,
A skeleton with threatening hands
Do grasp a scythe:
While round about him raves the fight,
He views the fallen with delight,
And strong writhe.

Upon the sea he wanders oft,
And strikes the sailor who doft
Doth furl the sail:
Or on some shoal or rocky cape
He hurls the vessel, no stone escape
To tell the tale.

But not alone upon the wave,
Or on red fields where fall the brave,
Does Death appear:
He watcheth nightly by our bed,
And while we take our daily bread
He standeth near.

O Death! thou art a cruel foe,
With whom we battle here below
In weary strife:
The thought of thy sure victory
Would take away what joy might be
In our short life,

Did not within our bosoms dwell
A hope thy dart can never quell—
A glorious hope:
Yes, heirs of immortality,
We dare with such a foe as thee,
O Death! to cope.

J. S.

COLONEL GEARY'S ARTILLERY.

WE give on page 693 an engraving of the UNIFORMS OF THE OFFICERS AND PRIVATES OF BEVERIDGE'S LIGHT ARTILLERY, one section of which is with Colonel Geary, and is now doing good service in General Banks's Division of the Army of the Potomac. The corps originally recruited in Rahway, New Jersey, joined the Ninth Regiment Pennsylvania State Militia, and was attached to Colonel Stone's Brigade for a time, when it was raised to a full six-gun battery and armed with eight rifled cannon, which it has rendered efficient aid in guarding the fords of the Potomac at Conrad's Ferry, Monocacy, Sandy Hook, and Point of Rocks. The section of this battery, under Lieutenant J. W. Martin, is a portion of the "Colonel Geary's Artillery" so frequently spoken of in the reports from the seat of war as being engaged in skirmishing with the enemy at Darnestown, Point of Rocks, Sandy Hill, and in the recent affair at Bolivar. The officers of Captain E. B. Bunting, late First Lieutenant of the Seventh Regiment Engineer corps of this city, and Lieutenants W. M. Brumhall, J. C. Martin, Geary, Browne, Jun., and Moses P. Clark, all of Rahway, New Jersey.

THE PRISON AT RICHMOND, VA.

ON page 689 we publish an illustration of HENRICO COUNTY JAIL, at Richmond, Virginia, where some Union prisoners have been confined. Our picture is from a sketch by a prisoner who has been four months shut up in this jail, and who has lately made his escape. He describes the sufferings of the prisoners as severe, the food bad, and the treatment generally cruel. Every one has read the accounts of the Bull-Run prisoners who were confined in the tobacco warehouses of Richmond, and were shot by the sentries for merely showing their faces at the windows; also of the want of food and clothing, of the jeers of the populace of Richmond when the prisoners took the air; of the cruel sufferings of the wounded, etc., etc. When the war is over, this County Jail will take rank in history with the British prison-ships and the dungeons of the Revolution.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Portable Printing Offices

For the use of Business and Professional Men who would like to do their own Printing. Send for a Circular.
ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 117 Fulton Street, and 21 Park Row, New York.

"Something New for All."

GEN. GEO. B. M'CLELLAN and our New Union Prize Gift Packages are to be rendered at. Seventy-five cents worth of unimpeachable Articles for 25 cents. Agents wanted, from $5 to $10 per day. Agents wanted, male and female, everywhere. Address, with stamp for circular, RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York.

LE BON TON—THE BEST LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copies, with two valuable patterns, posted for 25 cents.
S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 401 Broadway, N. Y.

JEWELRY! JEWELRY!—The Head-Quarters for all Lodge Badges of fine and cheap Jewelry. Miniature Pins of all the Heroes. Persons wishing to see Samples, enclose stamp for full particulars. W. A. HAYWARD (Manufacturing Jeweler), 595 Broadway.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS — HELMUTH, JUDD, 294 Broadway, New York. Send for a Circular.

$150 PER MONTH made by enterprising agents selling BOWNER'S HUMMER and SHIELD for family sewing. Protects the finger and makes a beautiful hem. Sample sent on receipt of 25 cents. Address A. H. BOWNER, No. 442 Broadway.

The New Gas Lamps,

For burning Warren's Carbo-Naptha and other Coal Oils as explained in Scientific Gas Light, adapted for public and private buildings, gives great satisfaction. Sample lamp $5. On Vesper Street, and Carpenter Avenue repaired and altered to burn these Oils. Send Stamp for Circular.
VALLELY, GOLD & FISCHER, 75 Broadway, N. Y. up-stairs.

ARMY CONTRACTORS AND SUTLERS can have transportation furnished to all parts of the West by the ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY.
In connection with regular fast expresses, we are prepared to receive Sutlers' goods by four day and six day lines at low rates. For further information apply at our office.
ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY, 59 Broadway.

ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY'S ARMY AND SUTLERS' EXPRESS.
For Washington, Annapolis, Fortress Monroe, Hatteras, and all other points where troops are stationed, leave office 59 Broadway at 12:30 A.M., 5 P.M., and 6 P.M. Packages for soldiers taken free. Drafts, Checks, and Money for the army, when directed to a United States Quartermaster, will be carried free.
ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY, 59 Broadway.

Friends of Soldiers!

Send by Harnden's Express (the oldest Express), 74 Broadway, as they charge only half rates.

A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Prepared by GARDINER & CO., 113 Franklin St., New York. Sold by Apothecaries everywhere.

Commercial Agents wanted. Large commission, honorable business. Circular sent. A.W. Harrison, Phila.

A $25 Cent Sewing Machine!
And 5 other curious inventions. Agents wanted every where. Description and terms free. Address
SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

GAME, MEATS, FISH, &c., improved by the use of Ice & Porter's Worcestershire Sauce. Sold by all Grocers and Druggists. Send for Circulars.
J. G. COOLEY & CO., 1 Spruce Street, N. Y.

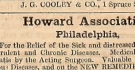
COOLEY'S Cabinet Printing Office for small Printers and Amateurs, $2.50. Send for Circulars.
J. G. COOLEY & CO., 1 Spruce Street, N. Y.

Howard Association,
Philadelphia,

For the Relief of the Sick and distressed, afflicted with Virulent and Chronic Diseases. Medical advice given gratis by the Acting Surgeon. Valuable Reports on various Diseases, and on the NEW REMEDIES employed in the Dispensary, sent in sealed letter envelopes, free of charge. Address, Dr. J. SHARP HOUGHTON, Howard Association, No. 2 South Ninth St., Philad'a, Pa.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance, which will be sent—free for 25 cents. Address T. William & Co., Publishers, Box 2590, Philad.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to
HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.



These Celebrated Engraved Cards sent only by DURRIE & PECK, 10 Broadway, N. Y.
Specimens by Mail, on receipt of 3 stamps.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT TO HIRE AGENTS in every County at $75 per month and expenses, to sell a new and staple article. Address
S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

Cloaks! Cloaks!
BRODIE
has made his Grand Opening
of
Fall and Winter Cloaks,
at his
OLD STAND,
300 Canal Street,
and
His Palace of Fashion,
Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,
Cor. of 23d Street,
New York.
Close of the Twenty-Third Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For November, 1861.

CONTENTS.

BENEDICT ARNOLD. By BENSON J. LOSSING.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Portrait of Arnold.—Arnold crossing the St. Lawrence.—Arnold's Birth-Place.—The Assault on Quebec.—Place where Arnold was Wounded.—Leaving the Congress.—Map of the Battle on Lake Champlain.—Arnold at Saratoga.—Meeting of Arnold and Andre.—Capture of Andre.—Arnold and Balcarras.

THE TENEMENT HOUSE. By EFFIE-JANE O'BRIEN.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Dinner at Orsolo's.—The Alarm of Fire.—Burning of the Tenement House.

MAKING MONEY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—United States Custom-House and Assay Office, New York.—The Weigh-Room.—The Counting-Room.—The Melting-Room.—Old Crucibles.—Cupellation and Parting Silver.—The Assay Weigh-Room.—Granulating.—Melter and Refiner's Vault.—Pouring out Acid.—The Parting House.—Interior of Vault.—Lasting Fine Bars.—Precipitating and Parting Silver.—Grinding and Separating the Gold.—Kent's Gold Separator.

THE WOMEN OF WEINSBERG. Illustrated.

ABOUT THE FOX AND FOX-HUNTERS. By T. B. THORPE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—A Fox-Hunter.—Portrait of Bayard.—The Meeting.—Riding to Cover.—The Chase.—The Death.—Over the Fence.

OLLY DOLLY.

NIGHT AND SLEEPERS.

MODERN AUSTRIA. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

WHEN THOU SLEEPEST. By CHARLOTTE BRONTE. CAUSE AND EFFECTS.

THE GAME OF CHESS.

THE ANGEL SISTER.

OLLEY FAIRE. By the ANTHONY TROLLOPE.—Illustrated by J. E. MILLAIS.
CHAPTER XXV. Mr. Furnival again at his Chambers.
CHAPTER XXVI. "Why should I not?"
CHAPTER XXVII. Commences.
CHAPTER XXVIII. Changes.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—"Why should I not?"—Monkton Grange.

ERNST II. OF SAXE-COBURG-GOTHA. By BAYARD TAYLOR.

MRS. STIRLING'S RECEPTION.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. By W. M. THACKERAY.
CHAPTER XXI. Treats of Dunning, Dining, Dying.
CHAPTER XXII. Visits an Unlucky Family.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—At the Last.—A Quarrel.—The End.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S DRAWER. With Eight Illustrations.

MR. DOWNEY IN SEARCH OF PHYSICAL DEVELOPMENT.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Bowling.—The Result.—Skating.—The Effect.—Riding.—The Tilt.—Rowing.—The Trial.—Ball-Playing.—The Work.—Belting.—Lager.

FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Lord Ash and Boy's Dress.—Evening Costume and Walking Dress.

ANY Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Any Volume, commencing with the current number, will be bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rate. Twenty-three Volumes, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to November, 1861, are now ready.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will also be sent gratuitously.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 50

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

Notwithstanding the great amount of space devoted to Illustrations of the War, Harper's Weekly commenced in No. 241, dated August 10th, A NEW AND THRILLING SERIAL TALE, by EDWARD LEAMAN BREWSTER, entitled,

"A STRANGE STORY,"

which will be continued from week to week till completed.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 50
Two Copies for One Year	4 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will also be sent gratuitously.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

A "SMASH" FOR JEFF.

Mr. Bull in his Big Ship "NEUTRALITY" Floundering about in the Sea of Commercial Distress.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The New McClellan Medal.

A splendid new Medal of Gen. McClellan. Send four 3 cent stamps, and receive one by return mail. Agents wanted. HENRY OSBORNE, 58 Nassau St., New York.

Army & Navy Shirts

On hand and made to order in any style, by

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York

A New Cartridge Revolver,

Carrying Six Balls (36 to the pound). Any one wanting a superior Pocket or Belt Arm will find this to be the best in the market. Price $15 00.

MERWIN & BRAY, Agents, 245 Broadway, N. Y.

MAP of THE MISSISSIPPI.—ALTON to THE GULF.—Printed in colors on a sheet 24 by 36 inches, forming a panorama ten feet long. Price 50 cents, or 10 for $3. Free by mail.

"The map is far better than any other we have ever seen, handsome as well as accurate."—N. Y. Tribune.

Also in Colors, Eastern Virginia and part of Maryland, 25 cents. Missouri and Kentucky, 25 cents.

AGENTS WANTED. SCHONBERG & CO.,
No. 90 Beaver Street, New York.

ALL WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Wedding Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 152 Broadway. Samples by mail.

AGENTS WANTED.—For the BEST WAR MAPS, VIEWS, and PORTRAITS.—18 MAPS, 7 VIEWS, 5 Portraits. Samples of all sent on receipt of $1. Circulars sent free. Address E. F. LLOYD, 598 Broadway, N. Y.

We pay $40 a Month and expenses to Agents. For terms address HARRIS BROTHERS, Boston, Mass.

Ladies are invited to call and examine the splendid stock of fine furs and children's fancy hats now open at TERRY'S, 697 Broadway, New York.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices,
Made to Measure at $18 per doz.
OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS,
MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2 00 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $1 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

30 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 14½ c. per yd.	$4 35
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard	3 50
Making, and cutting	6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c.	1 50
Profit	2 65
Total	$18 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

(ALL READY).

A MAGNIFICENT NEW CHART FOR THE TIMES.

The Equestrian Portrait Gallery,
Showing Thirteen of our Leading Generals on Horseback, on a very large scale, 20x28 inches, engraved expressly for this Chart. It is the most attractive and effective

WORK FOR AGENTS

yet issued. A specimen sent, post-paid, for 25 cents.

N. B.—See our new Price List and Circular for this and many other

CHARTS FOR THE TIMES.

Address
H. H. LLOYD & CO.,
No. 25 Howard Street, New York.

☞ Newspaper Publishers giving the above a conspicuous insertion will receive two valuable Maps.

Snow's Fur Confectionery,
200 Kinds, 622 Broadway, N. Y. Wholesale and Retail. Dealers enclose stamp for catalogue and prices.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have Just Published:

THE OKAVANGO RIVER: A Narrative of Travel, Exploration, and Adventure. By CHARLES JOHN ANDERSSON, Author of "Lake Ngami." With Small Portrait of the Author, numerous Wood-cuts, and a Map (not contained in the English Edition) showing the Regions explored by Andersson, Cumming, Livingstone, Burton, and Du Chaillu. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50; Half Calf, $4 00.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 234.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TO THE READER.

Subscribers should cut this Number open cautiously, in order not to spoil the WAR MAP, which occupies four pages.

CAPTAIN DUPONT,

COMMANDING THE GREAT NAVAL EXPEDITION.

We publish herewith a portrait of CAPTAIN S. F. DUPONT, the naval commander of the Great Expedition which sailed from Fortress Monroe last week for parts unknown. Captain Dupont is a native of New Jersey, but was appointed from Delaware, of which State he is a citizen. He entered the navy in 1815, and has consequently served his country for over forty-six years. In 1859 Captain Dupont was appointed Commandant of the Philadelphia Navy-yard—a position that he has held until recently. The Commodore's staff-officers are —Fleet-Captain, C. H. DAVIS; Flag-Lieutenant, S. W. PRESTON. His ship is the Wabash, 50 guns. He has lately been promoted to the command of that division of our fleet which has charge of the coast from Hatteras Inlet to Florida.

CAPTAIN S. F. DUPONT, COMMANDING THE GREAT NAVAL EXPEDITION.
(PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.)

THE FIGHT ON SANTA ROSA ISLAND.

We illustrate on this page an incident of the fight of 9th October on Santa Rosa Island—the REMARKABLE ESCAPE OF MAJOR NEWBY, of the Sixth New York Volunteers. The whole affair is thus described:

The fight occurred on the morning of October 9. The ZOUAVE camp was situated on Santa Rosa Island, about one mile from Fort Pickens, and was so distributed as to command all the approaches to the fort, and also to protect the batteries. The rebel force, 1500 strong, embarked from the Pensacola Navy-yard in three large steamers, and landed on the island, about four miles above the camp, soon after 2 A.M. The night was very dark. The rebels rapidly formed in three columns, and proceeded silently toward the Zouave camp, hoping to effect a total surprise. In this they were but partially successful. The picket guard, stationed about 600 yards from the camp, discovered and fired upon them. This gave the alarm, and saved the regiment from annihilation. The attack of the enemy's columns was simultaneous, and volley after volley was aimed at the volunteers, who were forced to fall back, leaving their camp in the hands of the rebels, which they immediately commenced burning. Fort Pickens was by this time thoroughly aroused, and three companies of regulars went to the assistance of the Zouaves. It was now our turn—the rebels commenced retreating to their boats, closely followed by the regulars and a small number of volunteers, keeping up a destructive fire upon them, killing and wounding a large number. The rebels finally succeeded in reaching their boats, but were not permitted to depart so easily. Their steamers were about five hundred yards from the beach, and our men poured volley upon volley into the crowded mass. Every bullet told, and from the shouts and utter confusion of the enemy it was clearly evident that we had obtained ample satisfaction.

The regular soldiers behaved nobly, and great credit is due to Captains Robertson and Hills, and Lieutenants Seely and Taylor, for the admirable coolness they displayed in manœuvring their respective companies. The volunteers were badly managed, and Colonel Wilson is very much censured for the inefficiency and want of skill displayed in the action. He did not arrive at the scene of action until all was over.

The camp of the Sixth Regiment was almost totally destroyed, officers and men losing every thing.

Major Newby had a narrow escape from capture. He was confined to his bed dangerously ill at the time of the attack, and having been assisted to dress by his servants, was on the point of leaving his quarters, when the rebels charged up to the door. One of his servants was instantly killed, and the other taken prisoner; the Major leveled his revolver and shot one of the rebels through the head, and then passing quickly out of the house, succeeded in mounting his horse, and rode safely through the storm of bullets showered upon him.

The Sixth Regiment lost ten killed, sixteen wounded, and nine prisoners. The regulars lost four killed, twenty wounded, and ten prisoners. The rebels lost, by their own statement, 350, killed, wounded, and missing. We took thirty-five prisoners, including three doctors, who were released.

ATTACK UPON THE CAMP OF THE SIXTH REGIMENT NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS (WILSON'S ZOUAVES), ON SANTA ROSA ISLAND, OCTOBER 9, 1861.

THE WOUNDED SOLDIER.

I'm wounded, Ellie, and they say I never can get well;
'Twas in the thickest of the fight that I got hurt and fell.
It seems to me like ages, yet it's but a month to-day
Since you promised that you'd wait for me though I were years away.

Do you remember—oh! how well it all comes back to me!—
Our sitting in the bright moonlight, under the maple-tree;
When first I said I loved you, and then told you we must part,
For not e'en you could keep me, when my country had my heart?

But I knew you did not wish it, so, your little hand in mine,
You did not try to stay me by any word or sign;
But trying to keep back the tears, although a few would fall,
You bade me trust in God, your God, whether I lived or died.

But all my bright ambitions hopes forever now are fled,
And the sunlight of to-morrow will fall upon me dead;
There'll be one soldier less to fight, one less on earth to love,
But there'll be another hand to strike the golden harps above.

I have a mother in the skies; I wonder if she'll know
The little baby that she left so many years ago.
But I'm weary, and I can not think; let this your comfort be,
For love has been the brightest thing in all the world to me.

W.

GOSHEN, Oct. 27, 1861.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1861.

WANTED—A LITTLE PLUCK.

MANY of the papers are abounding in outcries about the affair near Leesburg, just as, a few months ago, they were full of fury about the repulse at Big Bethel. They demand a victim for the one as for the other. Brigadier-General Pierce was immolated to appease popular fury in the one case: the question of the day is whether the blame of the more recent defeat must be laid upon General Baker, who is dead, or General Stone, who is living. It seems that somebody must be sacrificed on the altar.

Now it is not altogether best to attempt to correct the popular notion that whenever we fight we must win. The notion itself is absurd, of course; but it has the advantage of spurring our troops on to do their whole duty, and this is a decided gain.

At the same time, when attempts are made to disperse the reputation of living soldiers like General Stone, or dead heroes like General Baker, it is well to bring a little common sense to bear on the matter.

It is altogether preposterous—between ourselves and our readers—to expect that we shall win every battle that is fought in this war, or that we shall escape losing a large number of men even in the battles which we do win. There never was a war in which victory did not alternate, more or less, between the contending armies, and there never was a general, from Alexander and Napoleon downward, who did not occasionally lose battles. Invincible generals and invincible armies are only heard of in books of fairy tales. Nor is it rational to argue that, because we have twenty millions of people, and the rebels less than seven, therefore we are at once carry every thing before us. It takes time in war for disparity of numbers to make itself felt. Slavery enables the South to bring a much larger army into the field than it could do if its labor were performed by freemen. And lastly, it must never be forgotten that the treacherous leaders of this conspiracy had been manufacturing their plot and preparing for the contest several years before the idea of a fight entered the mind of loyal citizens. These considerations must always be borne in mind in reading the varying history of the war.

We are engaged in a great war: no mere twopenny campaign for ephemeral principles or temporary rights; but a great contest to decide whether republican liberty or negro slavery shall be the ruling institution on this continent. To either this or that defeat will amount to ruin. The defeat of the United States will be the destruction of the republic and of all that we cherish most. The defeat of the South will be the ruin of the institution of slavery, which represents $2,000,000,000 of property, the destruction of which involves the annihilation and reconstruction of the entire frame-work of Southern society. With such a stake at issue, it must be expected that the contest will be fiercely waged on both sides.

If the Northern people intend to prosecute the war with the perseverance required by the nature of the conflict, they must get over the habit of whining and abusing their generals when they encounter defeats. Defeats are a necessary part of war. People must expect them and take them for granted. The United States enjoy no miraculous immunity from the ordinary fate of nations at war. They must expect to take as well as to bestow blows. The operation which resulted so disastrously at Leesburg was unfortunate, but not a blunder. Two careful reconnoissances developed no enemy. After they had been made, and our troops had landed, the enemy appeared in force and drove us across the Potomac. This was an ordinary casualty of war, and General M'Clellan shows his generalship by blaming no one for it. Let Washington. It would have been impossible to reinforce Lexington without hazarding the safety of Cairo or St. Louis, and the enemy was allowed to win a barren victory, which he improved by retreating instantly to the borders of Arkansas. Bull Run itself—which has cast a shadow over the fame of one of our truest, most chivalric, and most skillful soldiers in our army, Irwin M'Dowell—was an obvious necessity. Nothing but the event itself would have sufficed to convince the people that militia-men are not soldiers, and that time is needed to create armies.

Citizens of the United States, what our country needs of you now is pluck, a little pluck. It is not expected that you should emulate the citizens of Rome, who passed a vote of thanks to Varro, fresh from the overwhelming defeat of Cannæ, "for that he had not despaired of the republic;" but it is hoped that you will not allow two-penny reverses to dispirit you, or to turn your unanimity against your public leaders. It is rational to expect that, in the course of the war, all our generals will meet with reverses. What is wanted of the people is that they should not lose heart on this account: that they should not denounce a general because he has been beaten; that they should not heed the ignorant criticisms—often the fact—of bobbing editors who have never seen a battle-field: but that, with a large faith in the righteousness of our cause, and the ultimate triumph of law, order, good government, and democracy over anarchy, rebellion, and negro slavery, they should cheerfully submit to the stripes which fate may lay upon them, and should feel as confident of the truth of their principles under defeat as in success. If the people will vouchsafe this, the army will do the rest.

OUR WAR MAP.

WE break through our usual habits in this number, and devote the whole of the publication of a large WAR MAP of the Southern States. Without intending to disparage any of the maps in existence, we think this will be found more reliable, and more useful to the student of the war, than any other we have seen. It covers the whole area involved in the conflict, from Northern Missouri to Texas, and from the boundary of Kansas and the Indian Reserve to the Atlantic shores. It is printed clearly and legibly, and great care has been taken to mark every river and road in the sections now occupied by the armies.

Such of our readers as wish to keep "posted" on the progress of the war will do well to paste or otherwise fasten this map on the back board against a wall. A series of pins, alternately black and white, should be inserted at the various points occupied by the National and the rebel forces, and shifted as the latest authentic accounts of movements are received. Care should be taken, however, not to confound newspaper rumors with authentic intelligence. The adoption of this suggestion will at once order the otherwise confused accounts of the war in Missouri and Kentucky perfectly intelligible, and will shed a flood of light on the newspaper narratives of the Virginia campaign.

We may refer, in this connection, with a profit, to the large series of war maps published in this number. They will constitute already a valuable atlas—such a one as would cost, if purchased separately, more than the whole price of Harper's Weekly.

☞ MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO. have published the Revised Regulations of the Army of the United States in a handsome octavo volume, with good paper and good type. Just now, when every man is either a soldier, or the friend or relative of soldiers, this work will be in great demand. We need hardly add that it contains a variety of new rules not contained in the old Army Regulations.

THE LOUNGER.

NEW ENGLAND NEVER RUNS.

THROUGH the terror with which friends and lovers read the story of Edwards's Ferry they can still smile upon the steadfast bravery of the Massachusetts boys. In the front of a fearful fire, with no means of retreat, with every chance against them, those young men stood serene, each man a hero—each man showing the quality of which invincible armies are made. Colonel Lee refuses retreat and is made prisoner. Major Revere and Lieutenant Perry share his fate. Lieutenant Putnam falls mortally wounded, Captain Drebar falls by his side, Captain Putnam loses his right arm, Captain Schmidt is dangerously wounded, Lieutenant Lowell is disabled. Lieutenant Holmes, said the first brief dispatch, "wounded in the breast;" not in the back; no, not in the back. In the breast is Massachusetts wounded, if she is struck. Forward she falls, if she fall dead. Of twenty-two officers of the Massachusetts Twentieth who went into the battle nine only returned.

And all New England boys are the bright peers of the Massachusetts. Rhode Island at Bull Run stood fast and fought through the whole; retired, when the word came, to rest upon their arms, as they supposed, and then renew the battle. "But when the order came to retreat," said one of them, "we were confounded, cursed M'Dowell, and wanted him hung."

At Edwards's Ferry the Rhode Island battery was said to have been deserted by its men. They were not there, it was reported, and Baker came to serve a gun. But they were not by the gun they were under it. They were at their post still —but the brave hearts should beat and the strong hand serve no more forever.

Not less ready, not less steady are the other sons of New England. From the pines of Maine, the granite hills of New Hampshire, the green hills of Vermont, and the soft valleys of the Connecticut they have marched to the battle-field, and every rifle in their hands is loaded and rammed down with an ease. They are not machine-soldiers: they are men-soldiers. And on the field their hosts are swelled with brothers from California, from New York, from Pennsylvania, from Ohio. They all stand there unbattled, and of stuff so tried and true that the sea might as hopelessly dash against Gibraltar as a rebellion against the Union.

From the day at Edwards's Ferry, which so so many loving hearts will be forever a day of sacred memory, to the last gallant and cheer which break joyfully upon every patriotic heart. Disaster, casualty, death, are inevitable. Brave hearts that weep, but will not fail! But the heroism of your darlings plucks the sting from sorrow, and conquers disaster. They fall—but their fall prophecies. They die—but, though dead, they speak, they smile. It is they who are "last in the trenches." It is they who teach us that the same old heart that has won the victories of history still beats. This time it is New England that points the truth. All are brave, thank God! New York and the West and Pennsylvania stands where Baker stood; the men of Pennsylvania bring arms of iron and nerves of steel. And the men of New England never run.

THE CITY ELECTION.

PATRIOTISM and the national peril may destroy parties, as they have destroyed them with us, but knaves of the baser sort still survive. The political bandits who live upon the spoils of intrigue are more alert than ever at such a time as this, as they always are before a fray; and at this very moment, when party lines are obliterated, and a dozen skeleton regiments are forties on the field, each claiming to be the genuine pure, original, and unswerving National Union Party, the people of the city of New York are in danger of falling a prey to a worse municipal government than they have ever known.

As fast as the new combinations have been formed there have been quick-paged dodges and unscrupulous politicians. A few men control at this moment, and for their own peculiar advantage, the various nominations made in the city. They are man of all the late parties; some of them shamefully notorious for conduct that should send them to prison as well as expel them from every decent house. They are men, many of them, without principle of any kind, who would rather make terms with traitors than with patriots, and who seek the control of the city government that they may plunder the citizens and enrich themselves under the forms of law.

If the public opinion under demands the names of these culprits, the reply is, that in politics much is known which it is difficult to prove. There are men whose conduct seems to be open enough to whom you might find it difficult to maintain even a charge of falsehood. There are men whom you refuse to employ in the street, whose infamy you could not personally establish.

The game of city politics in New York is played for the public money. The issue being the only one decent people go to primary meetings. The work is done there. The polls are a useless ceremony afterward. Even when the best effort of the people is corrupt or indifferent, the popular system is a failure. And a failure it unquestionably is in the city of New York, at least thing that has happened to us for a very long time was the new police system. Heaven forbid that any man should oppose that system! The best

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

A STRANGE STORY.

By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and on the Wood-blocks purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXXIV

I WALKED on slowly and with the downcast head of a man absorbed in meditation. I had gained the broad place in which the main streets of the town converged, when I was overtaken by a violent storm of rain. I sought shelter under the dark arch-way of that entrance to the district of Abbey Hill which was still called Monkgate. The shadow within the arch was so deep that I was not aware that I had a companion till I heard my own name, close at my side. I recognized the voice before I could distinguish the form of Sir Philip Derval.

"The storm will soon be over," said he, quietly. "I saw it coming on in time. I fear you neglected the first warning of those sable clouds, and must be sensibly drenched."

I made no reply, but moved involuntarily away toward the mouth of the arch.

"I see by your cheeks a grudge against me!" resumed Sir Philip. "Are you, then, by nature vindictive?"

Somewhat softened by the friendly tone of this reproach, I answered, half in jest, half in earnest,

"You must own, Sir Philip, that I have some little reason for the uncharitable anger your question imputes to me. But I can forgive you on one condition."

"What is that?"

"The possession, for half an hour, of that mysterious steel casket which you carry about with you, and full permission to analyze and test its contents."

"Your analysis of the contents," returned Sir Philip, drily, "would leave you as ignorant before of the uses to which they can be applied. But I will own to you frankly, that it is my intention to put some confident among men of science, to whom I may safely communicate the wonderful properties which certain essences in that casket possess. I have your permission, may, your friendship, in the hope that I may find such a confident in you. But the casket contains other compounds which I have tested, could not be re-supplied; at least, by any process which the great Master from whom I received them placed within reach of my knowledge. In like manner, I have in my possession a rare carbonic acid gas, and that the only chemical difference between the costliest diamond and a lump of pure charcoal is a proportion of this gas—less than a ⅓₀₀₀ part of the weight of the substance—can the chemist make you a diamond?"

"Then, then, the potent, human, but also the more perilous of the casket's contents, shall be explored by no science, submitted to no test. They are the keys to unlock doors in the ramparts of Nature, which no mortal can pass through without rousing dread sentries never seen upon this side her wall. The powers they confer on secrets locked in my breast, to be used in my grave; as the casket which lies on my breast shall then be transferred to the hands of another till all the rest of my earthly possessions pass away with my last breath in life, and my first in eternity."

"Sir Philip Derval," said I, struggling against the appeals to fancy or to awe, made in words so strange, uttered in a tone of earnest conviction, and borne amidst the glare of the lightning, the howl of the winds, and the roll of the thunder—"Sir Philip Derval, you accost me in language which, in the experience of the poorest at your command, I should hear with the contempt that is due to the vaunts of a mountebank, or the ravings of the morbid beliefs of his dupe. As it is, I decline the confidence with which you would favor me, subject to the conditions which in return you would pause. My profession abandons to quacks all drugs which may not be analyzed; all secrets which may not be tested. Were I to can not visit you at Derval Court. I can not trust myself, volun tarily, again in the power of a man who has sets of which I have no knowledge in nature, by which he can impose on my imagination and steal away my reason."

"Before I will before you so decide," said Sir Philip, with a solemnity that was stern. "If you refuse to be warned and to be armed by me, your reason and your imagination will alike be subjected to influences which I can only explain by telling you that there is truth in those immemorial legends which depose to the existence of magic."

"Magic!"

"There is magic of two kinds—the dark and evil, appertaining to witchcraft or necromancy; the pure and beneficent, which is but philosophy, applied to certain properties in Nature remote from the beaten tracks of science, but which deepened the wisdom of ancient sages, and can yet unfold the myths of departed races."

"Sir Philip," I said, with impatient and angry interruption, "if you think that a jargon of this kind be worthy a man of your acquirements and station, it is at least a waste of time to address it to me. I am led to conclude that you desire to make use of me for some purpose which I have a right to suppose honest and upright, because all you know of me is, that I rendered to your relations services which can not lower me in character in your eyes. If your object be, as you have intimated, to aid you in exposing and disabling a man whose antecedents have been those of guilt, and who threatens with danger the society which receives him, you must give me proofs that are not reducible to magic; and you must repossess me against the person you accuse, not by powders and fumes that disorder the brain, but by substantial statements, such as justify one man in condemning another. And since you have thought fit to convince me that there are chemical means at your disposal by which the imagination can be so affected as to accept, temporarily, illusions for realities, so I again demand, and now still more decidedly than before, that while you address yourself to my reason, whether to convince or to refute, or to vindicate your charges against a man whom I have admitted to my acquaintance, you will divest yourself of all means and agencies to warp my judgment, so illicit and fraudulent as those which you own yourself to possess. Let the casket, with all its contents, be conferred to my hands, and pledge me your word that, in giving that casket, you reserve to yourself no other means by which chemical agencies can be brought to influences over physical organization which ignorance or imposture may ascribe to—magic."

"I accept your challenge, I trust your confidence, though I think the better of you for attempting to make them. If I live, you will seek me yourself, and implore my aid. Meanwhile, listen to me, and—"

"No; I prefer the rain and the thunder to the whispers that seem to me to issue from dark from one of whom I have reason to beware."

So saying, I stepped forth, and at that moment the lightning flashed through the arch and brought into full view the face of the man beside me. Soon by that glare, it was pale as the face of a corpse, but its expression was compassionate and serene.

I hesitated, for the expression of that holiest countenance seemed to me; it was not the face which inspires distrust or fear.

"Come," said I, gently; "grant my demand. The casket—"

"It is no scruple of distrust that now makes that demand; it is a curiosity which in itself is a fearful temptation. You have possess what at this moment you desire, how bitterly you would repent!"

"Do you still refuse my demand?"

"I refuse."

"If then you really need me, it is you who will repent."

I passed from the arch into the open space. The rain had paused, the thunder was more distant. I looked back when I had gained the opposite side of the street, and saw Sir Philip at the stood led to my own house. As I did so, again the skies lightened, but the flash wis compara tively slight and momentary; it did not penetrate the gloom of the arch; it did not bring the form of Sir Philip into view; but just under the base of the outer buttress to the gate-way I descried the outline of a dark figure, cowering down, huddled up for shelter, the outline so indistinct that at no other time, and in any other light, that I could not distinguish if it were man or brute. If it were some chance passer-by, who had sought refuge from the storm, and overheard part of our strange talk, "the listener," thought I, with a half smile, "must have been mightily perplexed."

CHAPTER XXXV

On reaching my own home I found my servant sitting up for me, with the information that Sir Philip Derval had immediately preceded. The little boy whom Margrave's carelessness had so injured, and for whose injury he had shown so little feeling, had been conveyed to the confectionment which the nature of the injury required, and for the last few days had been generally ailing. The faculty of the house a few minutes before I reached it, in great distress of mind, saying that his child had been seized with fever, and that the symptoms left no room to doubt that I was at the mayor's house, he had hurried thither in search of me.

I felt as if it were almost a relief to the troubled and haunting thoughts which tormented me to be summoned to the exercise of a familiar duty. The fatal illness of the poor widow of the little sufferer, and soon forgot all else in the anxious struggle for a human life. The struggle promised to be severe. The symptoms of typhus began to yield to remedies prompt and energetic, if simple. I remained at the house, rather to comfort and support the mother and the nurse, because my continued attendance was absolutely needed, till the night was well-nigh gone, and all cause of alarm for the present was satisfied. I then found myself once more in the streets. An atmosphere palely clear in the gray of dawn had succeeded to the tempestuous gloom of the stormy night; the street-lamps, here and there, burned wan and still. I was walking slowly and wearily, as tired out people walk, when I turned into my own thoughts, when, in a narrow lane, my feet stopped almost mechanically before a human form stretched at full length in the centre of the road, right in my path. The form was dark in the shadow thrown from the neighboring houses. Some superstitious fear seized I, and the humanity inseparable from my calling as a physician me to leave a fellow-creature thus exposed to the risk of being run over by the first heavy wagoner who might pass along the thoroughfare. I stooped to rouse and to lift the form. What was the horror when my eyes met the rigid stare of a dead man's! I started, looked again; it was the face of Sir Philip Derval! He was lying on his back, the countenance upturned, a dark stream oozing from the breast—murdered, by two ghastly wounds—murdered not long since; the blood was still warm. Appalled and terror-stricken, I stood bending over the body. Suddenly I was touched on the shoulder.

"Hollo! what is this?" said a gruff voice.

"Murder!" I answered, in hollow accents, which sounded strangely to my own ear.

"Murder! so it seems." And the policeman who had thus accosted me lifted the body.

"A gentleman, by his dress. How did this happen? How did you come here?" and the policeman glanced suspiciously at me.

At this moment other persons came up another policeman, in whom I recognized the young man whose sister I had attended and cured.

"Dr. Fenwick," said the last, lifting his hat respectfully, and at the sound of my name his fellow-policeman changed his manner, and muttered an apology.

I now collected myself sufficiently to state the name and rank of the murdered man. The policemen bore the body to their station, to which I accompanied them. I then returned to my own house, and had scarcely sunk on my bed when my own name over me, and I was asleep. Never till then had I known how awfully distinct dreams can be. The phantasmagoria of the unconscious brain revived. Life again awoke in the serpent and the tiger, the scorpion moved, and the vultures flapped its wings. And then was Margrave and there Sir Philip; but their position of power was reversed. And Margrave's foot was on the breast of the dead man. Still I slept on, till the hour arrived for me summons to attend on Mr. Vigors, the magistrate, to whom the police had reported the murder.

I dressed myself with care. As I passed through the street I found that the dismal news had already spread. I was accosted on my way by more than one by a hundred eager, tremulous, inquiring tongues.

The scanty evidence I could impart was soon given. Mr. Vigors, Sir Philip Derval, the mayor's house, our accidental meeting under the arch, my discovery of the corpse some hours afterward on my return from my patient, my professional belief that the deed must have been done a very short time, perhaps but a few minutes before I had chanced upon its victim. But in that case the murderer had passed by interval that had elapsed between the time in which I had left Sir Philip under the arch, and the time in which the murder must have been committed! Sir Philip could not have been wandering through the streets all those hours. This doubt, however, was not generally cleared up. Mr. Jeeves, who was one of the principal solicitors in the town, stated that he had acted as Sir Philip's legal adviser ever since Sir Philip came of age, and was charged with the exclusive management of some valuable house property which Sir Philip had possessed in L——; that when Sir Philip had arrived in the town late in the afternoon of the previous day he had sent for Mr. Jeeves, informed him that he, Sir Philip, was engaged to be married; that he desired to have full and minute information as to the state of the house property (which he had greatly increased in value since his absence from England), in connection with the settlements his marriage would render necessary; and that this information was also required by him in respect to a codicil he desired to add to his will.

He had accordingly requested Mr. Jeeves to have all the books and statements concerning the property connected with it ready at night, when he would call, after leaving the ball which he had promised the mayor, whom he had accidentally met on entering the town, to attend. Sir Philip had also asked Mr. Jeeves to detain one of his clerks in his office, in order to serve conjointly with Mr. Jeeves as witness to the codicil he desired to add to his will. Sir Philip had accordingly come to Mr. Jeeves's house a little before midnight, had gone carefully through all the statements prepared for him, and had executed the fresh codicil to his testament, which testament he had in like previous interview given to Mr. Jeeves's care, sealed up. Mr. Jeeves made search and found that such a document was there, with the usual great acquirements, was extremely eccentric, and in every peremptory manner, and that the importance attached to a proposition which Mr. Jeeves deemed so surprising occasion, did not surprise him in Sir Philip as it might have done in an ordinary client. Sir Philip also stated that he should devote the next morning to the draft for the wedding settlements, according to the information of his property which he required; and after a visit of very brief duration to Derval Court, should quit the neighborhood and return to Paris, where his intended bride was, and in which city it had been settled that the marriage ceremony should take place.

Mr. Jeeves had, however observed to him that if he were so soon to be married it was better to postpone any revision of testamentary bequests, since after marriage he would have to make a new will altogether.

And Sir Philip had simply answered,

"Life is uncertain; who can be sure of the morrow?"

Sir Philip's visit to Mr. Jeeves's house had lasted some hours, for the conversation between them had been chiefly on the actual business to various topics. Mr. Jeeves had not noticed the hour when Sir Philip went; he could only say that as he and his clerk left the street door, he observed, rather to his own surprise, that it was close upon daybreak.

Sir Philip's body had been found not many yards distant from the hotel at which he had put up, and to which, therefore, he was evidently returning when he left Mr. Jeeves—an old-fashioned hotel, which had been the principal one at L—— when Sir Philip left England, though now outrivaled by the new and more central establishment in which Margrave was domiciled.

The primary and natural supposition was, that Sir Philip had been murdered for the sake of plunder; and this supposition was borne out by the fact to which his valet deposed: viz.,

That Sir Philip had about his person, on going to the mayor's house, a purse containing notes and sovereigns; and this purse was now missing.

The valet, who, though an Albanian, spoke English fluently, said that the purse had a gold clasp, on which Sir Philip's crest and initials were engraved. Sir Philip's watch was, however, untaken.

And now it was not without a quick beat of the heart that I heard the valet declare that a steel casket to which Sir Philip attached extraordinary value, and always carried about with him, was also missing.

The Albanian described this casket as of ancient Byzantian workmanship, opening with a peculiar spring, only known to Sir Philip, in whose possession it had been, so far as the servant knew, about three years; when, after a visit to Aleppo, in which the servant had not accompanied him, he had first observed it in his master's hands. He was asked if this casket contained articles to account for the value Sir Philip set on it—such as jewels, bank-notes, letters of credit, etc. The man replied that it might possibly do so; he had never been allowed the opportunity of examining its contents; but that he was certain the casket held medicines, for he had seen Sir Philip take from it some small vials, by which he had performed great cures in the East, and especially during a pestilence which had visited Damascus, just after Sir Philip had arrived at that city on quitting Aleppo. Almost every European traveler is supposed to be a physician; and Sir Philip was a man of great benevolence, and the servant firmly believed him also to be of great medical skill. After this statement, it was very naturally and generally conjectured that Sir Philip was an amateur disciple of homeopathy, and that the casket contained the vials or globules in use among homeopathists.

Whether or not Mr. Vigors enjoyed a vindictive triumph in subduing me for the time of his authority, or whether his temper was ruffled in the excitement of so grave a case, I can not say, but his manner was stern and his tone discourteous in the questions which he addressed to me. Nor did the questions themselves seem very pertinent to the object of investigation.

"Pray, Dr. Fenwick," said he, knitting his brows, and fixing his eyes on me rudely, "did Sir Philip Derval, in his conversation with you, mention the steel casket which it seems he carried about with him?

I felt my countenance change slightly as I answered, "Yes."

"Did he tell you what it contained?"

"He said it contained secrets."

"Secrets of what nature, medicinal or chemical? Secrets which a physician might be curious to learn and desirous to possess?"

This question seemed to me so offensively significant that it roused my indignation, and I answered, haughtily, that "a physician of any degree of merited reputation did not much believe in, and still less covet, those secrets in his art which were the boast of quacks and pretenders."

"My question need not offend you, Dr. Fenwick. I put it in order to judge. Did Sir Philip Derval so boast of the secrets contained in his casket that a quack or pretender might deem much secret to you or to him?"

"Possibly he might, if he believed in such a boast."

"Humph—he might if he so believed. I have no more questions to put to you at present, Dr. Fenwick."

Little of any importance in connection with the deceased or his murder transpired in the course of that day's examination and inquiries.

The next day a gentleman distantly related to the young lady to whom Sir Philip was engaged, and who had been for some time in correspondence with the deceased, arrived at L——. He had been sent for at the suggestion of the Albanian servant, who said that Sir Philip had staid a day at this gentleman's house in London on his way to——from Paris.

The new-comer, whose name was Danvers, gave a more touching pathos to the horror which the murder had excited. In several letters and interviews which had swayed Sir Philip in the choice of his betrothed were singularly pure and noble. The young lady's father, a former intimate and friend—had been visited by a sudden reverse of fortune, which had brought on a fever that proved mortal. He died some years ago, leaving his only child penniless, and had bequeathed her to the care and guardianship of Sir Philip.

The orphan received her education at a convent near Paris; and when Sir Philip, a few weeks since, arrived in that city from the East, he offered her his hand and fortune. He knew, said Mr. Danvers, "from the conversation I held with him when he came to me in London, that he was inclined to this offer by the considerate desire to discharge the trust consigned to him by his old friend. Sir Philip was still too young to take under his own roof a female ward of eighteen without injury to her good name. He could only get over that difficulty by making the ward his wife. She will be as happy and happier with the man she will love and honor for her father's sake," said the chivalrous gentleman, "than she will be under any other. I could and for her."

And now there arrived another stranger to L——, sent for by Mr. Jeeves, the lawyer—a stranger to L——, but not to me—my old Edinburgh acquaintance, Richard Strahan.

The will in Mr. Jeeves's keeping, with its recent codicil, was opened and read. The will itself bore date about six years anterior to the testator's tragic death; it was very short, and,

[Continued on page 714.]

General Viele. Governor Hicks.

PRESENTATION OF COLORS TO GENERAL VIELE'S BRIGADE PREVIOUS TO THEIR DEPARTURE ON THE GREAT NAVAL EXPEDITION.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

PRESENTATION OF COLORS TO GENERAL VIELE'S BRIGADE.

WE illustrate on this page the Presentation of a Stand of Colors to each of the Regiments of General Viele's Brigade of New York Troops, which took place on 18th October at Annapolis, prior to their departure on the great Southern Expedition. A letter in the Herald thus described the scene:

A grand ceremony took place here yesterday in the presentation of a regimental standard to each of the five regiments, comprising General Egbert L. Viele's brigade. The banners, which were national regimental standards, were the united gifts of Mrs. Brigadier-General Viele and the Union Defence Committee of the city of New York. They are made of the heaviest Canton silk, on staffs superbly mounted and inscribed. The entire brigade, consisting of the Third New Hampshire Volunteers, Eighth Maine, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth New York regiments, each drawn up in columns by division, closed en masse on the College green, comprising sixty or seventy acres of ground. The weather was beautiful. The sun shone forth with full effulgence. The citizens of Annapolis, their wives and daughters, old and young, grave and gay, all appeared near the scene of the ceremonies, gayly dressed in holiday attire. There could not have been less than fifteen hundred spectators present.

Wabash. Florida. Augusta. Alabama. Ottawa. Seneca. Pembina.

A PORTION OF THE NAVAL EXPEDITION, AS IT APPEARED ON THE NIGHT OF OCTOBER 16, SAILING TO HAMPTON ROADS.—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER ON BOARD.—[SEE PAGE 714.]

THE GREAT NAVAL EXPEDITION PREPARING FOR DEPARTURE FROM ANNAPOLIS, MARYLAND.—Sketched by Mr. Thomas A. Makibbin.—[See Page 714.]

[Continued from page 711.]

with the exception of a few legacies, of which the most important was ten thousand pounds to his ward, the wi- - of his property was left to Richard Strahan, on the condition that he took the name and arms of Derval within a year from the date of Sir Philip's decease. The codicil, added to the will the night before his death, increased the legacy to the young lady from ten to thirty thousand pounds, and bequeathed an annuity of one hundred pounds a year to his Athenian servant. Accompanying the will, and within the same envelope, was a sealed letter, addressed to Richard Strahan, and dated at Paris two weeks before Sir Philip's decease. Strahan brought that letter to me. It ran thus: "Richard Strahan, I advise you to pull down the house called Derval Court, and to build another on a better site, the plans of which, to be modified according to your own taste and requirements, will be found among my papers. This is a recommendation, not a command. But I strictly enjoin you entirely to demolish the mere ancient part, which was chiefly occupied by myself, and to destroy by fire, without perusal, all the books and manuscripts found in the safes in my study. I have appointed you the executor as well as the legatee of my property, because I have no personal friends in whom I can confide as I should like in the man I have never seen, simply because he bears my name and represents my lineage. There will be found in my writing-desk, which always accompanies me in my travels, an autobiographical work, a record of my own life, comprising discoveries, or hints at discovery, in science, through means little cultivated in our age. You will not be surprised that before selecting you as my heir and executor, from a crowd of relations not more distant, I should have made inquiries in order to justify my selection. The result of those inquiries informs me that you have not yourself the peculiar knowledge nor the habits of mind that would enable you to judge of matters which demand the attainments and the practice of science; but that you are of an honest, affectionate nature, and will regard as sacred the last injunctions of a benefactor. I enjoin you, then, to submit the aforesaid manuscript memoir to some person in whose character for humanity and honor you can place confidential reliance, and who is accustomed to the study of the physical sciences, especially that of chemistry, in connection with electricity and magnetism. My desire is that he shall edit and arrange the matter for publication, and that, wherever he feels a conscientious doubt whether any discovery, or hint of discovery, therein contained would not prove more dangerous than useful to mankind, he shall consult with any other three men of science whose names are a guarantee for probity and knowledge, and according to the best of his judgment, after such consultation, suppress or publish the passage of which he has no doubt. I owe this ambition which first directed me toward studies of a very unusual character, and which has encouraged me in their pursuit through many years of voluntary exile, in lands where they could be best facilitated or aided—the ambition of leaving behind me the record of a bold adventurer in those recesses of nature which philosophy has hitherto abandoned to superstition. But I feel, at the moment in which I trace these lines, a fear that the absorbing interest of researches which tend to increase to a marvelous degree the power of man over all matter, animate or inanimate, may have blinded my own moral perceptions; and that there may be much in the knowledge which I sought and acquired from the pure desire of investigating hidden truths, that could be more abused to purposes of tremendous evil than be likely to conduce to benignant good. And of this a mind disciplined to severe reasoning, and uninfluenced by the enthusiasm which has probably obscured my own judgment, should be the unprejudiced arbiter. Much as I have coveted and still do covet that fame which makes the memory of one man the common inheritance of all, I would positively rather that my name should pass away with my breath, than that it should transmit to my fellow-men my portion of a knowledge which the good might forbear to exercise and the bad might unscrupulously pervert. I hear about with me, wherever I wander, a certain solitude. I received this solitude with its contents, from a man whose memory I hold in profound veneration. Should I live to find a person to whom I can confide without betrayal of his character, after minute and intimate trial of his character, I should deem worthy of such confidence, it is my intention to communicate to him the secret how to prepare and how to use such of the powders and essences stored within that casket as I myself have ventured to employ. Further I have never tested, nor do I know how they could be resupplied if lost or wasted. But as the contents of this casket, in the hands of one not duly instructed as to the mode of applying them, would either be useless, or conduce, through inadvertent and ignorant misapplication, to the most dangerous consequences; so, if I die without having found, and in writing named, such a confidant as I have described above, I command you immediately to empty all the powders and essences found there in into any running stream of water, which will at once harmlessly disperse them. On no account must they be cast into fire!

"This letter, Richard Strahan, will only come under your eyes in case the plans and the hopes which I have formed for my earthly future should be frustrated by the death on which I do not calculate, but against the chances of which this will and this letter provide. I am about to revisit England, in defiance of a warning that I shall be there subjected to some peril which I refuse to have defined, because I am unwilling that any mean apprehension of personal danger should enfeeble my nerves in the discharge of a stern and solemn duty. If I overcome that peril, you will not be my heir; my testament will be remodeled; this letter will be recalled and destroyed. I shall form ties which promise me the happiness I have never hitherto found, though it is common to all men—the affections of home, the caresses of children, among whom I may find one to whom hereafter I may bequeath, in my knowledge, a far nobler heritage than my lands. In that case, however, my first care would be to assure your own fortunes. And the sum which this codicil assures to my benefactor's wife and child is yourself on my wedding-day. Do you know why, never having seen you, I thus select you for preference to all my other kindred? Because, Richard Strahan, thus, warms to your image? Richard Strahan, your only sister, many years older than yourself —you were then a child—was the object of my first love. We were to have been wedded, for her parents deceived me into the belief that she returned my affection. With a pure and noble candor she herself informed me that her heart was given to another who possessed not my worldly gifts of wealth and station. In resigning my claims to her hand, I succeeded in precipitating her parents to her own choice. I obtained for her husband the living which he held, and I settled on your sister the dower which at her death passed to you as the brother to whom she had shown a mother's love, and whose interest of which has secured you a modest independence.

"If these lines ever reach you, recognize my title to reverential obedience to commands which may seem to you wild, perhaps irrational; and repay, as if a debt due from your own lost sister, the affection I have borne to you for her sake."

While I read this long and strange letter Strahan sat by my side, covering his face with his hands, and weeping with honest tears for the man whose death had made him powerful and rich.

"You will undertake the trust ordained to me in this letter, Mr. Strahan," said the testator himself. "You will read and edit this memoir; you are the very man he himself would have selected, if such selection were possible. There is no doubt, and you have studied with success the sciences which he specifies as requisite for the discharge of the delicate duties."

At this request, though I could not be wholly unprepared for it, my first impulse was that of a vague terror at the responsibility I was thus becoming more and more entangled in a mysterious and fatal web. But this impulse soon faded in the eager yearnings of an ardent and irresistible curiosity.

I promised to read the manuscript, and in order that I might have the whole to myself with the object and wish of the deceased, I asked leave to make a copy of the letter I had just read. To this Strahan readily assented, and that copy I have transcribed, word for word, in this page.

I asked Strahan if he had yet found the manuscript; he said, "No, he had not yet had the heart to enter the papers. It cost him pain, he said, he would now do so. He should go in a day or two to Derval Court, and reside there till the murderer was discovered. On going, he soon must be through the vigilance of the police. Not till that discovery was made should Sir Philip's remains, though already placed in their coffin, be consigned to the family vault."

Strahan seemed to have some superstitious notion that the murderer might be more secure from justice if his victim were thrust, unavenged, into the tomb.

THE GREAT NAVAL EXPEDITION.

WE continue our illustrations of the GREAT NAVAL EXPEDITION. In this issue we give a picture of the PRESENTATION OF COLORS to the regiments of General Viele's Brigade before their departure from Alexandria. On page 725 an illustration of the FLEET AT ANNAPOLIS as they were leaving for FORTRESS MONROE; and on page 712 a view of PART OF THE SQUADRON at Sea, sailing to Hampton Roads.

The latter picture is from a sketch by an officer on board one of the vessels. It depicts the vessels as they sailed on the night of 16th October, en route for FORTRESS MONROE. These vessels steamed down Sandy Hook Bay in the following order, according to rank. In the evening, in obedience to signals from the flag-ship, the fleet formed in the shape of an inverted V, and in this order sailed through the night, the two gun-boats at the extreme ends of the lines being about five miles distant. The sketch represents the fleet as it appeared when answering the signals from the Wabash.

The other picture on page 713 is from a sketch by Mr. THOMAS W. KNOX, who accompanied, on his, looking out of the Seventh River into Chesapeake Bay. Keni Island is seen in the distance, and on the left hand of the picture is the fleet which lately destined by General Butler. The following, from the Washington Star of 21st October, relates to the departure of the expedition:

The expedition from Annapolis sailed yesterday. Among the troops comprising the portion of it thus embarked there are the following, viz.:

First Zouaves.—General Viele commanding. New Hampshire Third, on the Adelaide; New York Seventy-ninth, on the Daniel Webster; New York Forty seventh, on the Boston; New York Twenty-first, on the Empire City; Maine Eighth, on the Ariel.

Second Brigade.—General Stevens commanding. Rounded Pennsylvania, five companies Pennsylvania Fiftieth, on the Ocean Queen; five companies Pennsylvania Fiftieth, Michigan Eighth, New York Seventy-ninth, on the Underhill.

Third Brigade.—General H. Wight commanding. New Hampshire Fourth, on the Baltic; Connecticut Sixth, on the Heroes and Parkersburgh; Connecticut Seventh, on the Ericsson; Rhode Island, on the Contoocook.

Division and Staff, on the Arago.

In addition to these troops, we learn that quite as many more join the expedition at Old Point, having been quietly shipped to that end at New York, Boston, and elsewhere.

Where they are to strike no one outside yet knows.

The following extract from a private letter marks the progress of the expedition and the spirit of the men:

OFF FORTRESS MONROE, on BOARD THE Vanderbilt, Oct. 19, 1861.

DEAR FATHER,—We have just cast anchor here, and find one of the steamers that sailed from Annapolis to have just counted seventy-five vessels, large and small, and that number has not been here; but I got tired of counting. How long we will remain here, or where we are going, no person on board of this vessel can give, and which, I suppose, we have no business; as we must look upon ourselves only as machines. I heard a laughable illustration of this idea last night. A soldier was on sentry duty outside the cabin door, and when the hour arrived he was considerable sick of his life; he was warned of his hour for relief to parade, and his reply was, "Well, if I'm to be killed, it's their business, not mine; so, if I go, the Government will have a first-class article." The courage and spirit of the men have given rise to many a hearty laugh wherever it was repeated through the ship.

I take this opportunity of writing to you, as the Lord only knows when I may have another chance, if ever. Everything is quiet on board of this vessel, and I am told to that we might look out for sharp work, and that we were going to do it very shortly. Such is the excitement. Well, so let it be. Wherever he leads the Seventy-ninth will follow to the end.

If you can find out where the regiment is, will you be so kind as send me a paper once in a while—the Herald, if practicable. I like to see it very much, for 'tis said long as its familiar face seems like a visit from an old friend.

THE ATTACK ON OUR SQUADRON AT THE MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

ON page 717 we illustrate the recent ATTACK OF THE FLEET COMMODORE HOLLINS ON OUR SQUADRON at the Southwest Pass in the Missippi River. The event, shorn of fictitious embellishments, is thus described:

An attack was made on the night of the 13th inst. on the United States fleet lying at anchor near the Southwest Pass by the rebel steamer consisting of a gun-boats, the bottering-ram Manassas, and a large number of fire-ships which filled them with fire and sent down. The United States fleet consisted of the United States steamers Richmond, Preble, Vincennes, Water-witch, Preble and Vincennes, and store-ship Nightingale. The fleet when attacked were all lying at anchor in the Southwest Pass. The ram Manassas came down and drifted foul of the Richmond, knocked away her bowsprit and stern, doing little further damage. To avoid the fire-ships the squadron immediately got under way and drifted down the river.

The Richmond, Preble, and Vincennes got ashore on the bar (the Nightingale and Water-witch escaped), and were attacked by the rebels, but without doing much damage to the vessels or crews. One of the gun-boats sunk, and that struck the Richmond on the quarter. The rebels were beaten off by the Vincennes with two guns, she having been overtaken the rest of her armament, with her chains, anchors, &c., by the others. The ram was very much exposed to the rebel fire.

The squadron have not been disabled or wounded. The Richmond, Preble, and Vincennes were towed off the next day by the steamer Mississippi, which opportunely arrived. She received considerable damage to her stern frame in getting them off. The Nightingale remained ashore with the Water-witch. It is expected that she would be got off next day by the aid of the steamers connected with the fleet.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE URN OF PROSPERITY.—Prosperity has its "sweet uses" as well as adversity, for example, when a man once has a little money he instantly learns the number of his friends; whereas, if he remained poor, the chances are that he would never find out the real acquaintance of the fact.

MRS. BY A MISANTHROPE.—To enjoy a favor thoroughly, never carry it.

Why is the glance of a maternal parent like an Egyptian soldier?—Because it's a mammy-look.

THE APPLES OF VANITY.

O Vanity! thy lust of dress
Is more than I can bear;
No heart exceeds thy vast excess;
No pitiless, adorning, as
Horse-leech more section doth not crave!
Thou art insatiate as the grave

What bounds thy ravage can contain?
Our orchards must their fruit produce,
That Madam may her bonnet deck.
Thy cotton trappings with their juice:
So we shall have no fruit left.
And of our cider be bereft.

Then idiot Vice, whose mean delight
Lies in thought of being seen,
In gay habiliments bedight,
Disheaded by thy Crinoline
What is there thou wouldst not devour
Just in thy hat to stick a flower?

Ah! coldest thou, from the very grape,
Squeeze out a novel purple dye
To color thy confounded crape
So as to catch the public eye,
Then'dst spoil the true Burgundian vine
Rich, and to us of one mine.

HUMILIATING SPECTACLE.—The following remark was made by a Scull inspecting through his eye-glass a very small infant exhibited to him, at the instance of its father, by its nurse: "Welcome, little Shwangsee! Baby, simple specimen of man. It was once a baby myself. Ought to make a fella humble—the ideaw of having ewaw been a baby, don't you know?"

A SCOTCH JEST, at his death, left his property in equal shares to his two sons, who continued to live very amicably together. Their mother died at length one cold to the north. Tam, we're quitting auld now; you'll tak' a wife, and when I die you'll get a share of the property." "Ay, ay, mither," says the youngest and most active, you'll tak' a wife, and when I die you'll get my share." "Od," says John, "I'll no' be that way wi' you when there's ony thing to be got."

"Dinglee, dear," said a wife, appealing to her husband in a small feminine fluster, "do you think I am generally bad-tempered?" "No, my dear," says he, "I think you are particularly so."

"Jim, I believe that Sam's got no truth in him." "You don't know, niggy; there's more truth in dat nigga dan in all de rest ob de plantation." "How do you make dat?" "Why, he never lets any out."

OPPOSITES IN LOVE.—Love is made up of contraries; a fair woman, they say, best loves a dark man; a tall man generally selects a little woman for a wife; and the portly dame submits to tuck a pigmy spouse beneath her sheltering arm; the bald and timid girl turns with delight to the bold and sparkling lover; the ancient crone sighs for the blooming youth; and the wisest seek in the society of the weakest the pleasing relaxation from the austere duties of the law, the senate, or the state.

"Does your dog take to the water?" said a gentleman to a trustie, who had a water-spaniel following him. "Why, you, Sir, if they put meat in it," was the reply.

CANDIDATES FOR MATRIMONY.—On a recent occasion, at the marriage ceremony was about to be performed in a church in town, the clergyman desired the bridegroom to be married to rise up, a large number of the ladies immediately rose.

'Tis a very ancient saying,
Time till now has proved it true
"Do unto all your neighbors
As you would have them do to you."

But another saying now prevails,
Which is entirely different, I ween:
"Be sure and do your neighbor,
Or they'll certainly do you."

The boy who lost his balance on the front door fell on the ground shortly afterward.

"Let me collect myself," as the man said when he was blown up by a powder-mill.

A ragged little urchin came to a lady's door, asking for old clothes. She brought him a vest and a pair of trowsers, which he thankfully received in a comfortable fit. The young sarge-grace took the garments, and examined each; then, with a disconsolate look, said, "There ain't no watch-pocket!"

When is a lane very unlike an action at law?—When you can see the end from the beginning.

The celebrated old stage saying, "If you make love to a widow who has a daughter twenty years younger than herself, begin by declaring that you thought they were sisters."

IS INSANITY SOMETIMES FEIGNED?—The early dawn, when it breaks in the windows.

The value of spiritous liquors is always overrated, but every body knows that water naturally finds its level.

"Goodness me!" cried a nice old lady, the other day, "I'm afraid I shall not live to see another year, when shall I do for small?"

"I think," said a gentleman to his footman, "I have been very much deceived in your master to you, John." "Very moderate, Sir," said John.

We pity the family that sits down to a broil three times a day.

A country paper says—"A cow was struck by lightning and instantly killed, belonging to the village physician, who has dreamed of losing a cow for five days past."

A "SETTLER," in Australia, was taken before a justice very drunk, and instead of answering the questions put to him, he began to sing the splendid old song, "Your Home is very—wire-y-y-our Home is very wise." Being unable to get from him any other reply, the magistrate was to be locked up till next day, when he was again brought up. "Now, Sir," said the justice, "you were drunk as well as a beast yesterday. When I asked you any questions, the only answer I got was, 'Your home is very wire-y-y-wise.'" "Did I say so?" quoth the defendant? "then I must have been drunker than I thought."

TWO DUTCHMEN, living opposite each other, who had for many years been in the habit of smoking by their doorsides in silence, occasionally broke into the following dialogue: "What sort of weather you think it will be to-morrow, neighbor?" "Vell, I don't know; what sort of weather you think it will be?" "Vell, I don't know; what sort of weather you think it will be?" "Vell, I don't know; what sort of weather you think it will be?" "Vell, I don't know; I tink it will be weather as you tink it will be." The oldest, on questioning, "Well, I tink so too."

A PRETTY ACCOMPLISHMENT.—Dr. A——, physician at Newcastle, being summoned to a vestry, in order to reprimand the sexton for drunkenness, dwelt so long on the sexton's misconduct as to raise his choler so as to draw from him this expression—"Sir, I was in hopes you would have treated my feelings with more gentleness, or that you would have been the last man alive to appear against me, as I have covered so many bloodey graves!"

A bad-tempered judge was annoyed by an old gentleman who had a very chronic cough, and after repeatedly desiring that he would leave the court, at length angrily told the offending gentlemen that he would fine him £100 if he did not cease coughing. "Make it a hundred with me," replied the old gentleman, "and I'll cough it for you."

Some days ago a pretty, bright little juvenile friend, some five years of age, named Ross, was teased a good deal by a playful boy visitor named Rose. The family wound up by saying, "Ross, I don't love you." "Ah, but you've got to love me," said the little boy. Mother asked her remonstrate. "Why," answered Ross, "the Bible says you must love them that hate you, and I am sure I hate you."

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

What pupil gets most punishment?
The pupil of the eye for it is continually washer the lash.

"My first denotes a brilliant place,
Where belles and jewels shine;
My second is a part of man's stones,
Or produce of the mine;
Sweet pleasure in my whole abound
Apart from worldly strife,
By simple and virtuous I'm always found
The happiest part of life.
Courtship.

Those who have me not, do not wish for me;
Those who have me, do not wish to lose me;
Those who gain me, have me no longer.
Love-suits.

Why is a laundress the greatest traveler in the world?
Because she is constantly crossing the line, and going from pole to pole.

Why is Aunty Lind like a good austien-chop?
Because she is a settler (prime) tidy-an sell bony (Alsono).

Why are very old people necessarily prolix and tedious?
Because they dilate into diffuse.

Where is happiness always to be found?
In the dictionary.

Why should a tailor have all sorts of filth thrown to him?
Because he is a common sewer.

Why ought a man to be unable to starve in the deserts of Egypt?
On account of the sandwiches (sand'which is) there.

But how came the sand which is there?
Because Hamet was there, and his descendants mustered out brood (mustard and bread).

WORCESTER, Oct. 21, 1861.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

DEAR SIR,—I saw in your paper a few weeks ago the following:

"What is the difference between the Emperor of Russia and a beggar?—One knows his manifestoes, and the other manifests his toes."

This is good as far as it goes, but there is not enough of it. "Tis like!

Now here his manifestoes, and the other manifests his toes without his shoes. Yours, etc., READER.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

SAILING OF THE GREAT NAVAL EXPEDITION.

The great naval and military expedition which has been for some time preparing and assembling from different points, and of which we have published several illustrations, sailed from Hampton Roads on 27th for its destination. The squadron is composed of no less than a hundred vessels. The naval portion is under the command of Commodore Samuel F. Dupont, and the military portion is commanded by General Thomas W. Sherman. The appearance of this fleet as it left Fortress Monroe is described as one of the most magnificent scenes in the annals of American history.

SPRINGFIELD RETAKEN.

Springfield was again occupied by the National troops on Saturday evening, and the retreat of the rebel Price, with his army, is thus cut off, and he will be forced either to give battle, with the certainty of defeat, or to surrender. The occupation of Springfield is preceded by one of the most brilliant achievements which have yet marked the progress of this war. Major Sigurist, at the head of General Fremont's body-guard, made a charge upon a body of the enemy, upward of two thousand strong, drawn up in line of battle to check their march near the town, and routed them, and cleared them from the vicinity, after which he hoisted the stars and flag on the court-house, and then rallied temporarily, to await a reinforcement which soon joined him.

AFFAIR AT ROMNEY.

General Kelly, the hero of Philippi, having sufficiently recovered from the severe wound received there to resume active operations, has again made his mark against the rebels. Leaving Cumberland on Friday, he Hampshire County, on Friday night last, and attacked the enemy at Romney on Saturday afternoon, routing them after an exhausting many prisoners, together with three pieces of cannon and all their wagons and camp equipage. The rebels, in their precipitate retreat, took the road toward Winchester. The National loss was but trifling.

EXTENSION OF OUR LINES.

Gen. Hooker's division, whose Division constitutes the extreme left, resting on the Potomac, is pushing and extending his pickets further toward the rebel positions down the river, while Kearney occupies the line on the other side of the river, is making a corresponding movement.

CLOSING OF THE POTOMAC.

The rebels have now a continuous line of batteries from Matthias Point to Freestone Point, and the navigation of the Potomac is closed for the present. Emboldened by the success of the rebel batteries in interrupting the navigation of the Potomac by all national vessels, the rebel steamer George Page, which has for months been lying up Aquia Creek awaiting her opportunity, has now ventured out upon the Potomac. She was cruising between Shipping Point and Occoquan on Wednesday afternoon, overhauling men, and ran over to the Maryland shore once, throwing a couple of shells into the camp of the Pennsylvania Brigade. All the Government transports, it is understood, have gone down to Annapolis, and supplies will now be awaited to Washington from that point.

It is asserted, as we write this record, that the rebels have no batteries at Matthias Point.

THE HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENDED IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

On 24th the President instructed the Marshal for the District of Columbia not to serve writs on the Provost Marshal, but return them to the Court with the explanation that the President has, for the present, suspended the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in cases relating to the military for reasons of public necessity..

ZOLLICOFFER DEFEATED.

On 20th Colonel Dumont defeated Zollicoffer made an attack on Camp Wild Cat, about forty miles below Camp Dick Robinson, in Kentucky. Zollicoffer's force numbered 4000 infantry, 1500 cavalry, and one battery of artillery. The first attack was made at 7 o'clock in the forenoon, at two points, and was gallantly repulsed by the National Camp under Colonels Garrard and Schaft. Another attack was made about 1 o'clock in the afternoon which was at a regular fight, and a skirmishing fire was kept up until 3, when Zollicoffer drew off. The National forces numbered only 1000, but had a decided advantage in the position.

BATTLE NEAR PILOT KNOB.

A rather important battle took place last week at Fredericktown, near Pilot Knob, in Missouri. Colonel Plummer, with detachments of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, attacked and completely routed 5000 rebels under Generals Jeff Thompson and Parsons. The latter was killed, together with a large number of the enemy—how many it is not stated. The rebel loss in the fight was killed, five prisoners wounded, and twenty slightly wounded. The National troops captured eight wagons, each detachment striving to excel the others in acts of bravery.

CONVICTION OF A PRIVATEER.

The trial of Philadelphia of Wesley B. Smith, one of the crew of the late privateer Jeff Davis, captured on board the Enchantress, was concluded on 28th, and resulted in his conviction of the crime of piracy. The Jury was out but half an hour.

REGULARS COMING FROM THE PACIFIC.

The Alta Californian of October 2, notices the receipt of orders by General Sumner to dispatch at once to the East the entire force of regulars on the Pacific coast. This force numbers 5000 men. It will take a month to collect it from its scattered posts. Volunteer forces are to garrison the forts from which they are withdrawn.

THE ELLSWORTH AVENGERS.

The People's Fifteenth Regiment, Colonel Stryker, arrived in Washington on 25th from Albany. The regiment numbers 1000 rank and file, and is fully armed, equipped, and uniformed. None of the men are over thirty years old, and all of them are unmarried.

STRENGTH OF THE UNION ARMY.

From reliable sources the Herald has compiled a table showing the number of troops each loyal State has now in the field or on their way to the seat of war:

States.	Infantry.	Cavalry.	Artillery.	Total.
Connecticut.....	4,188	100	—	4,288
Maine.....	8,000	8,000	—	16,000
Indiana.....	30,000	5,000	500	35,500
Iowa.....	16,100	1,000	—	17,100
Kansas.....	4,000	1,000	200	5,200
Massachusetts.....	20,000	—	350	20,350
Maine.....	8,000	1,200	300	9,500
Michigan.....	13,734	2,000	350	16,084
Minnesota.....	5,000	—	—	5,000
New York.....	80,000	5,000	2,000	87,000
New Jersey.....	9,000	—	500	9,500
New Hampshire.....	3,000	—	200	3,200
Ohio.....	65,000	8,500	600	67,100
Pennsylvania.....	51,000	4,000	800	55,800
Rhode Island.....	2,673	—	750	3,573
Vermont.....	6,000	—	300	6,300
Wisconsin.....	10,000	1,200	1100	12,300
Total.....	314,370	35,500	6,950	475,500

In addition to these there are the State and Government troops in Kentucky and Missouri, which may be estimated as follows:

	Government.	State.
Missouri.....	15,000	25,000
Kentucky.....	8,000	20,000
Total.....	18,000	45,000

There are also five thousand volunteers raised in California, five thousand in Maryland, one thousand six hundred in Delaware, and two thousand in the District of Columbia, besides ten thousand regulars, which, added together, will show the Union loyal forces to number five hundred and twelve thousand men.

THE NEW STATE OF KANAWHA.

The people of Northwestern Virginia (the 19 counties now openly adhering to the Union) voted last week on the question of being set off from the Old Dominion and formed into the new State of Kanawha. So far as we have returns, a large majority voted for the new State.

COMPLETION OF THE PACIFIC TELEGRAPH.

The Pacific Telegraph was completed to San Francisco on 24th, and messages are now sent freely between New York and that distant point on the Pacific coast. The first dispatch sent over the line was from Stephen J. Field, Chief-Justice of California, to President Lincoln.

UNION FEELING IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Rev. Mr. Conway, Chaplain of the Ninth New York Volunteers, arrived in Washington on 26th, from Hatteras Inlet, whence he was dispatched by General Williams to the President, informing him of the loyal feeling of the citizens of Hyde County, North Carolina, and bringing with him a declaration of independence of the people of that county, announcing themselves forever free and independent of the Rebel Confederacy, together with a request for arms for their defense. They are represented as suffering intensely from the point of starvation—from the despotism of the rebel army.

REBELS GOING HOME.

Reports from Kentucky, by way of Cairo, inform us that a large portion of the rebel forces lately at Columbus, under General Polk, are leaving for New Orleans and Mobile, in anticipation, probably, of a descent upon those points by the national expedition which has already sailed, or is about to sail.

THE DEFENSES OF NEW ORLEANS.

A Doctor Bradley, a Southern refugee, just arrived at Washington reports that great preparations are making at New Orleans in anticipation of a visitation by the National forces. Four 32-pounders had been planted on the Custom-house, which commands the entrance to the harbor, and guns of smaller calibre had been placed upon the roofs of other buildings, all strongly constructed. Light draft boats had been assigned to duty on Lake Pontchartrain. Dr. Bradley states that Confederate currency in many parts of the South has already depreciated thirty per cent.

WHEREABOUTS OF MESSRS. SLIDELL AND MASON.

A vessel just arrived from the West Indies brings intelligence that the rebel emissaries, Messrs. Slidell and Mason, at Cardenas, Cuba, direct from Charleston, with Mason and Slidell on board, on the 7th inst. The French Consul and family were also in the Theodora.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

MOVEMENTS OF ROYAL PERSONAGES.

The King of Prussia enjoyed a very agreeable reception from Napoleon and Eugenie. King Frederick the Second (ex), of Naples will not be represented at the coronation of the King of Prussia. The Queen of Madagascar is dead. Her son has been proclaimed King, and he has formally demanded a French protectorate.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Ladies—Try it.

ANDREWS' EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER, for many years established in public favor, is now offered for sale in all parts of the intelligent Home-keeper! This compound is perfectly healthful and dietetic, and ready for use in one minute! There can be no failure with the baking of Rolls, Cakes, Pancakes, or Tea Biscuits! It is the natural preparation (not artificial) of Nature's certificate of its efficacy and wholesomeness on each label. Ask your Grocer for ANDREWS' YEAST POWDER. On using it, you will tell him, IT IS THE BEST!

Sold at Wholesale by

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
136 and 138 Cedar Street, New York.

Choice, Curious, and Valuable Books.

The Subscriber has just received from Europe, and now offers for sale at very low prices, a vast assortment of Books, both new and old. Among them are fine works of the Latin and Greek Fathers, Classics, Theology, Fine Arts, Poetry, Drama, French and Italian Classics, Bibliography, Antiquaries, Biography, Heraldry, History, Languages, Voyages and Travels, Natural History, Books of Engravings, Picture Galleries, &c. Also, a very large assortment of English Law Books. Catalogues of the above will be issued from time to time, and sent to any address gratis on application to W. P. REEVE, Importer of Books, 151 Fulton Street, up stairs, between Nassau and Broadway, New York City.

A New Cartridge Revolver,

Carrying Six Balls (50 to the pound). Any one wanting a superior Pocket or Belt Arm will find this to be the best in the market. Price $12 00.

MERWIN & BRAY, Agents, 245 Broadway, N. Y.

This Day Published,

Revised Regulations

FOR THE

Army of the United States.

1861.

WITH A FULL INDEX.

One Volume Octavo. 550 pp. Price $2 00.

Important changes and additions have been made to this REVISED Edition of the ARMY REGULATIONS, and should be in the hands of all who have the premises editing.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,
Publishers and Booksellers,
25 and 24 N. Fourth Street,
Philadelphia.

A WONDERFUL LITTLE MICROSCOPE,

MAGNIFYING small objects 500 times, sent to any applicant on receipt of twenty-five cents in silver, and a stamp. Five different powers for one dollar. Address SEM. M. S. WOODWARD, Box 1594, Philad., Pa.

Cloaks! Cloaks! Cloaks!

BRODIE

has made his

Grand Opening

of

Fall and Winter Cloaks,

at his

OLD STAND,

300 Canal Street,

and

His Palace of Fashion,

Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,

Cor. of 23d Street,

New York.

WINTER FASHIONS.—SPLENDID NOVELTIES for 1861-2.—Extra Large and Magnificent FASHION-PLATES; nearly 100 Splendid ENGRAVINGS; Reliable Information; and 3 full-sized PATTERNS, in the Winter No. of MME. DEMOREST'S QUARTERLY MIRROR OF FASHIONS. Now Ready.

Largest and best Fashion Magazine ever issued. Yearly, $1, with a Premium; postage on Premium, 3 cents. Single copy, 25 cents. Subscribe for Dinks and full-sized Patterns, 10 cents. Specimens copies sent, gratuitously, on receipt of the price. Published at Mme. DEMOREST'S Emporium, 473 Broadway, N. Y., and all newsvenders.

Jewelry! Jewelry!

The Head-Quarters for all Cash Buyers of Fine and Cheap Jewelry, Miniature Pins of all the Heroes.

Great Bargains, especially in all Kinds of Valuable Jewelry Articles. Persons wishing to see Samples, enclose Stamp for full particulars.

W. A. HAYWARD,
(Manufacturing Jeweler),
168 Broadway.

Prize-Medal, Paris Exhibition, 1855.

LAWSON & CO., Printing-Ink Manufacturers,
NEW YORK, LONDON, and PARIS.
New York Depot, 7 Franklin Square, Fourth Street.

HARPER'S WEEKLY, and all the principal Illustrated Newspapers in America and Europe, are printed with L. & Co.'s Inks.

COTTAGE

Printing Press.

Every Man his Own Printer.

Portable Printing Offices, for Merchants, Druggists, and Professional Men. Send for a Circular.

ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 117 Fulton Street, and 31 Park Row, New York.

How to Obtain a Patent.

MESSRS. MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, and for fifteen years Solicitors of American and European Patents, have issued a neat pamphlet, giving advice "How to obtain a Patent," which they will furnish free by mail. All Inventors who wish to take Patents should send for it. Address MUNN & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

GAME, MEATS, FISH, &c., improved by the use of Lea & Perrins's Worcestershire Sauce.
JOHN DUNCAN & SONS,
Union Square and 14th Street, Sole Agents.

$100 PER MONTH.—Agents positively wanted to sell the Wheeler Patent Button Fastened Shirt. Address Dr. M. BROWN, New York.

"What Cheer?"—Yeast Cakes, made from pure hops, unexcelled for raising Bread and Pastry. For Buckwheat Cakes, most delicious. Sold by grocers generally.

Superior Food.—Robinson's Pure Scotch Oatmeal, in point packets. For Children, Invalids, and others, it will be found easily digested. Sold by all grocers.

COOLEY'S Cabinet Printing Office for small Printers and Amateurs, the best thing out. Send for Circulars.
A. COOLEY & CO., 113 Fulton Street, N. Y.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or personal appearance, which can be had free for 25 cents. Address T. Williams & Co., Publishers, Box 2260, Philad.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to HAMPDEN & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

Commercial Agents wanted. Large commission, honorable business. Circulars sent. A.W. Harrison, Phila.

A $25 Cent Sewing Machine!

And 5 other colossus inventions. Agents wanted every where. Descriptive Circulars sent free. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

$150 PER MONTH made by enterprising agents selling HOWE'S NEW HEMMER and SHIELD FOR SEWING MACHINES. Protects the finger and makes a beautiful hem. Sample sent on receipt of 50 cents. Address A. H. DOWNER, No. 342 Broadway.

SANFORD'S

Challenge Heaters.

TO SET IN BRICK. PORTABLE,

Or as FIRE PLACE HEATERS.

The most powerful Heaters known for warming DWELLINGS, CHURCHES, SCHOOLS, STORES, &c. Send or call for a circular description, and an unrivalled mass of testimony, from some of our first citizens.

Sanford's Mammoth

Globe Heaters,

Of great power, and economy of fuel, for all public places where great heat is wanted, as STORES, HALLS, &c. Many hundreds of these Heaters are used by the HUDSON RIVER and other RAILROADS, most of the FERRIES, FIRE-ENGINE HOUSES, &c., &c. Several sizes of Heaters for sale as inferior. Get Sanford's Mammoth.

The Cosmopolite

Parlor Coal Stove,

With Radiator, Ventilator, and Gas Burning Attachment.

Introduced one year ago, already ranks as THE LEADING STOVE for PALLORS, SITTING ROOMS, and all places where a soft, PLEASANT HEAT is desired. Fire may be kept all winter with as small a quantity of fuel, easily

The Challenge Air-Tight

Kitchen Ranges.

For Coal and Wood. Have the LARGEST OVEN ever put in a RANGE; BAKE PERFECTLY, never fail to bake brown at the bottom, BOIL, ROAST, and BROIL with great facility, and EXTRAORDINARY ECONOMY of FUEL; may be placed in a fire-place or set up as a stove.

Beacon Light,

Summer and Winter Portable Steamer.

A very Popular Range, with Six Boiler Holes, one large Oven that bakes perfectly, with an arrangement for Roasting or Heating Irons at the end.

A Perfect Apparatus for a Few Dollars.

Also a GREAT VARIETY of COOKING and HEATING APPARATUS to suit every need.

Call or send for descriptive and references of above to

SANFORD, TRUSLOW & CO.,
239 and 241 Water Street, N. Y.

The New Gas Lamps,

For burning Warwick Carbo-Naphtha and other Coal Oils as Self-Generating Gas Light, adapted for public and private buildings, given great satisfaction. Sample lamp $3. "Cooper Lamps" and Complete Lamp Apparatus fitted and shown in here these Oils. Send for Illustrated Circular.
CALLENDER & PERCE, 175 Broadway, N. Y., up stairs.

Friends of Soldiers!

Send by Harnden's Express (the oldest Express), 74 Broadway, as they charge only half rates.

A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agents, E.C. WEST & CO., 115 Franklin St., New York. Sold by Apothecaries everywhere.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 4 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will not be sent gratuitously.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

JACK FALSTAFF HOLLINS (in the Bar-Room of the St. Charles at New Orleans). "I've Peppered Two of them; One, I am sure, I have Sunk. I tell thee what, if I tell thee a lie, spit in my face, call me horse. Four came all a front, and mainly made at me. I made no more ado, but took all their seven fires in my Iron-clad Craft; they followed me close, and with a thought Seven of the Eleven I ran aground."

[Compare SHAKSPEARE, First Part Henry II., Act II., Scene 4.

SOUTHERN PLANTER. "Pomp, you Rascal! do you see any of those Cussed Yankee Ships coming this way?"

POMP (suddenly becoming Serious). "Lor' bress you, Massa, I'se so awful scared since you was a-tellin me de Yankees would sell me into Cuba, dat I can't see nuffin' at all."

CÆSAR (behind the door). "That's so. Yah! yah!"

BROTHER JONATHAN, who has been getting up a Military Statue, succeeds very well in the Model of the Figure, but wants a Head. Which of our Generals will furnish the Model for that? He waits for a reply.

The Graefenberg Family Medicines,
No. 2 Bond Street, New York.

IF Read the following:* —23

From the N. Y. OBSERVER.—Many of the leading publications in the country have spoken in the highest terms of the Graefenberg Institution, and its theory and practice. Others have permitted the Resident Physician to refer to them. Among these last we have noticed the names of HORACE GREELEY, of the Tribune; Prof. M. F. JAYNES, of the Vassar Female College, Poughkeepsie; Rev. E. H. CHAPIN, D.D., of New York; Prof. A. P. PEABODY, of Harvard University, &c.

The Graefenberg Vegetable Pills

will cure Liver Complaint, Costiveness, Indigestion, Headache, Fevers, Sour Stomach, Bilious Diseases. IF* They are certain to cure pimples, eruptions, and all marks on the skin. 23 PRICE 25 CENTS A BOX, WITH DIRECTIONS. SENT BY MAIL, FREE OF POSTAGE, ON THE RECEIPT OF 25 CENTS.

Address JOSHUA F. RANDEL, M.D., Resident Physician, Graefenberg Institute, No. 2 Bond Street, New York.

Devlin & Co.

We are this week in receipt of large importations of choice

WINTER OVERCOATINGS,

FRENCH CASSIMERES,

NEW STYLES VESTINGS,

WINTER UNDERWEAR.

And have also added largely to our superior stock of ready made

WINTER CLOTHING,

All of which we are selling at exceedingly low prices.

DEVLIN & CO.,

Corner of Broadway and Warren and Grand Streets.

AGENTS — EITHER MALE OR FEMALE, will be convinced, by sending a stamp for our circular, that our FINE Postage

Contains more Articles

of a better quality, and

SELLS MORE RAPIDLY

than any other in the market. For your benefit we enumerate each article in the package:—Six sheets commercial note paper, six sheets ladies' note, six sheets ladies' billet paper, one accommodation penholder, two fine steel pens, one fine pencil, one sheet blotting paper, one fine engraving (8x10) of General McClellan, six white envelopes, with patriotic Union designs in colors, six ladies' white envelopes in beautiful colors, six buff envelopes, seventy-five valuable recipes. In addition to these articles, we give with each package a

SUPERB PIECE OF JEWELRY,

of a richer quality than anything in the market, and

WORTH DOUBLE THE PRICE

paid for the whole, consisting of the following articles:—Brooches, lockets, sleeve buttons, rings, crosses, gents' pins, &c. If the contents of one of our packages were purchased elsewhere they would cost at least $1. Agents can make from $5 to $10 a day.

RICHARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Agents Wanted.—Something New.

Articles of real merit in every family: "Patent Honey" or "Table Manna—Sample by mail 25c.—Recipe, with Family Flight to make it, $1. "Clark's Patent Indelible Pencil," for marking linen; "Patent Match Safe," for vest pocket; "Downes's Patent Hemmer and Shirrer;" "Coffee Strainer and Extractor;" "Egyptian Cement," for family use; "Patent Work-Holder." Satisfaction given or money refunded. Address (with stamp) RICE & CO., 81 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Ladies are invited to call and examine the splendid stock of fine furs and children's fancy fats now open at TERRY'S, 307 Broadway, New York.

The Sewing Machine.

With fingers nimble and fine,
With features gladsome and gay,
A lady sat in her pretty boudoir,
Joyfully working away.
Click! click! click!
In comfort she sat—like a queen,
And sang to the music merry and quick,
Of FISHLE and LYON'S machine.

"Click—click—click—
My work is almost done.
Click—click—click—
Before I have scarcely begun!
Oh! shame on the girls, I say,
Who now would their duty shirk,
And waste their time in dressing and play,
If sums is needie work!

"Click—click—click—
How the magic needle flies!
Click—click—click—
I can scarce believe my eyes!
Seam, and gusset, and band,—
Band, and gusset, and seam,—
I really could almost work asleep,
And stray away in my dream!

"Click—click—click—
Say, it sews whatever you choose,—
From the finest piece of tender gauze
To a cloak or a pair of shoes!
Click—click—click—
As I watch the merry thing
In fancy oft, within my sight,
To life it seems sporting!

"Oh! men with sisters dear!
Oh! men with mothers and wives!
How should you bless the men who thus
Gladden our precious lives!
Whose genius can make home so bright,—
Who chase our cares away
By making woman's duties light,
And turning toil to play!

"Then go,—at once—and get
A machine exactly like mine;
Others are good, but above them all
FISHLE AND LYON'S shine;
Buy at 628 BROADWAY,
And you'll get one there so nice,
That many a long day to come
You'll be glad of my advice."

With fingers nimble and fine,
With features gladsome and gay,
A lady sat in her pretty boudoir,
Joyfully working away—
Click! click! click!
In comfort she sat—like a queen,—
And sang to the music merry and quick,
Of FISHLE and LYON'S machine.

Fine Shirts & Collars

On hand and made to order in any style, by

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York.

ALL WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Wedding Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 183 Broadway. Samples by mail.

Employment at a liberal salary, and expenses. For terms address HARRIS BROTHERS, Boston, Mass.

WARD'S

Perfect Fitting Shirts,

MADE TO MEASURE AT $13 PER DOZEN.

Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, drawings of different styles of Shirts, sent free everywhere.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

No. 397 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

Beadle's Dime Books.

All of Beadle's Dime Books are kept for sale by all

Booksellers, Newsdealers, Country Merchants & Army Sutlers.

Just issued, Beadle's Dime Novels, No. 31.

THE DOUBLE HERO;

A Tale of Land and Sea during the War of 1812.

BEADLE'S DIME UNION SONG BOOKS, Nos. 1 and 2.
BEADLE'S DIME SONG BOOKS, Nos. 1 to 5.
BEADLE'S DIME DRILL BOOK.
BEADLE'S DIME MELODIST (Male and Words).

Hand-Books for Housekeepers.

BEADLE'S DIME COOK-BOOK.
BEADLE'S DIME RECIPE-BOOK.
BEADLE'S DIME FAMILY PHYSICIAN
BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF ETIQUETTE.
BEADLE'S DIME DRESSMAKER'S GUIDE.

Dime Books for Schools.

BEADLE'S DIME SPEAKERS, Nos. 1 and 2.
BEADLE'S DIME DIALOGUES, Nos. 1 and 2.
BEADLE'S DIME SCHOOL MELODIST.
BEADLE'S DIME LETTER-WRITER.

Beadle's Dime Biographical Library.

EACH NUMBER COMPLETE.

OUR GENERALS AND HEROES.

WINFIELD SCOTT, Commander-in-Chief U. S. A.
JOHN C. FREMONT, the American Pathfinder.
PAUL JONES, the Revolutionary Naval Hero.
MAJ.-GEN. LAFAYETTE and his Services to the Revolution.
MAJ.-GEN. WAYNE, the Hero of Two Wars.

BEADLE'S DIME NOVELS.

Frontier and Border Stories.

By EDWARD S. ELLIS, Esq.

SETH JONES; or, The Captives of the Frontier.
BILL BIDDON, Trapper; or, Life in the Northwest.
THE FRONTIER ANGEL; a Romance of Kentucky Rangers' Life.
NATHAN TODD; or, The Fate of the Sioux' Captive.
THE TRAIL HUNTERS; or, Monowano, the Shawanee Spy.
THE FOREST SPY; a Romance of the War of 1812.

Since the days of Cooper no author has written with so much success in the Field of Indian Frontier Life. The Books named have had a most astonishing circulation.

Revolutionary and Sea Stories.

THE MAID OF ESOPUS; or, The Trials and Triumphs of the Revolution.
STELLA; the Daughter of Liberty.
THE PRIVATEER'S CRUISE, and the Bride of Powfret Hall.
THE REEFER OF '76; or, The Cruise of the Firefly.

Two most exciting Sea Romances of the "times which tried men's souls."

CEDAR SWAMP; or, Wild Nat's Brigade. A very popular Revolutionary Story.

Ten Cents each. Single copies sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. Agents wanted in every Town and Regiment in the United States. Send for a Catalogue.

Address BEADLE & CO., New York.

Works on Artillery.

Artillerists' Manual, by Capt. John Gibbon, U. S. A., half roan $3 50
The Field Book of Artillery, by Capt. J. Roberts, U. S. A., cloth 75
Evolutions of Field Batteries of Artillery, by Gen. R. Anderson, U. S. A. 1 00
Treatise on Ordnance and Gunnery, by Lieut. F. Simpson, U. S. Navy ..... In press.
Instruction in Field Artillery, for Board of Officers 2 50
Elements of Gunnery, by John Hyde 4 00
Strength of Gunnery and Fortification. 7th edition 14 00
Teachers on Artillery in the Field 50
Emperor Napoleon's New System of Field Artillery 1 00
Aide Memoire d'Artillerie. Third Edition 4 00

D. VAN NOSTRAND,
Publisher and Importer, No. 192 Broadway.

Snow's Pure Confectionery,

500 Kinds, 693 Broadway, N. Y. Wholesale and Retail. Dealers enclose stamp for catalogue and prices.

CHOICE FURS. No. 49 Broadway.

Opening at retail of an entirely new stock of Sables. Misses' and Children's Furs in the most desirable styles, made below usual prices.

GOOD.
Practical Furrier.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 255.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE RETIREMENT OF GENERAL SCOTT.

We publish on this page a picture of the last interview between GENERAL SCOTT and the CABINET on the day of his retirement. On 31st October the following letter from him was received by the President:

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY, WASHINGTON, Oct. 31, 1861.

The Hon. SIMON CAMERON, Secretary of War.

SIR,—For more than three years I have been unable, from a hurt, to mount a horse or to walk more than a few paces at a time, and that with much pain. Other and new infirmities—dropsy and vertigo—admonish me that repose of mind and body, with the appliances of surgery and medicine, are necessary to add a little more to a life already protracted much beyond the usual span of man.

It is under such circumstances, made doubly painful by the unnatural and unjust rebellion now raging in the Southern States of our so lately prosperous and happy Union, that I am compelled to request that my name be placed on the list of army officers retired from active service. As this request is founded on an absolute right, granted by a recent act of Congress, I am entirely at liberty to say it is with deep regret that I withdraw myself, in these momentous times, from the orders of a President who has treated me with much distinguished kindness and courtesy, whom I know, upon much personal intercourse, to be patriotic, without sectional partialities or prejudices, to be highly conscientious in the performance of every duty, and of unrivaled activity and perseverance. I remain, Sir, with high respect, your obedient servant,

WINFIELD SCOTT.

It was decided that General Scott's request, under the circumstances of his advanced age and infirmities, could not be declined. General McClellan was thereupon, with the unanimous agreement of the Council, Winfield Scott ordered to be placed, and hereby is placed, upon the list of retired officers of the army of the United States, without reduction in his current pay, subsistence, or allowances.

THE LAST MEETING BETWEEN GENERAL SCOTT AND THE CABINET.

The duties of the Body-Guard through Springfield is described in the following dispatches:

HEAD-QUARTERS, IN THE FIELD,
NEAR SHERRINGTON, MISSOURI, SEPTEMBER 30, 1861.

CAPTAIN MCKENNEY, ASSISTANT ADJUTANT-GENERAL:

Yesterday afternoon Major Seagonyne, at the head of my Guards, made a most brilliant charge upon a body of the enemy, drawn up in line of battle, and their camp, at Springville, 1,000 strong. The charge, completely routed them, cleared them from the town, hoisted the national flag on the Court-house, and retired upon a reinforcement which he has already joined. Our loss is not great.

The second charge against my very large odds is a noble example to the army. Our advance will occupy Springfield to-night. J. C. FREMONT,
Major-General Commanding.

The following is a special dispatch to the St. Louis Republican:

The following dispatch has been received, announcing the most brilliant victory at Springfield by General Frémont's Body-Guard, under Major Seagonyne:

FIVE MILES OUT OF SHERMAN, OCT. 30—8 A.M.,
GENERAL,—Report respectfully that yesterday, at four P.M., I met in Springfield about 1000 rebels formed in line of battle. They were in very strong position, but my Guard, with one feeling, made a charge, and in less than three minutes the enemy was completely routed by one hundred and fifty men. We cleared the city of every rebel and retired, as usual, at night, and not feeling it safe to keep the place with so small a force. Major Whitney remained did not participate in the charge. I have no casualties, but such brilliant bravery I have never seen, and did not expect. Both officers and men—"Frémont and the Union!"—broke out like thunder.

CHARLES SEAGONYNE,
Major Commanding Body-Guard.

General Frémont's Body-Guard numbers three hundred.

Of Frémont's bridge across the Osage the correspondent of the Times says:

The Osage at this point, from bank to bank, is perhaps two hundred yards wide; but now, owing to low water, there is a wide bar in the middle, leaving only a narrow stream of water over the ford in width on either side. These two streams are the ones which are now being bridged by General Frémont for the passage of his army. Piers have been built and erected, stringers stretched across these, and upon them is placed a covering of hewn logs, to obtain which General Frémont has torn down several log-houses. The work is a very substantial one, and will be finished to-day or to-morrow at furthest.

OUR WAR MAP.

We have the pleasure to state that we have republished separately

The Admirable War Map

which appeared in the last Number of Harper's Weekly, and that we are prepared to furnish it,

BEAUTIFULLY COLORED,

at SIX CENTS per copy, with the usual discount to Agents. This Map is generally admitted to be the MOST COMPLETE WAR MAP IN EXISTENCE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1861.

GENERAL SCOTT.

FULL of honors; full of years; beloved and trusted as few men have been, the old soldier stands erect before his country, raises his hand, and for the last time gives us the parting salute. His life is a part of American history. His name is identified with our struggles and triumphs; nor shall it be counted other than a glory to him, that the height of his wild rebellion against the national existence—when the energy, the activity, the ready recuperation of youth are essential to the chief military commander—has passed away, and left nearly all our veteran General; and with simple dignity he takes the step which shows that patriotic duty is still his only inspiration. Finis coronat opus: the end crowns the work. It was the motto on Washington's seal. It will be the legend of Scott's life.

As we all read in the papers of his interview with the Cabinet and retirement from public service, it was impossible not to recall that other scene, of eighty years ago, in the old building still standing at the corner of Broad and Pearl streets, in the city of New York. It was at noon of the 4th of December, 1782, that Washington met all his officers at the inn where he lodged. The meeting. From that delusion they have not been spoken; and at length Washington arose, and, filling a glass of wine, turned to his officers, and spoke the words that we all remember. He then asked them to come and take his hand; and, in sacred tears and silence, he so bade them farewell.

But this time, as our other venerated soldier speaks to the President a few words of farewell gushing from the heart, it is the whole country that says to him, with emotion, as Washington said to his Generals: "With hearts full of love and gratitude we now bid you adieu. In the most devout joy wish that your latter days may be as prosperous as and happy as your former ones have been glorious and honorable."

THE DISAPPOINTMENTS OF THE TRAITORS.

THE traitors who are now in arms against their country are not to be envied. In their case the stings of conscience must be quickened by a consciousness of their wrong even at the first that Providence is against them. Every thing they have tried has failed; every project they set their hands to has resulted disastrously. Even on the day their friend, the honey dotard Buchan ana, vacated the post he disgraced, the hand of God has lain heavily on them and theirs.

They began with their eyes open with the notion—encouraged somewhat by presses and persons here—that a substantial portion of the North opposite would side with them in their rebellion. From that delusion they have never fully awakened by imposing masters of Northern Democrats in support of the Union, and by the ignominious surrender of such pseudo-Democrats as Breckinridge and Wickliffe, who promised for a time to abet them in their treason. They know now that twenty millions of freemen—aided by the majority of the people of Maryland, Kentucky, Delaware, and Missouri—are decidedly against them.

They believed—as the letters of the special correspondent of the Herald show—that neither Great Britain nor France would suffer the cotton ports to be blockaded. Europe, they boasted in their meanness, would come to their relief, and would raise the blockade. At this they have been most egregiously disappointed. Neither England nor France evince the slightest tendency to interfere with the blockade. In fact, they have no motive for doing so; for their trouble is not so much the want of cotton as the want of a market—at the North—for their manufactured goods. Cotton they can dispense with if they can not sell cotton cloths. The "fluffy potentate" has been ejected from his throne. His power depended upon the readiness of the North to consume the products of the looms of Manchester and Lowell. The North has ceased to consume, and the tyrant, whose sovereignty rested upon the slavery of four millions of human beings, tumbles helplessly to the earth. England and France will not disturb the blockade—and this the South knows by this time.

The traitors were satisfied that they would this summer hold Washington. One Walker, who figured as "Secretary of War" of the rebels, announced in April that they would seize Washington by May, and the Creole Beauregard declared that by the middle of June as the time when he would be in possession. The arch-traitor, Jefferson Davis, sent word to keep his pew in church for him, as his family would want it this summer. So long as Buchanan was President there was some ground for these expectations. That miserable old man labored so strenuously on behalf of the rebels, and there were so many other traitors in every Government office, that it was natural the insurgents should hope to win possession of the capital. That prize is now beyond their reach. No city in the world is so well fortified as Washington. All the fighting men in the South can not take it. This must be a bitter disappointment.

It was confidently announced that the secession of the entire States would be the ruin, commercially and financially, of the North. The fact is that stocks have risen 10 to 20 per cent. since the war began; business has improved in every direction; our banks hold twice as much specie as they did a year ago; our exports are increasing and our imports are diminishing; money is plenty, and food is cheap, the demand for labor is in excess of the supply, and the great cities of the North, New York, Chicago, Cincinnati, Boston, Buffalo, Philadelphia, etc., were never more prosperous. They are at present. It is now evident that our Northern people have accommodated themselves to the war. They have made up their minds to the temporary loss of the Southern markets, and they find they can get along without them. The North is really richer to-day than it was twelve months ago. That is a bitter disappointment.

These failures must operate rather unpleasantly upon the spirits of the leaders of the Southern treason. They will produce no effect upon their followers—except the black—because Southern newspapers are not suffered to tell the truth. But such men as Davis, Toombs, Stephens, Benjamin, Hunter, Brown, etc., must begin to see that their case is desperate. They have succeeded in nothing but in alienating their Northern friends, weakening slavery in the Border States, impoverishing the entire South, dooming the slaves to years of emancipation, destroying the credit of Southern States, ruining forever the political power of the slave institution, stimulating the growth of cotton all over the world, teaching the North its independence of the South, and imbuing the whole civilized world with a thorough conviction of the brutality, baseness, and meanness of a society "based on the corner-stone of human slavery." In every thing else they have failed. How long will they persist in the failure?

THE LOUNGER.

JUSTICE TO OUR GENERALS.

IT does not follow because General Frémont is an honest and able soldier that he is therefore a competent director of the Department of the West. But it certainly does follow that, if the Administration is convinced of his competency, it should remove him and not revile him. The Department of War, in authorizing, as the Tribune says that it did, the publication of General Thomas's memoranda of his Western tour, surely exposes its own incompetency quite as positively as General Frémont was exposed by publishing.

For either the report had convinced the Secretary that Frémont was incompetent, or it had not. If it had, it was his duty to ask his removal. If not, if the effort were unavailing, it was his duty not to injure the service by taking the public into his confidence. It is the business to appeal to the public against the President.

But if it had not convinced him, what honorable motive can be suggested for the publication of a document which generally demoralizes the entire Western Department at its most critical and perilous moment?

We may not complain of blunders, for they must occur in our situation, and every man of common sense will expect them. But when a blunder evidently involves bad faith, every man of common sense ought to speak out. In the cloud of uncertainty which rests upon the whole campaign in Missouri, and in the unfortunate quarrel between General Frémont and Mr. Frank Blair, it has been impossible to see clearly enough to express any decided opinion, except of perfect faith in General Frémont's honesty and earnestness.

But this document of General Thomas's is not at all clear. It states facts and rumors prejudicial to the ability of General Frémont. If he is to be heard upon them, the dishonor of their publication before his answer is patent. If he is not to be heard upon them, their publication can have no other conceivable result than to aid and comfort the enemy. We say again, the report may have justified his removal. That is a question for the Commander-in-chief. But nothing can justify its publication.

Grant that Frémont is incapable—does any body suppose him to be a traitor, or treacherously inclined? But does any body doubt that Patterson was morally responsible for the disaster of Bull Run? Then why is not the same charitable silence allowed to fall upon honesty and loyalty, however unavailing, that so closely envelops conduct which you may qualify as you will?

If the President thinks Frémont incompetent, let him remove him. We shall all acquiesce; and if the newspapers choose to wrangle about him, let them wrangle. But if the President is not yet persuaded, then, in the name of the national honor, of his own dignity, and of the justice due to a brave and noble man who is busy with the enemy in front and in silent and powerful assailing in the rear, let the President of the United States and Commander-in-chief of the army show that the good name of every faithful soldier, whether high-placed general or private, is his peculiar care, and that the public shall have no official hints to his injury.

THE ARMADA.

Our great Armada has sailed away. Whither? The question may be answered before this piece is printed. It may be answered in victory which shall cheer the heart of every lover of liberty in the world. It may be answered in disaster that shall give those hearts a pang. It is announced now that "on Saturday" the point of destination will be safely told! What babies we still are! If all the newspapers in the land were as loyal as they ought to be, they would positively refuse to publish any such "authentic information." Perhaps they will!

But they may be pardoned if they only repeat the "authentic information" which has been enjoyed by so many thousands for the last month. Every man knew where he had gone, and how it was going; and every other man had reason to know that it was a different point. Every possible point from Mobile Bay to Orleans has been suspected and supported by the most incontestable considerations. Certainly the Administration deserves infinite credit for fitting out such an expedition, and, in these days of treason and telegraphic reporters, for keeping its secret so fast. Every body knows, of course. But fortunately nobody has the least idea.

There is one point in the order to General Sherman from Secretary Cameron which shows great good sense, and that is to use every man who can who is friendly and can be serviceable to the United States. Should such persons prove to be slaves under any local law and slaves of loyal masters, they are to be accounted for: they are not to be sent back. This, of course, is for two reasons. In the first place, nobody could be sent where they were or were not the slaves of loyal masters; and, secondly, if they were so proved, the army of the United States has been directed by Congress that its business is not slave-hunting.

The great Armada has sailed away. Our hopes and hearts sail with it. The business of the country: our hearts for the friends, and brothers, and husbands, and sons, and lovers, whom it carries. Let while we wait for news, if news shall not have come before this morning, then let us hope reasonably, not wildly, nor trust the future to a single chance. We lavish our love freely upon persons and things: we believe so implicitly that General This knows every thing and General That can do every thing, that our despondency is ever whining when they prove to be only men.

Let every body make up his mind to one thing. If you mean to support the success of this expedition as decisive of the war—the moment it is defeated, should defeat be in store for us, go over straight to the enemy. Do not say here mourning and mumbling, and wringing your hands. But if you mean to view its success or defeat as a man and a patriot should, then, if all seems going, prepare for another blow; remembering that with the true spirit which is now getting soberly to work, even at the worst, the more we are beaten, the more we shall beat.

And so calm waves! swift winds! and victory!

NATIONAL HYMNS.

MR. WHITE will names his little book upon the writing of national hymns in general, and upon our recent efforts in that direction in particular, a typical title of the times. He is a lover of art, a scholar and a musician, and will fill a quaint niche in our literature. The work is, properly, in three parts: first, a treatise upon national hymn writing, and upon music as the popular vehicle of such a hymn; second, a brief and admirable account of the two great national hymns, the Marseillaise and the Marseillaise; and, third, a history of the doings of the late Committee upon the subject, with specimens of some of the best and worst contributions offered to them.

The book is "thrown off;" but Mr. White is so familiar with the whole discussion, and with its aspects of poetry and music, that it is the "throwing off" of an accomplished scholar, musician, and gentleman—the throwing off of a composition of a master in the matter. The appointment of a committee for such a purpose can never be regretted, since the result is this pleasant volume.

No one, of course, knew better than Mr. White that popular songs do not come for the asking. The National Hymn was asked to be a song for the Army of the Rhine, and he shut himself up in his room for a night, and came out with the Marseillaise in the morning. But the writer of a tremendous contest over fellow-citizens began to sing; and somebody said if any body happens to write or sing a song that seems to a dozen gentlemen worthy to be a national hymn, he shall have five hundred dollars. That was the origin of the National Hymn Committee; and it would have been very churlish on the part of any gentleman asked to decline to give twelve hundred of his fellow-citizens a chance of getting so handsome a sum.

But it was those gentlemen, and not the twelve hundred, who were on trial. They were to say to the country, "Here is a hymn which we think ought to be the national hymn." But suppose that the country had not thought so! The sole satisfied person would then have been the one who received the cash premium.

It should be said also, in regard to the book which Mr. White has prepared, that the Committee expressly reserved the right to publish the songs which seemed to them aptly good, even if not entirely suitable for the purpose, in case there were no objection upon the part of the authors. They expressly did not bind themselves to give any prize; nor to give a prize to the best offered; nor to refrain from publication of such as should be selected. If any author sent a hymn for competition without first consulting the conditions, it was certainly not the fault of the Committee.

The book vindicates the final action of the Committee. Whatever may be the merit of the specimens published, it is evident that none of them are likely to be taken by the popular heart as the song of the nation. That such will come is possible. That it will not be an answer to any other advertisement than the standing advertisement which consists of the natural desire and love of good poetry and stirring song is probable. That some chance-comer, like Dixie or Yankee Doodle, may be whistled, and sung, and toted, and ground all over the land, until it is in a manner national, is a fact of experience. And when we have had for a long time an organized army; when the spirit of the country is as military as for many years it is likely to be, then the "tune" which is most popular, and which is universally played by all its bands, at all its posts, and along all its lines, and which is accompanied with some act of heroic daring and triumph, will doubtless become the melody of a national hymn.

JOHN BULL.

One of the most striking passages in Mr. White's book upon National Hymns is that in which he speaks briefly of the personification of the British genius in John Bull. Mr. White finds that this type came in with the Revolution of '88. John Bull was neither the gentleman of the Tudors nor the Cavalier of the Stuarts; but he dates from the Georges and the Hanoverian succession. He is the representative rural Englishman, the prize farmer, and country squire. He typifies profound selfishness, slow wit, inveterate prejudice, insular jealousy, and the vulgarity of wealth.

The vein in which Mr. White speaks is certainly worth working. It would be a curious national "study for the times" to see how justly John Bull typifies the average British character. A waggish friend of Mr. White's—if the author be not himself the wag—sends him this parody, which is a palpable hit:

"God save me, great John Bull!
Long keep my pockets full!
God save John Bull!

Ever victorious,
Haughty, unglorious,
Snobbish, unconscious,
God save John Bull!

"O Lords, our Gods, arise!
'Tax' all our enemies!
Make 'Tariffs'
Confound French politics,
Frustrate all Russian tricks,
Get Yankees in a 'fix.'
God 'bless' them all!
Sinistra manus.]

"Thy choicest gifts in store,
On me, me only, pour,
Me, great John Bull!
Maintain supreme laws,
Frown down the poor man's cause,
So sing with heart and voice,
I, great John Bull!"

THE ASTRONOMER SONTAG.

A LATE article of the Lounger's confounded the astronomer Sontag, who died upon the Hayes' expedition, with Sontag the painter. The following note is from "a friend of the deceased Dr. August Sontag:"

"You mistake the person who acted at Fort Foulke for the artist and landscape painter Sontag. August Sontag, a native of Alfeld, Hanover, was an astronomer and naturalist. He obtained at an early age the academical honor of a Doctor Philosophiæ. The desire to enlarge his knowledge bro't him to the country shortly before the Mexican war, during which he was attached to the corps of topographical engineers. He was an active and valuable member of the first Grinnell expedition in search of Captain John Franklin; joined afterward the expedition of the lamented Dr. Hayes to explore Ysabella and the great volcanic mountain chain of Mexico, and obtained, finally, a situation in the Dudley Observatory, whence he again connected himself with the expedition under Dr. Hayes.—He was not much of an artist and draughtsman, and you would in vain expect sketches from him. Sontag the artist and Sontag painter is still alive, and not a thousand miles from New York."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A YOUTHFUL INDISCRETION.—What is the difference between spermaceti and a school-boy's heel?—One is the wax produced by the whale, and the other is the wail produced by the whacks.

SOLUTION OF A CURIOUS PROBLEM.—Those who watched the great chess match between Mr. Paulsen and his ten opponents at the Cigar Divan have particularly admired the coolness with which the German played his game. Very proper, too, for we all know how dangerous it is to receive a check during a perspiration.

FEMALE CURIOSITY (Yankee Division).—Why is a man unable to walk because his leg is broken like a door that won't open and won't easily? Because both cases are the result of a huge array.

ENCHANTMENT LENDS DELL.—What circumstance will always prevent an Englishman from becoming an Irish property?—Because he will be gone there to buy land he can only go to Ireland.

A NEW EMPLOYMENT.—Mr. Brown met an acquaintance the other day, who was sketching a figure sitting on a rock pace, as if he had the business of a nation depending upon his rapid haste. "You appear to be in a hurry," said Brown; "what business pursues?" "Oh, sir, how are you?" said he friend, "I've a day of matters to look after. I'm in the employ of Leggett, Walker, and Doolittle, an important firm! they employ no less than a thousand clerks just at this time." "What is your department?" "Why, principal proprietor!—Secretary to the corporation." The fact, Brown's friend was a walking gentleman out of employment.

BEN SMITH, "a character" in more ways than one, and especially noted for the flights of eloquence, spoke as follows upon the question: Which is man's greatest sufferings, that which he has to endure in the absence of theology; and after pronouncing an affecting eulogy upon that noble science, he descended to universities, and "brought down the house," by the following brilliant passage: "Suppose for a moment the essential oil of a man was cleaning: and suppose, Sir, that night was to overtake you, and you must have to sneak up some dark, boozling whitemen! and in the black midnight, when you had but to step in the arms of Morpheus, a flea, pointer, or some other venomous insect, was to spring upon you, what good would you do you then? But your dog would have said to you by his forewarning lamentations, 'Take heed! there will be a coming!'" Decision in favor of the "Dog-watch!"

THE WIND-AWAKE PRINCE.—"The Doctor," a famous jockey, who had the contract to furnish thirty horses for the suite of the Prince of Wales throughout the tour, at eight dollars each per day, drove Prince Alfred to the Falls of Montmorenci. "The Doctor" remarked to Alfred, "I drove the Prince of Wales here." "Did you?" said the Prince. "Yes, and his Royal Highness gave me this gold watch." "You are a lucky fellow," replied Prince Alfred; "that is more than he ever did for me." The "Doctor" subsided.

A HEROIC LASS.—A young woman had laid a wager she could walk a mile in less than a half hour in the night, and bring from these a skull. The person who took the wager lost provoking his himself in the vault, and as the girl seized the skull, cried, in a hollow voice,

"Leave me my head!"

"Then it is," said the girl, throwing it down and catching up another.

"Leave me my head!" said the same voice.

"Nay, nay," said the heroic lass, "you can not have two heads!—I must have one, and you no longer."

As Charles II. was dining in state, he made the celebrated and witty Grammont the remark that he was served upon knees, while the Duke of York was served in other courts. "I thank your Majesty for the explanation," answered Grammont, "for I thought they were begging pardon for giving you so bad a dinner."

Jones has discovered the respective natures of a distinction and a difference. He says that "a little difference frequently makes many enemies, while "a little distinction" attracts hosts of friends to the one on whom it is conferred.

A SAILOR'S NOTION.—A sailor who had been for several years on a foreign station, when he arrived home, had invited him it was good. "It is good for hogs, ma'am," said the doctor. "Then pray," said the lady, "let me help you to some more."

OLD GIBE. "I should like Thick Braids in front, and Curls and a Loop at the Back!"

SERRY INDIVIDUAL. "I tell you what, Mrs. Indigo, I can't pay your bill; but I'll marry your daughter and end up a school."

MOTHER. "No, indeed!"

SERRY INDIVIDUAL. "Well, then, give me a receipt and I'll marry you, and set up a wholesale business!"

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Before a circle let appear
Twice twenty-five and five in rear,
One-fifth of eight join, if you can,
And then you'll form what compass man.

Love.

We are little airy creatures,
All of different voice and nature;
One of us in glass is set,
Another you shall find in jet,
Another you will see in tin,
And a fourth a box within;
If the true form you find,
It will never fly from you.

The words

Why is a waiter like a race-horse?
Because he fly-vors runs for a plate.

What proof have we that King Charles wished to be beheaded?
Because they axed (asked) him whether he would or no.

Why is a conceited woman like a singing-book?
Because she is full of airs.

Why is a dandy like a bunch of venison?
Because he is fit for a buck.

When is a bank-note like wrought-iron?
When it is forged.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

ANOTHER VICTORY IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

PRESS DISPATCHES announce the defeat and the forces of General Rosecrans on the Gauley River; but the accounts thus far received are so meagre that it is quite uncertain what has really been done. We have intelligence sufficiently accurate, however, to show that the National forces are still successful, and do not at all hope that the rebel and traitor Floyd is fairly entrapped.

It appears that, on Friday, Floyd opened fire from two points opposite Gauley Bridge, and succeeded in sinking a forty-ton, rebel steamboat, which had been sunken the same night. No one was killed on our side during the fire, though two cannon balls and eight bullets struck, and few were wounded. He had cut a road around a hill where Rosecrans' pickets were posted, and, marching by fire, soon silenced two of the batteries, and was at the rebel service and another fort before he knew it. Our loss, rear, so that it was expected that he would be entirely surrounded in a few hours.

On Saturday there was no fighting; at that time the position of the two armies on either side was as follows: The rebels held possession of the west bank of New River; General Cox occupied the east bank. The main body and location of the Gauley and New rivers; General Cox's brigade and Gen. Lowe's command are at the junction, between the rivers, and General Benham was below the junction. It was believed that Floyd's force was divided, the main body on the river above and below Floyd, who has 1000 men, and is cut off from the north bank. We look with interest for further intelligence.

OUR NEW COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

Major-General M'Clellan has issued the following order:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
WASHINGTON, November 1, 1861.

GENERAL ORDER, No. 15.—In accordance with General Order No. 94 from the War Department, I hereby assume command of the armies of the United States.

In the midst of the difficulties which encompass and divide the nation, I shall devote my best energies to the accomplishment of so vast a responsibility; but, confiding as I do in the patriotism and the courage of our troops, and believing, as I do, that Providence will never turn an ill-cause to triumph, I have the most earnest will crown our efforts and sacrifices.

The army of the Union will be the feeling of regret that the weight of many years and the effect of increasing infirmities contracted and intensified in his country's service, should cast me from my post. I have no higher soldier of our nation; the hero who, in his youth, raised high the reputation of his country in the fields of Canada, which he sanctified with his blood; who in more mature years proved by his counsels that the spirit and valor could repeat, if not eclipse, the exploits of Carter in the days of the Revolution; and who, when the hour came, rallied to the service of his country; whose efforts have been directed by genius and by wisdom, and whose courage, in life, a warrior who earned the selfish glories of the battle-field when it has been necessary as a veteran could be employed more profitably for his country; a citizen whom his lifelong years have endeared to his fellow-men; a public instance of loyalty, in disregarding all ties of birth, and clinging still to the cause of truth and honor. Such has been the career and character of Winfield Scott, whom it is no long term of service to the nation to know, both as a man and a soldier. While we regret his loss, there is one thing we can do, and that is to set a high example for his and for our emulation. Let us all hope and pray that his declining years may be crowned in peace and happiness, and that they may be cheered by the success of the country and the cause he has fought for all his life so well. Beyond all that, let us do nothing that can cause him to blush for us; but, on retiring from the post of honor and responsibility, bid for his last years, but let our victories illuminate the close of a life so grand.

GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

GEN. SCOTT'S DEPARTURE FROM WASHINGTON.

General Scott left Washington on Saturday afternoon, and reached Harrisburg at 10 o'clock, on his way to this city, where he arrived during the night. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, a large crowd gathered at Harrisburg to greet the veteran.

A SPEECH FROM GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

The following is the speech of Major-General M'Clellan on the presentation of a sword by the Committee of the City Councils of Philadelphia:

"I ask you, sir, to give my warmest and deep thanks to the honorable body you represent for this entirely unmerited compliment. I could not have asked for more than I deserved it, but I do not feel that I do. Nothing that I have yet performed entitles me to receive this compliment. It is for the future to determine whether I shall realize the expectations and hopes that have centered in me. I trust and feel that the day is not far distant when I shall be able to place the donors of all this, and to me, there to spend the balance of my life among the people from whom I sprung, and who loved me well. The war can not be long. It may be desperate. And in the future fix to-morrow, and confidence. Then those we can accomplish all; and while I know that, in the great events which may agitate our hearts, Pennsylvania will not play the least, I trust that, on the other hand, she will play the highest and noblest part.

"I again thank you, and again ask you to convey to the Councils my most sincere thanks for the sword. Say to them that it will be my ambition to deserve it hereafter. I know I do not now."

REPORTED REMOVAL OF GENERAL FREMONT.

The Washington correspondents all state positively that the order, transferring the command of the Western Military Department from General Frémont to General Hunter, has been sent to the former, and has probably reached him. The order is stated to be absolute and unconditional, and based upon a thorough conviction of Frémont's incapacity as a General, and of his profligacy in the expenditure of the public money.

THE ENEMY AT CENTREVILLE.

Intelligence was received at Washington on 1st from a fugitive that the rebels had erected strong fortifications at Centreville, and that their camps, numbering 50,000 men, extended from Manassas to within two miles of Fairfax Court House, having 10,000 at MANASSAS.

FREMONT'S ADVANCE.

The advance of the grand army of the West still continues in the direction of ARKANSAS. General Fremont's head-quarters on the 25th ult. was located at Camp Lyon, Springfield, several portions of his command having arrived there and by the previous day. There were no professed rebels in the neighborhood—at least none were found. The Stars and Stripes were now waved over the town, and the troops were enthusiastically received by the inhabitants.

On 29th the advance was at Cassville.

OUR BATTERIES ON THE POTOMAC.

Our batteries on the Potomac are going on rapidly to completion. On this point a number of guns were tried on the rebel steamer George Page, with what result it could not be ascertained. The Resolute, arriving at Washington on 4th, reported that seven of the crew had been wounded by the shot and shells from the batteries at Shipping Point.

THE BATTLES OF THE 21ST.

Monday, the 21st of October, was a disastrous day in history of the present rebellion as an eventful day. While our brave troops were being slaughtered at Ball's Bluff, in Virginia, the rebel General Zollicoffer, with 4000 armed Tennessee secessionists at his back, made three separate attacks on Camp Wildcat, in Kentucky, and each time was driven back by General Garnett, with twelve hundred Union men. On that day, also, two thousand five hundred Union troops, under command of Colonel Plummer, encountered a body of rebels estimated at five thousand, commanded by Generals Thompson and Lowe, at Fredericktown, Missouri, and completely routed them.

THE CASE OF THE PRIVATEERS.

The trial of the captain and crew of the little privateer Savannah by the grimy—extended last week, the result being that the jury, after a consultation of twenty hours, brought in a verdict upon a verdict, four of the crew of the twelve being in favor of an acquittal, the remainder considering the prisoners guilty, and some of the counts.

A TEST CASE UNDER THE CONFISCATION ACT.

The Government, in accordance with its determination to punish the leading men of prize of the rebellion belonging to secessionists, has instituted an action in the case of Thomas Pratt, Commissioner of Washington, who, some months ago, removed with his family to Richmond, where he has been holding an office, and, consequently, with the great rebellion against the authority of the Government. The property of Mr. Pratt in Columbia has been declared to attach the real and personal property of the said Shields, and has been libelled in the District Court. In not proving any thing about it, to appear and show cause why the same shall not be confiscated. It is understood that this is to be a test case.

THE ELECTION IN MARYLAND.

General Dix, in addressing the disloyal district of Baltimore, has issued a proclamation, calling upon the municipal authorities, and the police commissioners, the police who have been participants, directly or indirectly, in the disloyal proceedings of Tuesday, and all others, to be concertains, intend to use their influence at the coming election for the purpose of furthering the interests of the rebels.

SEIZURE OF MASON AND SLIDELL.

Messrs. Mason and Slidell, the Ministers of the rebel Government to England, were taken from the mail-steamer upon exception in Cuba. It is said that the British Consul at Havana waited on them in full costume, and presented them to the Captain of the steamer. The Theodora, which took them to Cardenas, is reported to have sailed again for Charleston with a cargo of coffee, sugar, and provisions, together with about twenty passengers. Messrs. Mason and Slidell were bound to take passage for Europe in the British mail steamer of the 6th of November.

RESIGNATION OF THE TRAITOR BECKINRIDGE.

John C. Breckinridge has published a Manifesto to the People of Kentucky. It is dated at Bowling Green, and begins by saying that he has first examined the explanation from home that he could place his feet on the soil of Kentucky. He resigns his seat as senator of the Senate of the United States, saying, "I exchange, with proud satisfaction, a seat for six years in the United States Senate for the musket of a soldier." The address is very long, and is made up of personal explanations and excuses. He says "there is no longer a Senate of the United States under the Constitution and spirit of the Constitution;" the United States no longer exists—the Union is dissolved."

REBEL GENERALS.

General A. S. Johnston has been placed in command of all the rebel forces in Missouri, and has issued a proclamation declaring the property of rebels to be confiscated.

General Van Dorn has been made the recipient of a sword, a medal, magnificent horses, and a service of silver, of the admiration and gratitude of the people of Texas.

When General Lovell arrived in New Orleans, he issued an order that no rebel soldier should, "under any circumstances, keep your powder dry, and spend it on the enemy."

General Lovell has been succeeded by Major-General in the rebel army.

THE UNION PRISONERS IN BOSTON.

Eight hundred rebel prisoners from Fort Lafayette arrived in Boston on 1st inst., and were received at Fort Warren by Colonel Dimmick, who commands at that station.

THE TENNESSEE COTTON GROWERS IN TROUBLE.

A petition to the Legislature is being circulated in Panola County, Tennessee, praying that body to pass a law for the purchase of the cotton crop of the State, and that payment in whole or in part be made by treasury notes; that the cotton be pledged for the redemption of the notes. The petitioners further ask that, if this can not be done by the State at large, that it be done for the county of Panola.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

INTERVENTION IN MEXICO.

It is understood that France and Spain have agreed on a programme of common action against the republic of Mexico. According to this plan, an allied land force, numbering six thousand men, is to penetrate into the interior of the country, its commanders having orders to endeavor to penetrate to the capital. Should their single satisfaction is not given for all the past alleged injuries committed by the inhabitants of Mexico against the subjects of the Emperor and Queen. It appears as if the English Government would not participate in or support this movement by a strong naval demonstration in the Gulf. All the money claims of the executive or people of the three governments must be paid by Mexico.

GERMANY.

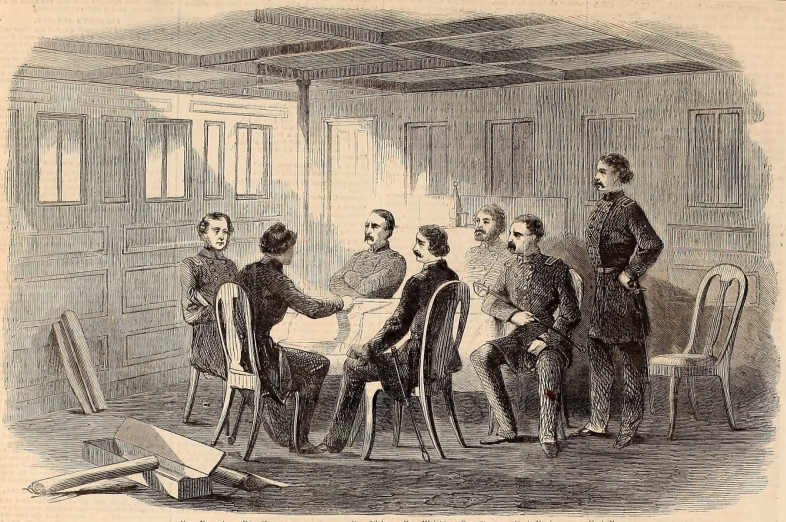
CORONATION OF THE KING OF PRUSSIA.

The King of Prussia was crowned with great pomp and splendor at Königsberg, on the 18th ult. At the conclusion of the ceremony his Majesty delivered a very impressive and animated address to the Kings Executive with the Emperor at Compiegne exercises the British papers very seriously.

POLAND.

PROGRESS OF DISTURBANCE.

Affairs in Poland grow more and more threatening. On the occasion of the late Kosciusko demonstration in Warsaw the military made a descent upon the churches where the people were assembled, and arrested all who refused to leave them. Many were subsequently released, but it was asserted that at least two thousand men had been retained in custody, and were to be divided into different regiments for the military service. The clergy had closed the churches, on account of their profanation by the military.



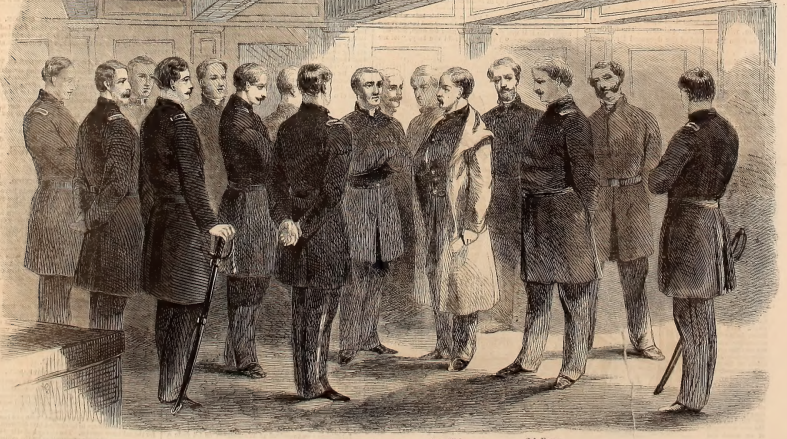
Com. Dupont. Gen. Sherman. Gen. Viele. Gen. Wright. Gen. Stevens. Capt. Davis. Capt. Rogers.

THE GREAT EXPEDITION—GENERAL SHERMAN GIVING HIS FINAL ORDERS TO HIS BRIGADIER-GENERALS ON BOARD THE "WABASH."—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

THE GREAT NAVAL EXPEDITION.

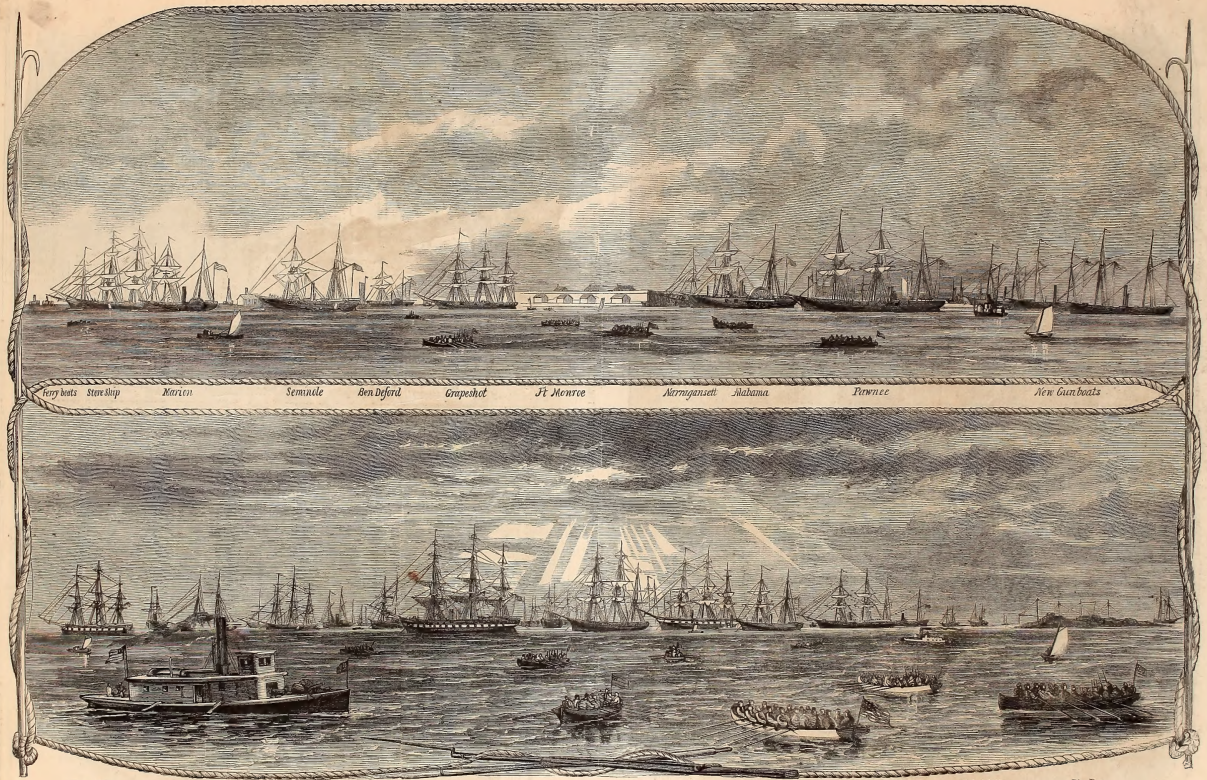
WE continue our series of illustrations of the Great Naval Expedition. Above we give a picture of the final conference between General Sherman, who commands the Expedition, and his principal officers on board the Wabash; and below we present an engraving of a similar conference between General Viele, commanding a brigade, and the Colonels and staff officers under his command. The large picture opposite will convey to the reader some idea of the vessels composing the Expedition as they lay at anchor at Hampton Roads, between Fortress Monroe and the Rip Raps, previous to their departure. The captain of the Thomas Swan, who arrived here on 30th, states that on Monday afternoon at five o'clock the sailing vessels were getting under way, and when the Thomas Swan left the steamers were also preparing to take their departure. At midnight of the 28th, off Hog Island, he passed four steamers bound south. We also, by telegraphic dispatches, learn that the great fleet sailed on Tuesday morning, the Wabash taking the lead at daylight, when the gun was fired as a signal, and the Cahawba bringing up the rear. The vessels, about fifty in number, formed in line a few miles down the Roads, and went out between the Capes in splendid style. The Baltic had the Ocean Express in tow, the Vanderbilt the Great Republic, and the Illinois the Golden Eagle. The morning was the most beautiful of the season, and the scene the finest ever witnessed on this continent.

Previous to the departure General Sherman removed his quarters from the Atlantic to the frigate Wabash. He took with him Assistant Adjutant-General Captain Pelouze, and a number of others. —At the hour this page goes to press we have no news from the Expedition later than Saturday evening, at which time the fleet was seen pleasantly sailing toward Bull Bay, 25 miles north of Charleston, S. C., by Lieut. Braine, of the Monticello, who arrived at Old Point with the news on the afternoon of 4th. One vessel only, the Belvidere, had been injured by the gale, and had returned to Old Point. Lieut. Braine feels certain the Expedition landed on Sunday morning. The coast there is not strongly fortified.

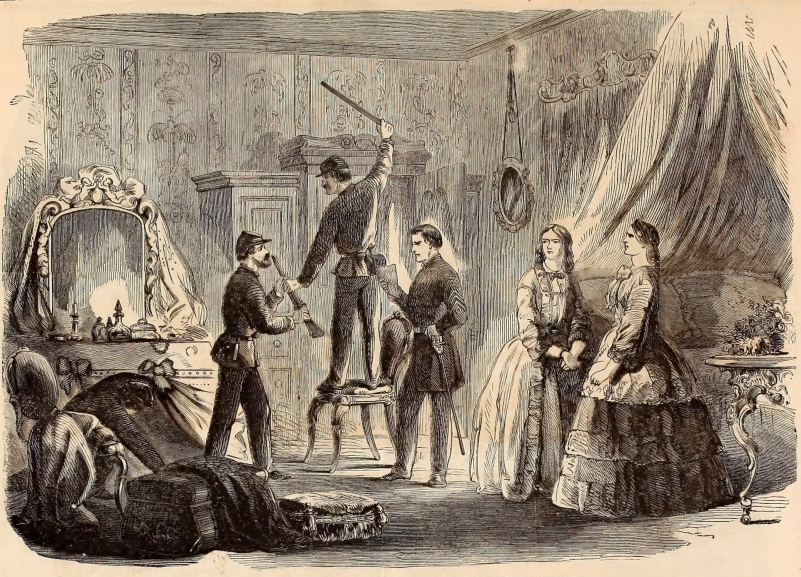


Gen. Viele. Col. Ferry.

CONSULTATION BETWEEN GENERAL VIELE AND THE OFFICERS OF HIS BRIGADE BEFORE THE DEPARTURE.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

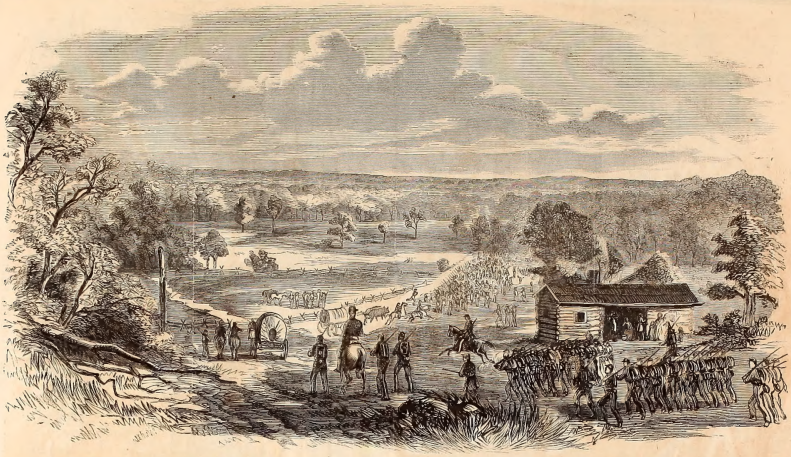


THE GREAT EXPEDITION—THE VESSELS AT ANCHOR AT HAMPTON ROADS PREVIOUS TO THE DEPARTURE.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]



SEARCHING FOR ARMS IN A REBEL'S HOUSE IN SOUTHERN MARYLAND.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—A SCOUTING PARTY.



GENERAL FREMONT'S ARMY ON THE MARCH THROUGH SOUTHWESTERN MISSOURI.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 722.]

BUILDING GENERAL FREMONT'S BRIDGE ACROSS THE OSAGE.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 722.]

BRILLIANT CHARGE OF GENERAL FREMONT'S BODY-GUARD THROUGH THE TOWN OF SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI, ON OCTOBER 24, 1861.—[See Page 722.]

GENERAL SIEGEL CROSSING THE OSAGE.—SKETCHED BY ALEXANDER SIMPSON.—[SEE PAGE 732.]

SAVING A PATIENT.

I HAD saved between three and four thousand dollars. A practice was for sale. It was offered to me, and I snapped at the offer. Dr. Titus Whilking, of Morgan Town, wanted to dispose of his connection, and move on to New Orleans. I agreed to purchase the connection, and, after some haggling, the bargain was struck. Dr. Titus Whilking solemnly introduced to all the notables of Morgan Town, as his successor, your humble servant, Ambrose Mylner, M.D. I took the Doctor's furniture at a valuation. I rented the Doctor's house. My brass plate supplanted his upon the mahogany door. I hired a negro boy and an old black woman as cook, and my establishment was complete. Morgan Town had practice for only one physician. There was, to be sure, a practice in good repute, but we did not clash at all, and were good friends. The planters were kind and hospitable, and the townspeople friendly enough. One sunken rock, lying in the way of my popularity, I had been forewarned against. This was the fatal subject of negro slavery. Western Virginia was never, in heart and soul, an integral portion of the slave States. Many of the farmers and mechanics have been immigrants from Pennsylvania and other Northern States; the blacks are few in number, and properties are small when compared with the long-settled estates of the Old Dominion. I, who so happened that Morgan Town, on the very frontier of the free commonwealth, was a red-hot focus of pro-slavery politics. I have been in Carolina, Georgia, and the Gulf States, but I can safely say that I never met with fiercer zealots on behalf of the "domestic institution" than in the thriving little neighborhood of Morgan Town. This gave me great trouble at first. A stranger in the land, I had scrupulously kept aloof from political and social discussions; and while I had several friends and many well-wishers, I do not believe I had an enemy in the place.

Thus two years passed, during which I throve sufficiently to be enabled to set up my carriage. This was a light, well-hung vehicle, drawn by a pair of mettlesome Virginian horses, and driven by a negro coachman. I did not become its owner through any spirit of ostentation, but because I was enabled to attend patients at a much greater distance than when my visits were paid by the help of a mountain pony, my first purchase after I had given up my livery practice. Hoy pleased was I, more for Jane's sake than for my own, when I first became the proprietor of a genuine equipage! It was an unusually autumn, too. A fever was uncommonly rife: my services were in constant request; and I wrote frequently to my patient, Doctor, responded to Calcutta Lodge, Highgate, Surrey, in a strain of hope and confidence. I was making money rapidly. In a couple of years more, if matters went on well, I could return with dollars enough to buy a respectable London practice—a practice that would do to marry upon.

On a chilly afternoon of that short autumnal period which Americans call the "Indian summer," my negro lad came into the garden to summon me. He told me that Mr. Asphet Clay, a wealthy Quaker farmer, residing about five miles off, wished to see me.

"Very well, Sam," said I, "tell Mr. Clay I am coming."

I had no choice but to re-enter the house, where I found the tall old Quaker, formally clad in drab cloth, as usual, but with a look of anxiety perturbing his usually calm face.

"What can I do for you, Mr. Clay?" said I, shaking hands with him.

"There is one sojourning beneath our roof," he said, "who is not only ill at ease, but in some danger."

"Fever?" I exclaimed.

The Quaker evaded the question. His eyebrows twitched nervously, and he replied: "If thou canst conveniently pay an early visit to our lone dwelling, called by man the Holt, I will inquire for the Honorable Abram Green (so called), my wife and daughters will bring thee to the sufferer's presence; and, truly, I trust thy skill may be profited to his deliverance from calamity."

So saying, the Quaker prepared to depart.

"I would come up at once," said I, my sense perplexity, "but my horses are tired with a long morning's work. These fever cases don't allow of delay. I will borrow Major Blight's gig, and ask one of the neighbors for the loan of a gig, or—stay—if you will give me a seat in your carryall, Mr. Clay, that will be best of all."

The old gentleman hesitated. "Gladly would I drive thee back with me to my abode, where I hope thou wilt spend the night, but—but I have business at the four-mill, and I must go to some stores, and the bank—and, in fact, friend Mylner, would it suit thee to walk on as far as David Leap on the road, that I may there overtake thee?"

I acceded, though I was a little puzzled as to the reason why.

Taking a few needful drugs and instruments, which I placed in the leathern hunting-pouch I wore in my country rambles, I set off on amateur to the place where Mr. Clay has to pick me up.

"I fear, friend Mylner, I have tarried long; thy patience will be exhausted," said honest Mr. Clay, as he pulled up.

He was now in a much more equable frame of mind than an hour before, and we shortly pleasantly enough as we wound our way through the woodlands. The Quaker gave me to understand that the sick visitor was a new acquaintance.

"It may be a good thing, carnally speaking, for thee, friend Mylner, to have attended such a patient," said he; "these legislators and men of note at Washington can often give valuable recommendations. Wouldst thou like to be physician to a legation in Europe, friend? Wouldst thou prefer a good practice in New York or Boston?"

"Of course I would."

We were now in sight of the Holt, a neat, well-built timber house, with very extensive yards and farm-buildings. Several blacks, whose carelessness in laughter and display of white teeth contrasted oddly with the precise bearing and solemn gravity of their employer—employer, not owner—came bustling out to meet us, as well as a troop of yelping dogs. Giving up the mules to the care of these serving-men, we entered, and were met almost on the threshold by Mrs. Clay, who seemed extremely glad to see us.

How was the patient?

"Much the same. Much the same. Not overly strong. The hot fit was not upon him. Would the Doctor go up at once?"

I was ushered into a bedroom; small, but a model of neatness and comfort. The sun was shining, and but little, through the screen of the handsomely-closed blinds, so that I could hardly distinguish the features of the sufferer. An intelligent, handsome face, it seemed to be, though blanched by sickness; but I saw with surprise that while the eyes were bright and clear the hair was quite gray, and imparted a venerable aspect which would otherwise have been wanting. The patient was propped up with pillows; he was evidently quite sensible, and much better than I had expected to find him.

"This, friend Green, is friend Mylner, the physician from the old country, of whom my husband told thee," said the kind Quaker matron, smoothing the pillows with a dexterous hand.

"Ah! Dr. Mylner, I am glad to find of you to come so promptly, valuable as your time is," said the Honorable Abram Green, speaking rather hoarsely and with a nasal twang; "I am better already, thanks to kind nursing."

So he seemed to be. His pulse was quick, but not by any means high in the scale of accurate. His skin had lost the burning harshness of fever. It was evident that a crisis had taken place, and that, even without medical aid, the patient had taken a favorable turn. Having asked and received replies to a few questions, I wrote my prescription, and recommended caution, lest a relapse should supervene.

I noticed at supper that my host and hostess were somewhat disturbed in mind. Besides their two daughters, Ruth and Rachel, were in excellent spirits. Never had I seen those demure Quaker maidens so lively and talkative. Rachel was a look of sly and suppressed mirth in their blue eyes which contrasted strangely with their formal dress of dove-colored silk, and the severe arrangement of their shining braids of hair. I could only conclude that they were amused by the presence of a visitor from the great world, under their parents' roof—a most unvented event in the calm of their monotonous existence. I would not accept a bed, however, though it was late, although the watery power of the Holt pressed me to stay all night. I declined, borrowed a pony—there are always plenty of ponies about a Virginian farmstead—rode home through the balmy air of night, and beneath the lustre of a broad yellow moon.

Next morning, as I sallied out to pay my usual round of calls among my patients, I encountered Major Blight, with an open newspaper in his hand. The little Major looked yellower than ever, in his unknown quantity of bile. His hatchet-like eyes were redder and fiercer, and he was muttering to himself as he read.

The Major, always a most choleric of men, was working himself up into a towering passion. I tried to pass him with a bow, but he intercepted me.

"Good-morning to you, Doctor! Seen the Gazette, eh? No! Then, Sir, you are yet in felicitous ignorance of the foulest conspiracy that ever was on outrage, and scandal, and disgrace, Sir, that ever was inflicted on a community of white gentlemen!"

The Major—he was only a militia officer, but he was dreadfully warlike—had now run himself out of breath, and was compelled to stop. Then he recovered speech he went on at great length, and his statement, disencumbered of verbiage, was as follows: A certain Abolitionist, named Randolph, residing in one of the southern counties of Eastern Virginia, had a valuable slave. This slave was a young man, a very handsome mulatto—more properly, a quadroon, since there was but a trace of African blood in his veins. His name was Cato Hammond. This Cato had been allowed by the late proprietor of the estate, Mr. Randolph's uncle; had received some education, in spite of law and precaution; had been employed in various mechanical bias. In fact, during the life of his old master he had been employed as a kind of substitem engineer, in connection with the Holt estate, etc., and had given much satisfaction. This slave had married a girl of nearly the same shade of color as himself, and had by her two children, who were consequate the young couple, at any rate, in his will. But he had died and left no will—at least, no will formally executed; and the live chattels had passed with the estate to the nephew, a person of very different character. Major Blight may tell the rest of the story:

"So, Sir," said the Major, "my friend, Paul Randolph, was not the man to encourage the abscense and cowardice of his slave Cato. The octoroon land was mostly worn out, and a spec of mining didn't answer; and Paul, my friend, Sir—known him from a boy—was not the sharpest fellow he is—was pressed for money. So, knowing there was a good demand for light mulattoes in New Orleans, he sold Cato, and his wife Desdemona, for four thousand dollars, to a dealer from the Gulf States. This fellow, Cato, he goes on his knees and begs that he may not be sold away from Dolor of honor, too, so there's no help for it.' Gentlemanly conduct on Paul's part, I call that—exhilarating and all to his own nigger, eh?"

"What happened then, Major?" asked I, getting interested.

"Why," said the little officer, "those nigger scoundrels are the most artful, treacherous whipsnakes in creation, and the most ungrateful to boot. Seems this scamp of a Cato had hoarded up a lot of money he'd earned by building and surveying. Old Randolph's time, meaning to set up in business with it when he should be set free. High three thousand dollars! A pretty penny for a colored vagabond to earn! He gave most of this to the dealer, on condition he'd sell Betsy to respectable folks to Richmond City, stead of taking her to New Orleans. And what does the gal do but hide off to Canada—helped off along underground railway by some of those pesky abolitionists, I guess."

Here the Major paused to expectorate, and then a few oaths as a safety-valve to his fiery temper.

"And the husband?" asked I.

"Oh, Paul's agent, he making tracks to join his wife in British territory, and he'd no mind to be robbed that way. Yet he didn't like to sell the gal, handsome as she was, and a credit to the estate. So he jest cowhided him a bit, by way of warning, and put him in irons every evening at sundown, in the overseer's cottage, to make all safe. With all this, my gentleman gives his master the slip; files his irons with a watch-spring saw; goes off to his dandy cottage; takes coach at Richmond City, and passes for a white man—confound his impudence!"

The Major went on to say that it had been ascertained that the fugitive had not yet escaped over the border of the nearest Free Commonwealth, and that he was supposed to be lurking in Western Virginia. A large reward had been offered for his seizure, dead or alive, so incensed was Mr. Randolph at his conduct. And so important did it seem to make an example that should strike terror to the hearts of all "clever niggers," as the more atrocity and ingratitude of the offence, that one was called. It was conjectured that the runaway had white friends, who were concealing him, and who would endeavor to get him passing the lines under any line, on his way to rejoin his wife in Canada.

"I only wish," said the Major, grimly, as he finished his story, "that we could lay a hand on these philanthropists! We'd make 'em a caution to all the rest of the breed. Tain't tar and feathers will serve for 'em, I guess. They're for my figure for a rail-riding. A load of brush-wood and a lucifer-match will be about their mark, I calculate. I must leave you, Sir, for the meeting of citizens is convened to organize for catching this black thief."

And the Major went away to attend the meeting.

As I went on my way home to breakfast my sickness yet lingered, I could not but think over the strange story I had heard. Prudence bade me suppress my sympathy with the runaway. Philanthi soil could help siding in his heart with the oppressed fugitive whose only crime was his color. And yet the sympathy which I could not control for the ruling race been warped by the long habit of trampling on the rights of their dusky fellow-men! Here was Major Blight, callous and pugnacious, certainly a kind neighbor and an honorable man in social intercourse—who was yet unable to comprehend that "niggers" could have any more feeling or privileges than cattle in the field! However, I got through my town visits, and looking at my watch, I saw that it was time to drive out to my wealthy patient at the Holt, the Honorable Abram Green. I drove out accordingly, and again I was ushered into the darkened chamber. Again I applied eyes, though bright, were weak, and any thing like strong sunshine distressed them. Mr. Green was better—better, but very weak. I had a most pleasant conversation with my patient, whose voice was much more clear than on the previous evening, and who seemed disposed to talk, but which I would permit.

A very well-informed intellectual person is Mr. Green," said I, as I took leave of the Clays, after tasting my host's tea and cakes which they hospitably pressed upon me; "a very superior man, and it does good to a recluse like myself to chat with one who knows the world—the world of statesmen and diplomatists so thoroughly."

Mrs. Clay assented smilingly, but her youngest daughter Ruth seemed inclined to bet angrily, as to another a very unaccustomed and unquakerlike air of audible giggling.

"Ruth, Ruth," said her mother, reprovingly.

But girls may have exuberant spirits, and may laugh at trifles light as air, even in the Society of Friends, I suppose. I thought little of the circumstance. I called two or three times, on consecutive days, at the Holt. Mr. Green's convalescence made me aware that he did gain strength by degrees, and I was always delighted by his conversation. Now and then he threw out a hint that I was in a place of the Western Town; that I should be appreciated at my just value elsewhere; and once said something about a fair field and no favor, which I could comprehend with his medical adviser.

Evidently my distinguished patient had taken a fancy to me, and would give me the benefit of his recommendation among his powerful friends. He was mending visibly, and began to fret against the restraint of the sick-room, and to long for fresh air and motion. The Clays, all of them, husband, wife, and children, seconded this wish—not from any inhospitable desire to rid of their guest, but from pure kindness. (There may, perhaps, have been another motive which I did not then guess.) "I am sorry, Cato, but I owe the money.

my head on my pillow to dream of England and Jane.

Next day, at the appointed hour, my carriage came round to the door, and I took my seat in it. Pompey, the free black coachman, wore his Sabbath coat and glossy hat: for was I not going to take out the Hon. Abiram Green for his first drive? The horses were in high condition; they tossed their heads gayly, and displayed plenty of action as we drove swiftly off. We were soon clear of Morgan Town along the Buck's Leap. A heavy fog, or mist, keeping as much among the trees as possible, darted by us here, and vanished in the forest. Surely by the half-dead again!

He had his hat slouched over his eyes, and never turned his face, but I recognized him as he shot by. In and to say we were at the Holt. Mr. Clay came from the farm-yard to greet me; his wife and daughters bustled to the door. The Hon. Abiram Green was pretty ready. Down he came, muffled up to a needless extent, and leaning heavily on the arms of two negro servants. I could hardly catch a glimpse of his face, so enveloped was he in shawls and cloaks.

"We will amend this to-morrow," said I to myself, with a smile.

To-morrow! A few civil speeches, a good deal of anxiety on Miss Clay's part that the invalid was properly propped up with pillows and cushions, and we drove off at a gentle pace. The whole Quaker household waved their hands and handkerchiefs as we rode out of sight.

"Drive slowly and carefully, Pompey!"

The convalescent at my side gave an involuntary groan. I looked through the forest. It had opened to bear the cracking of a stick, and to look quickly to one side. From among the bushes was protruded a long barrel: I recognized the long black rifle-locks, the sinister-looking eyes, the coppery complexion. The Indian man-hunter again!

Quick as thought, the gun rose. A report followed. After I heard the tramp of a horse receding from the spot. Poor Mr. Green at my side winced as if in pain.

"My dear Sir," said I, "I fear the motion is inconvenient to you. Pompey, drive—"

I was going to say more, but I went more slowly; but Mr. Green pulled me back into my seat with a vivacity that surprised me.

"I beg your pardon," said the sick man, "I enjoy the pace above all things."

We were now out of the lanes, and bowling along the turnpike road for the Monongahela Ford. Two miles off was the river which formed the boundary between Virginia and the Free State of Pennsylvania. I had a hundred dollars in my pay very near to the ford. We rolled pleasantly along. But I did not derive the entertainment I had expected from Mr. Green's companionship. He was silent and restless. Twice he thrust his head out of the window, in spite of my warnings not to incur the risk of catching cold. He answered me impatiently, almost snappishly.

"Doctor," said he, "how far are we from the river now?"

"Three miles and a half," I said.

"Those white houses on the hill, then, are in Pennsylvania?"

I answered in the affirmative.

Five minutes after he seemed to listen attentively, and suddenly said,

"Do you tell the coachman to go faster! Please do!"

Very reluctantly I complied. Pompey quickened the pace of the powerful horses.

"Ah!" said this odd invalid, with a sigh of satisfaction. Soon after he exclaimed that he "heard horses galloping;" and he would thrust his head out of the window, and looked back along the road. He uttered a loud exclamation. I, too, looked out. At two, three hundred yards were advancing at furious speed, and evidently following us. They were mounted. One of them led two hounds in a leash—blood-hounds.

The man-hunters!

Instantly the Hon. Abiram Green dropped back into his seat, and the wrappings and shawls fell as if by magic to the bottom of the carriage. A young, active, and intelligent man of Spanish complexion, and wearing black velvet, was full of help and advice, and was by my side in the place of the Hon. Abiram Green.

"Dr. Kit!" he cried, "I can carry on the deception no longer. I am Cato Hammond. Those men are on my trail."

I sat stricken and helpless. The metamorphosis took away my breath. A loud shout came on the wind; Pompey cheered the horses, and turned round his head to say, "All right." I sprang the fugitive, dashed down the glass of the front window, and confronted the coachman. There was a revolver in his hand. He had drawn it from his breast.

"Push on, my friend," he cried, in a commanding tone, "I am flying for my life from those fiends behind. Drive for life and death to the ford! Dash on to Pennsylvanian ground. You are a negro. You should be a negro slave. On!"

This command, enforced by the sight of the pistol, produced its effect. Pompey flogged the horses; the spirited team plunged forward, whirling the carriage like a feather up and down the slopes at a mad gallop. Cato took a long look from the window at the pursuing party, and said, in a low deep voice, "You know my story. I am sorry to involve you in trouble, but my disguise is useless now. I must go on. Once at Union Town, in a free State, I shall be safe, and can rejoin my wife on British ground. You are an Englishman, and can feel for a slave escaping from unjust bondage. I will not be taken alive!"

I fully believed him. His firm lips, his frowning brow, and sparkling eye, confirmed his words. Pompey obeyed his orders, lashing, whipping, and jerking the reins, until the horses were stretching out at their utmost speed. It was a terrible race. I could see, when I looked back, the negro-hunters pursuing and flogging their steeds. Their cells and imprecations were horribly distinct. Once they were clearly gaining upon us. The river was in sight. Across it lay free soil and comparative safety. Safety for Cato Hammond; but what for me? How could I ever face Morgan Town again? I, caught in flagrant delict of smuggling away an escaped slave! Oh cruel Quaker family —perfidious Clays—who had made me their instrument and scapegoat! Oh, my lost wife and child! Bang! A rifle was fired; the ball perforated Pompey's hat, but did no harm. And now the foaming horses rushed down with a rush into the ford, struggled through, dashing the water to left and right, panted up the slope, and galloped toward Union.

"Doctor, I owe you more than life. I am a free man!" said the runaway.

I looked back. Those negro hunters, ill-mounted for such a chase, were giving up the pursuit. I saw their furious gestures, and heard their shouts of rage as they reined up at the river's edge. In an hour we were in Union, where Cato left me with many excuses and thanks. I answered not a word, but I was the most miserable of men. I dared not go back to Morgan Town, where, indeed, I was burned in effigy in the same fire that consumed all my effects. What happened to the Clays I never heard. Cato Hammond rejoined his wife in safety, and is now a thriving engineer at Montreal, in Canada. My wife and children were supported by a subscription or "testimonial" from the abolitionists of Philadelphia and Boston; so that I was actually enabled to purchase a house in a good practice, and become a Benedict, a whole twelvemonth earlier than I had pictured in my wildest dreams.

THE TUBEROSE.

A STORY OF THE WAR.

IT was an evening in May. A soft, spring shower had fallen, and the leaves of the trees in Washington Parade-ground were yet wet with rain-drops which glittered in the moon-beams. There were few people in the Park. Two figures only seemed to be passing leisurely and quietly, in spite of the tragedy, through the scene, a man and a young woman. Their conversation was in a subdued tone, and yet an occasional gesture of impatient quickness showed some excitement.

"Jessie, I told you weeks ago that you should decide this for me; alone and friendless as you are in this great city, my home must be to you. I shall not go if you wish me to remain."

A sigh fluttered out before his companion answered. "I cannot, Edward. My sick mother's daughter can have no alternative in such a position. Though my heart fails me, I have been too well schooled to shrink. You say, Edward, you must go!" but her hand clasped his arm closer, and her lips were pressed together to stop their quivering.

He bent down and kissed her without a word, and they walked on silently, with thoughts which neither could utter.

Jessie had not come to this decision for the first time. Since the call for troops to defend our national honor and government upon the necessity for her lover's going. Her father had been an army officer—a Southerner by birth, but with the highest sense of duty to his country. His health had been very feeble for years, and at the first angry feeling between the two sections of the country was manifested he had prophesied the end, but his heart was deeply saddened by Edward's decision much so, that when his relatives at the South refused to show him any affection if he remained loyal to the North, he died on Sunday. Day by day watching by the bedside of one who, in spite of all the temptation that affection and interest could offer—for the old man was wholly poor, and dependent on her own exertions at his death—still remained faithful to the Federal Government. In constant hearing of the bugle-calling, his daughter had become thoroughly imbued with her father's spirit. Early motherless, her life had been principally passed, but the first year of her young life of Fort Sumter, and she had vowed to offer no hindrance should Edward decide to volunteer; and tearfully had she performed the impossibility of his death stared her in the face, and many a night of anguish had paled her thoughtful brow and saddened her clear, gray eyes which looked so lovingly at her dearest friend.

They reached the house where Jessie and her mother had boarded since the latter stay in the city. Edward again kissed her, and, with blessings for her noble conduct, was bidding her good-night, when, pausing a moment, he said,

"But, Jessie, will it not be better that we should be married before I go?"

"No, dear, no: when the war is over, not before. You must go free, with no responsibility."

"But I have it whether or no. You are mine, just as much now as if we were married, only then I can have the right to call you so."

"It will be better to wait," said Jessie, with manful reluctance, and again she said "Good-night!"

Edward had no knowledge of her slender resources or he would have taken "Yes" for an answer. Her father's salary had been enough, with the trifling sum she had gained from a few scholars, to provide for their inexpensive wants. The salary had stopped with his death, and Jessie had only the income above-mentioned, for when does an army officer die other than penniless?

The day came when Edward said his last good-bye. This day he added, as a parting gift, to her flower-stand, all blossoming with precious souvenirs, a tuberose, rich in stalk if not in blossoms. "And, Jessie, when this blooms, we must have our wedding; for you know how like stars its flowers will look in your brown hair:" and he stroked the beautiful head, which was drooping like a blossom on his shoulder. She choked the rising sob, the tears only crept slowly down the pallid cheek as with a wreet, and smile she graced up at him.

"Jessie, darling! I am wrong: we are both wrong. I ought not to have volunteered."

"Wrong, and have no country. I honor you; I love you better for going." "Do not let my weakness make you waver," she said, after a pause. A long embrace, and he was gone—perhaps forever.

The heavy tramp of men, the beat of drums, the cheers of the crowd, all came to dull ears; the stupor of grief fell on her, she had conquered until now. Her landlady, with officious kindness, brought food which came and went untouched; even her flowers were neglected, and this at last roused her—they were the link between her and Edward. Weeks came and went. Edward's letters were full of courage and devotion. She was not so desolate as at first, and the city was not in a state of such painful excitement; but another source of anxiety arose. How was she to live? Her pupils had all gone out of town; her board must be paid. It would have been very natural had she told Edward of her trouble, but her pride would not allow her.

As is customary in the education of girls, that which is most useful is most ornamentally and practically had been omitted in her course of instruction. Such a feat as the making of a dress was to her quite an impossibility. Nevertheless she must undertook it, and after patient cutting and fitting, and refitting of the cheapest material, she succeeded in making a garment, however proud she might be of her own achievement, no one else would have been willing to wear garments of her making. She could not afford a seamstress, and out of the question—at least until she could have served as apprentice, and her wants were much too pressing for that. Day by day, something valuable have been quite possible had she friends; her voice was sweet and clear, and her appreciation of Shakspeare thorough, and it was a real treat with great attention to her reading; but ah! a father's ear is far quicker and kinder than the public's. Besides, she shrank from publicity.

Not a line from her relatives ever came to her. Her grandfather's southern house, its hospitality and lavish luxuries, the old negroes who had played with in childhood, her old nurse, black as with Africa's best blood, and the tropical beauty of the landscape, were all vivid in remembrance as if seen yesterday. It was a keenness of emotion which can only be shared by one forgotten and neglected she bowed her head and wept. She had been sitting sewing by the window. Her dress in rising—the dress she had made, of plain black stuff, with a fold of crape around her fair throat, serving as a collar—had overturned in the flowers-stand, and nearly upset a rose-bush full of flowers. A thought, a brilliant thought flashed its light upon her through her tears and bouquets. Yes, she could make them and sell them—but where? Would it be safe to do so in the street? Could she bear the gaze of strangers? Could she offer her flowers without timidity and shrinking?

Her washer-woman came in at that moment, and her little daughter Jessie ran to carry the basket. Perhaps she might hire her to assist her.

"Mrs. O'Connor, how would you like your daughter to carry a basket of sewing flowers about in the street?" She thought herself very diplomatic in thus putting the question.

"Selling flowers, miss! Where do ye mane?"

"Yes, that is what I mean."

"Indade an' ye'll never see the likes of her doing that," with a contemptuous toss.

"Why not? it is very respectable."

"Not while I can keep her out of it."

"Ah well, good-by, Mrs. O'Connor."

"But, Miss Jessie, sure there's no need of her doing it while I can wash; don't ye think she's dressed well? I send her to school nearly every day."

The woman's pride seemed touched, and Jessie concluded that she would not interfere with it; she soothed her as well as she could, and assured her that she was in every respect neat and nicely-looking.

Shaking, she said she had made no confidante of the woman, and now she determined to undertake the business herself. Procuring twine and silver paper, she cut her beautiful roses and made tiny nosegays of them with slips of geranium and heliotrope: how well she looked at her landlady, who was too busy to wonder at the request, she started down town. The day was a beautiful one in the latter part of June—the air was warm, but Jessie trembled with chilly excitement; she repeated to herself "our doubts are traitors, and make us lose the good we oft might win by fearing to attempt." She nerved herself to this unusual, and, she feared, too bold resolve, and she was glad when she reached a part of the city where more crowd would not mind; but she saw no place where she dared stop—no place that she could hide in and yet offer her little store. Oh, what wild, fearful fancies: what a vague desire to fly away to a wilderness, to hide like a hunted deer! She imagined every one looked curiously at her. She drew near the Jefferson House, unattentive throng, and had almost determined to go home again, when, with a determination that sprang from her despair, she put near the steps of a hotel and uncovered her basket. She leaned against the cold stone blocks with a faint sinking at her heart, but with a fixedness of purpose that a soldier might have envied. She hardly knew how long she had been there with a cluster of nosegays in her hand, when a child bounded to her side.

"Mamma, mamma, do give me a bouquet; please buy me some flowers!"

The lady stopped and looked with an admiring glance at her basket: "How much are they?"

"As much as you think they are worth," she answered, hastily.

The lady glanced with smiling surprise at the unusual answer. As she placed a small sum in Jessie's hand she noticed her paleness.

"You are not well?" she asked.

"Thank you, I am better now."

They passed on, and Jessie felt stronger for the casual word of inquiry and look of sympathy.

She felt stronger, and when the next customer stopped she had the price ready to name. She did not look up to see who purchased, but she sold her flowers, and with a quick beating heart retraced her steps homeward. She had made a dollar; or rather, had received for all this agitation and humiliation one hundred cents!

She had not always such success, and yet not a day passed that her flowers did not bring her a trifling sum, more than she could have made by sewing. And she was happier; her face was not so pale, there was a tinge of brown and red on her cheeks, and her eyes sparkled more frequently than tears. Had the insinuation that she was shy the less a lady from her occupation been made to her she would have resented it proudly, and she was very thankful no one knew of her fresh, as the world might term it. She had been obliged to renew nothing for her own pet plants and purchase them of a florist. It was a lady-like task at least, so she said to herself, to arrange the flowers, dewy and fragrant. Taste and love of their beauty helped her in their arrangement, and her nosegays were very tempting. Edward's letters were frequent, and she always asked if she wanted any thing —if he could serve her.

One August day no one stopped to buy flowers; the knots of talkers, the eager and excited faces, spoke of some great occurrence. A great gilt dining spread with lightning speed from city to city. A great battle had been fought and lost. Who were the dead? who the maimed and crippled for life? were the questions that with sickening dread were asked by many. Women, wailing and weeping, besieged the news and telegraph offices—but a name had feared to know all, not a heart that did not beat with anxiety. And how did Jessie bear it—she, the lonely orphan, friendless, homeless? As when lightning strikes a tree through the centre, leaving it standing though deprived of life, so she stood through this tempest of woe. The first news struck with one scathing blow, and not a moan escaped her. She locked herself in her room with a newspaper, whose list of dead and wounded was said to be reliable, but she could not look at it. When she tried she became dizzy, the letters danced over the page, and she threw it down. At last she calmed herself, and with throbbing temples managed to scan the list. Edward's name was in neither. Though his regiment had suffered severely, His colonel was dead; and it was thought through the foulest treachery, that of raising the national flag by the rebels.

Days of suspense that seemed like weeks followed, and weeks that seemed like months passed, and no letter came, but she hoped in the silence that he was a prisoner, and finally it was so announced.

She had given up all exertion; had pined and drooped till she seemed but a shadow of herself. Again she started out with her basket of flowers. A very sorrowful face her effort; in the sweet, pale face was no doubt the reason why so many bought her flowers—so refused, so touching in its expression, had the sorrow come to her, and if a gray was sometimes disagreeable she soon forgot it, so absorbed was she in thought. September came and went, and Jessie's household wakeful, the least sick of and the chill air which Jessie was so much exposed to penetrated beneath her thin shawl, and racked her slight frame with pain.

Her faith in God was unshaken, but sorrow and anxiety had worn upon her. She found herself unable now and then to rise; the color of hope was flickering—it had been blown upon by so much uncertainty and suspense. Her landlady had nodded her silver, had pressed her to see a doctor, had offered her every delicacy, but appetite was no longer to be cajoled. She knew a physician could not minister to her heart-sickness, and she closed her eyes with a sad longing to be at rest—to be in the world where parting and sighing are unknown—to be where war and rumors of wars can not reach—where the wicked cease from troubling. She had lain hours in this passive unrest, when, opening her eyes, for the first time noticed her tuberose all in bloom; its rich fragrance, which is of itself a love-story of passionate beauty filled the room. She remembered Edward's words about it, and she prayed that God would either give him to her or take her to Him. She was weak with death longing, and her soul peace and willingness to submit to any fate that He should choose for her at last filled her soul, and she slept.

"Jessie, my own Jessie!" were the words that awakened her, and Edward was beside her, his arm around her head, his lips speaking love and tenderness. "Jessie, darling! I could wait no lon, ger. I feared you never would waken. Oh, my own Jessie, how pale your dear face is! And I could not come to you all this weary time; but I have you at last, darling!" It was a long story; Edward's wounds, imprisonment, and final escape. His wounded arm, too, was yet in a sling; but he came with new honors; he was a Captain now in the regular service, and very fast he looked to his new uniform. The joy of reunion was new life to Jessie. Health came slowly back to her, but almost left again when she found her seriously hurt was Edward at her account of her flower-selling. He could not be angry, but he was wounded more painfully than by the sabre-thrust he had received. He made her promise never to reveal what he chose to consider a mad, wild freak; though, when she told all she had suffered, he clasped her to his heart, with the belief that she was nobler and better than any other woman in the world.

The tuberoses glistened like stars in her soft brown hair, under the delicate lace of her wedding veil, and Edward will never again let his Jessie do penn upon flowers for support.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL KELLEY, OF VIRGINIA.
[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH FURNISHED BY MR. G. ANTHONY, OF NEW YORK.]

GENERAL KELLEY.

WE publish above a portrait of the gallant GENERAL KELLEY, of Virginia, whose recent exploit at Romney we noticed last week. General Kelley is a native of New England, who settled in Western Virginia some twenty years since, and became a wealthy and a leading citizen. When the war broke out he at once volunteered, and obtained the command of the First Virginia Regiment. At the battle of Philippi he was severely wounded, and for some time his life was despaired of. He has since recovered, and is doing gallant service again under the Stars and Stripes. He is now in command at Romney.

GENERAL M'DOWELL M'COOK.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL A. M'DOWELL M'COOK, whose portrait we publish above, was born in Columbiana County, Ohio, April 22, 1831, was appointed to West Point in 1848, and graduated in 1852. He was appointed Brevet Second Lieutenant in the Third Infantry, and ordered to the Department of New Mexico. He took an active part in all the prominent Indian campaigns in that department up to February, 1858, when he was ordered to West Point, where he served as principal assistant instructor in infantry tactics, and also in the art of war, until the fall of Sumter. He then applied for permission to take the field, and was ordered to his native State to muster in volunteers for the three months' service. On his thirtieth birthday he was elected and commissioned Colonel of the First Ohio Volunteers. He commanded this regiment at the battle of Bull Run, where it formed part of Schenck's brigade. He returned to Ohio with the regiment, mustered it out of the service, and recruited it again at Dayton, Ohio. He was appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers September 3, 1861, and ordered to the Department of the Cumberland, and he now commands the advance in front of Buckner.

He has five brothers in the army, a sixth having been killed at the battle of Bull Run. One of them is Colonel of the Ninth Ohio, now in active service in Western Virginia.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL A. M'DOWELL M'COOK.
[SKETCHED BY MR. H. MOSLER.]

SLAVE-HUNTERS IN TROUBLE.

ONE of our Missouri correspondents, Mr. Bill D. Travis, has sent us the sketch which we reproduce below. It seems that two slave-hunters—fellows of evil mien and seemingly bad repute—had been rendering themselves very obnoxious to the troops at Bird's Point, Missouri, by entering the camp and kidnapping negroes, under the pretence that they were runaway slaves. They had been turned out of camp once or twice, and warned not to return. One day in October they were, nevertheless, discovered in the camp of the Twenty-second Illinois Regiment; they even attempted to carry off an unfortunate negro whom they pronounced to be a slave, but who protested that he was free. The soldiers attempted to argue the point, but were brutally denounced by the slave-hunters as "bloody abolitionists," negro thieves, etc. This sort of thing at last roused the Illinois boys beyond bearing, and they proceeded to punish the foul-mouthed rascals. Our correspondent thinks, no doubt justly, that their career might have been cut abruptly short had not the noise of the affray reached the ears of Colonel Dougherty, who immediately had the slave-hunters sent out of camp under guard of a file of soldiers. They are not likely to be caught there again.

It is one thing to make rules for the guidance of Generals, and another to get our troops to execute them. When General Sherman gets down into the South, and is molested by night attacks from the rebels, led by negro guides, we fear that all the rules in the world will not suffice to persuade his troops to aid or tolerate any way "hunters for slaves."

A SCOUTING PARTY.

WE publish on page 736 a very striking illustration of one of the most exciting duties which now devolve upon our troops—scouting. Every day each brigade, and often each regiment, sends out a small party of tried soldiers under an officer selected for his courage and coolness, to ascertain what, if any, changes have taken place in the position of the enemy. The duty is one of no inconsiderable danger, as the enemy's sharp-shooters are always on the look-out for such expeditions, and, lying concealed in thickets, not unfrequently manage to shoot several of the scouts before they are detected. At and near Fortress Monroe these scouting expeditions have proved unusually disastrous, having cost many valuable lives. The very danger and enterprise of the duty, however, renders it attractive to young soldiers and to ambitious subalterns.

TWO SLAVE-HUNTERS EXPELLED FROM THE CAMP OF THE TWENTY-SECOND ILLINOIS VOLUNTEERS AT BIRD'S POINT, MISSOURI.—[SKETCHED BY MR. BILL TRAVIS.]

BEEF FOR THE ARMY CROSSING THE LONG BRIDGE AT WASHINGTON.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

A STRANGE STORY.

By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE belief prevalent in the town ascribed the murder of Sir Philip to the violence of some vulgar robber, probably not an inhabitant of ——. Mr. Vigors did not favor that belief. He intimated an opinion, which seemed extravagant and groundless, that Sir Philip had been murdered for the sake not of the missing purse but of the missing casket. It was currently believed that the solemn magistrate had consulted one of his pretended clairvoyants, and that this impostor had gulled him with assurances to which he attached a credit that perverted into egregiously absurd directions his characteristic sagacity and zeal.

Be that as it may, the coroner's inquest closed without casting any light on so mysterious a tragedy.

What were my own conjectures I scarcely dared to admit—I certainly could not venture to utter them. But my suspicions centred upon Margrave. That for some reason or other he had cause to dread Sir Philip's presence in L——was clear, even to my reason. And how could my reason reject all the influences which had been brought to bear on my imagination, whether by the scene in the museum or my conversations with the deceased? But it was impossible to act on such suspicions—impossible even to confide them. Could I have told to any man the effect produced on me in the museum, he would have considered me a liar or a madman. And in Sir Philip's accusations against Margrave there was nothing tangible, nothing that could bear repetition. Those accusations, if analyzed, vanished into air. What did they imply?—that Margrave was a magician, a monstrous prodigy, a creature exceptional to the ordinary conditions of humanity. Would the most reckless of mortals have ventured to bring against the worst of characters such a charge on the authority of a deceased witness, and to found on evidence so fantastic the awful accusation of murder? But all men, certainly I—a sober, practical physician—was the last whom the public could excuse for such incredible implications—and certainly, of all men, the last against whom any suspicion of heinous crime would be readily entertained was that joyous youth in whose sunny aspect life and conscience alike seemed to keep careless holiday. But I could not overcome, nor did I attempt to reason against, the horror akin to detestation that had succeeded to the fascinating attraction by which Margrave had before conciliated a liking founded rather on admiration than esteem.

In order to avoid his visits I kept away from the study in which I had habitually spent my mornings, and to which he had been accustomed to so ready an access; and if he called at the front door I directed my servant to tell him that I was either from home or engaged. He did attempt for the first few days to visit me as before, but when my intention to shun him became thus manifest, desisted—naturally enough, as any other man so pointedly repelled would have done.

I abstained from all those houses in which I was likely to meet him, and went my professional round of visits in a close carriage, so that I might not be accosted by him in his walks.

One morning, a very few days after Strahan had shown me Sir Philip Derval's letter, I received a note from my old college acquaintance, stating that he was going to Derval Court that afternoon; that he should take with him the memoir which he had found; and begging me to visit him at his new home the next day and commence my inspection of the manuscript. I consented eagerly.

That morning, on going my round, my carriage passed by another drawn up to the pavement, and I recognized the figure of Margrave standing beside the vehicle, and talking to some one seated within it. I looked back, as my own carriage whirled rapidly by, and saw, with unpleasure and alarm, that it was Richard Strahan whom Margrave was thus familiarly addressing himself. How had the two made acquaintance? What is not an intimate with Sir Philip Derval's memory that the heir he had selected should be thus apparently intimate with the man whom he had so sternly denounced to me as one more impatient to read the memoir; in all probability it would give such explanations with respect to Margrave's antecedents as, if not serving to eliminate him of legal offenses, would at least effectually terminate any acquaintance between Sir Philip's successor and himself.

All my thoughts were, however, diverted to channels of far deeper interest even than those in which my mind had of late been so unwillingly led along; when, on returning home, I found a note from Mrs. Ashleigh. She and Lilian had just come back to L——, sooner than she had led me to anticipate. Lilian had not seemed quite well the last day or two, and had been anxious to return.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

LET me recall it—softly—softly! Let me recall that evening spent with them in the evening, the last before darkness rose between us like a solid wall.

It was evening, at the close of summer. The sun had set, the twilight was lingering still. We were in the old monastic garden—garden so quiet, so cool, so fragrant. She was seated on a bench under the one great tree—the tree that casts ombre in the midst of the grassy lawn, with its little parachute of flowers. I had thrown myself on the sward at her feet; her hand was carelessly lay in the clasp of mine. I see her still—how young, how fair, how innocent!

Strange, strange! how inexpressibly English is thoroughly the creature of our sober, homely life! The pretty delicate white robe that I touch so timorously, and the fibbon that binds the hair so well become the soft color of the fair cheek, the wavy silk of the brown hair! She is murmuring low her answer to my trembling question—

"As well as when last we parted? Do you love me as well still?"

"There is no 'still' written here," said she, softly, pressing her hand to her heart. "Yesterday is as to-morrow in the Forever."

"Ah, Lilian! if I could reply to you in words as akin to poetry as your own."

"Fie! you who affect to care for poetry."

"That was before you went away—before I missed you from my eyes, from my life—before I was quite conscious how precious you were to me, more precious than common words can tell!" Yes, there is one period in love when all men are poets, however the penury of their language may belie the luxuriance of their fancies. What would become of me if you ceased to love me?"

"Or of me if you ceased to love me?"

"And somehow it seems to me this evening as if my heart drew nearer to you—nearer as if for shelter."

"It is sympathy," said she, with tremulous eagerness; "that sort of mysterious sympathy which I have often heard you deride. Ah! I, too, feel drawn nearer to you, as if there were a storm at hand. I was oppressed by an indescribable terror in returning home, and the moment I saw you there came a sense of protection."

Her head sank on my shoulder; we were silent some moments; then we both rose by the same involuntary impulse, and round her slight form I twined my strong arm of man. And now we are winding slow among the lilacs and acacia that belt the lawn. Lilian has not yet heard of the murder, which forms the one topic of the town, for all talk of violence and death ceased under her as they affect a fearful child. Mrs. Ashleigh, therefore, had judiciously concealed from her the letters and the journals by which the dismal news had been carried to herself. I need scarcely say that the grim subject was not touched by me. In fact, my own mind preoccupied from the events which had of late so perplexed and tormented it; the tranquility of the scene, the bliss of Lilian's presence, had begun to chase away even that melancholy foreboding which had overshadowed me in the first moments of our reunion. So we came gradually to converse of the future—of the day, not far distant, when we two should be as one. We planned our nuptial excursion. We would visit the scenes endeared to her by song, to me by childhood—the banks and waves of my native Windermere—on her brief holiday face life returned to labor, and hearts now so disquieted by hope and joy settled down to the calm serenity of home.

As we thus talked, the moon, nearly rounded to her full, rose amidst skies without a cloud. We paused to gaze on her solemn haunting beauty, as where are the lovers who have not paused to gaze? We were then on the terrace walk, which commanded a view of the town below.

Before us was a parapet wall, low on the garden side, but inaccessible on the outer side, forming part of a straggling irregular street that made one of the boundaries dividing Abbey Hill from Low Town. The lamps of the thoroughfares, in many a line and row beneath us, stretched far away, obscured, here and there, by intervening roofs and tall church towers. The hum of the city came to our ears, low and mellowed into a lulling sound. It was not displeasing to be reminded that there was a world without, as close and closer we drew each to each—worlds to one another! Suddenly there caroled forth the song of a human voice—a wild, irregular, half-savage melody—foreign, uncomprehended words—air and words not new to me. I recognized the voice and chant of Margrave. I started, and uttered an angry exclamation.

"Hush!" whispered Lilian, and I felt her frame shiver within my encircling arm. "Hush! listen! Yes; I have heard that voice before—last night—"

"Last night you were not here; you were more than a hundred miles away."

"I heard it in a dream! Hush, hush!"

The song grew louder; impossible to describe its effect, in the midst of the tranquil night, chiming over the serried roof-tops, and under the solitary moon. It was not like the artful song of man, for it was defective in the methodical harmony of tune; it was not like the song of the wild bird, for it had no monotony in its sweetness: it was wandering and various as the sounds from an Æolian harp. But it affected the senses in a powerful degree, as in remote lands and in vast solitudes I have since found the note of the mocking-bird, suddenly heard, affect the listener half with delight, half with awe, as if some demon creature of the desert were mimicking man for its own merriment. The chant now had changed into an air of defying glee, of menacing exultation; it might have been the triumphant war-song of some antique barbarian tribe. The note was sinister; a shudder passed through me, and Lilian had closed her eyes, and was sighing heavily; then with a rapid change, sweet as the coo with which an Arab mother lulls her babe to sleep, the melody died away. "There, there, look," murmured Lilian, moving from me, "the same I saw last night in sleep; the same I saw in the space above, on the evening I first knew you!"

Her eyes were fixed—her hand raised; my look followed hers, and rested on the face and form of Margrave. The moon shone full upon him, so full as if concentrating all its light upon his image. The place on which he stood (a balcony to the upper story of a house about fifty yards distant) was considerably above the level of the terrace from which we gazed on him. His arms were folded on his breast, and he appeared to be looking straight toward us. Even at that distance the luminous youth of his countenance appeared to me terribly distinct, and the light of his wondrous eye seemed to rest upon us in our lengthened, steady ray through the limpid moonshine. Involuntarily I seized Lilian's hand, and drew her away almost by force, for she was unwilling to move, and as I led her back, she turned her head to look round; I, too, turned in jealous rage. I breathed more freely. Margrave had disappeared.

"How came he there? It is not his hotel. Whose house is it?" I said aloud, though speaking to myself.

Lilian remained silent; her eyes fixed upon the ground as if in deep reverie. I took her hand; it did not return my pressure. I felt cut to the heart when she drew coldly from me that hand, till then so frankly cordial. I stopped short: "Lilian, what is this? you are chilled toward me. Can there be sound of that man's voice, the mere glimpse of that man's face, have—" I paused; I did not dare to complete my question.

Lilian lifted her eyes to mine, and I saw at once in those eyes a change. Their look was cold: not haughty, but distant. "I do not understand you," she said, in a weary, listless accent. "It is growing late; I must go in."

So we walked on no longer arm in arm, nor hand in hand. Then it occurred to me that the next day Lilian would be in that narrow world of society that there she could scarcely fail to hear of Margrave, to meet, to know him. Jealousy seized me with all its imaginary terrors, and amidst that jealousy a nobler, purer apprehension for herself. Had I been Lilian's brother instead of her betrothed I should not have trembled less to foresee the shadow of Margrave's mysterious influence passing over a mind so predisposed to the charm which Mystery itself has for those whose thoughts fuse their coolness in fancies, whose world melts away into Dreamland. Therefore I spoke.

"Lilian, at the risk of offending you—alas! I have never done so before this night—I must address to you a prayer which I implore you not to regard as the dictate of a suspicion unworthy you and myself. The person whom you have just heard and seen at present much courted in the circles of this town. I entreat of you not to permit any one to introduce him to you. I entreat you not to know him. I can not tell you all my reasons for this petition; enough that I pledge you my honor that those reasons are grave. Trust, then, in my truth as I trust in yours. Be assured that I stretch not the rights which your heart has bestowed upon mine in the promise I ask, as I shall be freed from all fear by a promise which I know will be sacred when once it is given."

"What promise?" asked Lilian, absently, as if she had not heard my words.

"What promise? Why to refuse all acquaintance with that man; his name is Margrave. Promise me, dearest, promise me."

"Why is your voice so changed?" said Lilian. "Its tone jars on my ear," she added, with a peevishness so unlike her that it startled me more than it offended; and, without a word further, she quickened her pace and entered the house.

For the rest of the evening we were both taciturn and distant toward each other. In vain Mrs. Ashleigh kindly sought to break down our mutual reserve. I felt that I had the right to be resentful, and I clung to that right the more because Lilian made no attempt at reconciliation. This, too, was wholly unlike herself, for her temper was ordinarily sweet—sweet to the extreme of meekness; saddened if the slightest misunderstanding between us had ever vexed me, and yearning to ask forgiveness if a look or a word had pained me. I was in hopes that before I went away peace between us would be restored. But long ere her usual hour for retiring to rest she rose abruptly, and complaining of fatigue and headache, wished me good-night, and avoided the hand I sorrowfully held out to her as I opened the door.

"You must have been very unkind to poor Lilian," said Mrs. Ashleigh, kissing me, earnest, "for I never saw her so cross to you before. And the first day of her return, too!"

"The fault is not mine," said I, somewhat sullenly; "I did but ask Lilian, and that as a humble prayer, not to make the acquaintance of a stranger in this town against whom I have reasons for distrust and aversion. I know not why that prayer should displease her."

"Nor I. Who is the stranger?"

"A person who calls himself Margrave. Let me at least entreat you to avoid him?"

"Oh, I have no desire to make acquaintance with strangers. But, now Lilian is gone, do tell me all about this dreadful murder? The servants are full of it, and I can not keep it long concealed from Lilian, as she is hopes that you would have broken it to her."

I rose impatiently: I could not bear to talk than of an event the tragedy of which was associated in my mind with circumstances so mysterious. I became agitated and even angry when Mrs. Ashleigh persisted in rambling woman-like inquiries—"Who was suspected of the deed? Who did I think had committed it? What sort of a man was Sir Philip? What was that strange story about a casket?" Breaking from such interrogations, to which I could give but abrupt and evasive answers, I seized my hat and took my departure.

"SO WE WALKED ON MOODILY, NO LONGER ARM IN ARM, NOR HAND IN HAND."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

LETTER FROM ALLEN FERWICK TO ELIJAH ASHLEIGH.

"I have promised to go to Derval Court to-day, and shall not return till to-morrow. I can not bear the thought that so many hours must pass away with one feeling less kind than usual resting like a cloud upon you and me, Lilian, if I offended you, forgive me! Send me one line to say so!—one line which I can place next to my heart and cover with grateful kisses till we meet again!"

REPLY.

"I scarcely know what you mean, nor do I quite understand my own state of mind at this moment. It can not be that I love you less—and yet—but I will not write more now. I had glad tidings that not most for the next day or so, and then I hope to be quite recovered. I am not well at this moment. Do not ask me to forgive you—but if it is I who am in fault—forgive me, oh, forgive me, Allen."

And with this unsatisfactory note—not worn next my heart, not covered with kisses, but thrust crumpled into my desk like a creditor's unwelcome bill—I flung myself on my horse and rode to Derval Court. I was naturally proud; my pride came now to my aid. I felt bitterly indignant against Lilian, so indignant that I resolved on my return to say to her, "If in those words, 'And yet,' you implied a doubt whether you loved me less, I cancel your vows, I give you back your freedom." And I could have passed from her threshold with a firm foot, though with the certainty that I should never smile again.

Does her note seem to you who may read these pages to justify such resentment? Perhaps not. But there is an atmosphere in the letters of the one we love, which we alone—we who love—can feel, and in the atmosphere of that letter I felt the chill of estrangement.

I reached the park lodge of Derval Court late in the day. I had occasion to visit some patients whose homes were scattered many miles apart, and for that reason, as well as from the desire for some quick bodily exercise which is so natural an effect of any disturbance of mind, I had made the journey on horseback instead of using a carriage, that I could not have got through the items of daily duties by which alone the work set to myself could be accomplished in time.

Just as I entered the park an uneasy thought seized hold of me that the strength which is ascribed to presentiments. I had passed through my study (which has been so elaborately described) to my stables, as I generally did when I wanted my saddle-horse, and in so doing had doubtless left open the gate to the iron palisade, and probably the window of the study itself. I had been in this careless habit for several years, without ever once having cause for self-reproach. As I before said, there was nothing in my study to tempt a thief; the study shut out from the body of the house, and the servant sure at nightfall both to close the window and lock the gate; yet now, for the first time, I felt an impulse, urgent, keen, and disquieting, to ride back to the town and see those precautions taken. I could not guess why, but something whispered to me that my neglect had exposed me to some great danger. I even checked my horse and looked at my watch; too late!—already just on the stroke of Strahan's dinner hour as fixed in his note; my horse, too, was fatigued and spent; besides, what folly! what boastful man can believe in the warnings of a "presentiment." I pushed on and soon halted before the old-fashioned hall door of that hall up to the hall. Here I was accosted by the old steward; he had just descended the stairs, and as I dismounted he thrust an ominous nine unceremoniously and drew me a little aside.

"Doctor, I was right; it was his ghost that I saw by the door of the mausoleum. I saw it again at the same place last night, but I had not the courage to pass on his murderer! Blood for blood!"

"Ay!" said I, sternly; for if I suspected Margrave before, I felt convinced now that the inexpiable deed was his. Wherefore conceal? Simply because I now hated him more, and hate is so easily convinced. "Lilian! Lilian!" I murmured to myself that name; the first time my hate was fed by my jealousy. "Ay!" said I, sternly, "murder will out."

"What are you twice about?" said the old man, querulously; "days pass on days, and no nearer the truth. But what does the new owner care? He has his rents and acres; what does he care for the dead? I will never serve another master. I have just told Mr. Strahan so. How did I know whether he did not do the deed? Who else had an interest in it?"

"Hush, hush!" I cried; "you do not know what you say so wildly."

The old man stared at me, shook his head, released my arm, and strode away.

A laboring man came out of the garden, and having unhooked the saddle-bags, which contained the few things required for so short a visit, I consigned my horse to his care, and ascended the person. The old housekeeper met me in the hall, conducted me up the great staircase, showed me into a bedroom prepared for me, and told me that Mr. Strahan was already waiting dinner for me. I should find him in the study. I hastened to join him. He began apologizing, very unnecessarily, for the state of his establishment. He had as yet engaged no new servants, the housekeeper, with the help of a housemaid, did all the work.

Richard Strahan at college had been as little distinguishable from other young men as a youth neither rich nor poor, neither clever nor stupid, neither handsome nor ugly, neither audacious sinner nor formal saint, possibly could be.

Yet to those who understood him well he was not without some of those moral qualities by which a youth of mediocre intellect often matures into a superior man.

He was, as Sir Philip had been rightly informed, thoroughly honest and upright. But with a strong sense of duty there was also a certain latent hardness. He was not indulgent. He had outward frankness with acquaintances, but was easily roused to suspicion. He had much of the thriftiness and self-denial of the North Countryman, and I have no doubt that he had lived with calm content and systematic economy on an income which made him, as a bachelor, independent of his nominal profession, but would have left him, in itself, for the life-long maintenance of a wife and family. He was, therefore, still single.

It seemed to me, even during the few minutes in which we conversed before dinner was announced, that his character showed a new phase in the change from the simple and unostentatious style of the duties of station and the woes of wealth. He seemed to be very much afraid of speaking, and still more appalled at the idea of being cheated. His temper, too, was ruffled; his steward had given him notice to quit. Mr. Jeeves, who had spent the morning with him, had said the steward would be a great loss, and a steward, at once sharp and honest, was not to be easily found.

What riches can embitter the possession of great goods! Strahan had taken a fancy to the old house; it was conformable to his notions both of comfort and dignity, and Sir Philip had expressed a desire that the old house should be pulled down. Strahan had inspected the plans for the new mansion to which Sir Philip had referred, and the plans did not please him; on the contrary, they terrified.

"Jeeves says that it could not build such a house under seventy or eighty thousand pounds, and then it will require twice the establishment which will suffice for this. Is it not ruined?" cried the man who had just come into possession of at least twelve thousand a year.

"Sir Philip has given you to pull down the old house; he only advised you to do so. Perhaps he thought the site less healthy than that which proposes to build on. Strahan was aware of some other drawback to the house, which you may discover later. Wait a little and see how you like it."

"But, at all events, I suppose I must pull down this curious old room—the nicest part of the whole house."

Strahan, as he spoke, looked wistfully round at the quaint old chimney-piece; the carved ceiling; the well-built walls, with the large mullion casement, opening so pleasantly on the sequestered gardens. He had conceived himself in Sir Philip's study, the chamber in which the once famous mystic, Forman, had found a refuge.

"So cozy a room for a single man!" sighed Strahan. "Near the stables and dog-kennels, too! But I suppose I must pull it down. I am not bound to do so legally; it is no condition of the will. But then I know one ought not legally not to disobey poor Sir Philip's positive injunction."

"Of that," said I, gravely, "there can not be a doubt."

Here our conversation was interrupted by Mrs. Gates, who informed us that dinner was served in the library. Wine of great age was brought from the long-neglected cellars; Strahan filled and refilled my glass, and grew mild into hilarity, began to talk of bringing old college friends around him in the winter season, and making the cud-free ring with laughter and song once more.

Time wore away, and night had long set in, when Strahan last rose from the table, his speech thick and his tongue unsteady. We returned to the study, and I reminded my host of the special object of my visit to him—viz., the inspection of Sir Philip's manuscript.

"It is tough reading," said Strahan; "better put it off till to-morrow. You will stay here two or three days."

"No; I must return to L— to-morrow. I can not absent myself longer from patients. And it is the more desirable that no time should be lost before examining the contents of the manuscript, because I may then be able to give some clew to the detection of the murderer."

"Why do you think that?" cried Strahan, startled from the drowsiness that was creeping over him.

"Because the manuscript may show that Sir Philip had discovered the author of the crime; my could have had a motive for such a crime? Come, bring forth the book. You of all men are bound to be alert in the search which may guide the retribution of justice to the assassin of your benefactor."

"Yes, yes," I will offer a reward of five thousand pounds for the discovery. Allen, that wretched old steward had the insolence to tell me that I was the only man in the world who could have an interest in the death of his master; and he looked at me as if he thought that I had committed the crime. You are right, it becomes me to act. Yes, I will act." The assassin must be found."

While thus speaking Strahan had risen, unlocked a desk which stood on one of the walls, and drawn forth a thick volume, the contents of which were protected by a clasp and lock. Strahan proceeded to unlock the clasp, and took a bunch of keys, which he said had been found on Sir Philip's person.

"There, Allen, this is the memoir. I need not tell you what store I place on it; not, between you and me, that I expect it will warrant poor Sir Philip's high opinion of his own scientific discoveries. That part of his letter seems to me very queer and very flighty. But he evidently set his heart on the publication of his work, in part if not in whole. And, naturally, I must desire to comply with a wish so distinctly intimated by one to whom I owe so much. I beg you, therefore, not to be too fastidious. Some valuable hints in medicine, I have reason to believe, the manuscript will contain, and those may help you in your profession, Allen."

"You have reason to believe! Why?"

"Oh, a charming young fellow, who, with most of the other gentry resident at L——, called on me at my hotel, told me that he had traveled in the East, and had there heard much of Sir Philip's knowledge of chemistry, and the cures it had enabled him to perform."

"You speak of Mr. Margrave. He called on you?"

"Yes."

"You did not, I trust, mention to him the existence of Sir Philip's manuscript."

"Indeed I did, and I said you had promised to examine it. He seemed delighted at that, and spoke most highly of your peculiar fitness for the task."

"Give me the manuscript," said I, abruptly, "and after I have looked at it to-night I may have something to say to you to-morrow in reference to Mr. Margrave."

"There is the book," said Strahan; "I have just glanced at it, and find much of it written in Latin; and I am ashamed to say that I have so neglected the little Latin I learned in our college days that I could not construe what I looked at."

I sat down and placed the book before me; Strahan fell into a doze, from which he was wakened by the housekeeper, who brought in the tea things.

"Well," said Strahan, languidly, "do you find much in the book that explains the many amazing riddles in poor Sir Philip's eccentric life and pursuits?"

"Yes," said I. "Do not interrupt me."

Strahan rose to go to bed, and the housekeeper asked if we should want any thing more that night, and if I thought I could find my way to my bedroom.

I dismissed her impatiently, and continued to read.

Strahan woke up again as the clock struck eleven, and finding me still absorbed in the manuscript, and disinclined to converse, lighted his candle, and telling me to replace the manuscript in the desk when I had done with it, and be sure to lock the desk and take charge of the key, which he took off the bunch and gave me, went up stairs yawning.

I was alone, in the wizard Forman's chamber, and bending over a stranger record than had ever excited my influence before, or, in later years, provoked my skeptic smile.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Ladies — Try it.

ANDREWS' EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER.—This article has been established in public favor, and is still the most desirable article for the Invigorated Housekeeper! This compound is perfectly healthful and dietetic, and ready for use in one minute! There is no delay or mishap in the raising of Bread, Biscuits, or Tea Biscuit! It is the constant preparation extant. Dr. Chilton's certificate of its purity and excellence on each label. Ask your Grocer for ANDREWS' YEAST POWDER. On using it, you will bless, BY 10 THE BIBLE!

Sold at Wholesale and Retail by

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
No. 79 John street, New York.

Friends of Soldiers!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, and all other places, should be sent, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Battery charged low rates.

Good Pay for Hard Times!

Agents wanted in a business that will pay large profits, and quick sales. Call at once.

JONES & CLARK, 83 Nassau Street, N. Y.

CONTENTS of BYRNE'S ARMY and NAVY WRITING CASE.

15 sheets of fine cream-laid note paper, 6 sheets of Union note paper, 20 Union envelopes to match, 1 stick of sealing wax, 1 penholder with fine gold pen, 1 bottle of ink, 12 good steel pens, 1 pen-holder, 1 lead pencil.

Put together with fancy paper and box for transportation, all securely fastened in a neat and strong cloth-covered box, 9 inches long by 5 wide, and 2 deep. Price 75 cents. J. F. BYRNE, No. 1 Maiden Lane, New York.

Sent free on receipt of $1 00. Agents Wanted.

A WONDERFUL LITTLE MICROSCOPE, MAGNIFYING 500 times, sent to any applicant on receipt of twenty-five cents in silver, and two 3c. postage stamps. Address for one dollar. Address MRS. M. S. WOODWARD, BOX 1854, Philad., Pa.

Ladies Read—Sent Free.—Important information by which any one can fill beautiful Flannels. Address Dr. M. BROWN, New York.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to HARNDEN'S, 74 Broadway, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Commercial Agents wanted. Large commission, honorable business. Circular sent. A.W. Harrison, Phila.

COOLEY'S Cabinet Printing Office for small Printers and Amateurs, the best thing out. Send for Circulars. A. G. COOLEY, 13 Spruce Street, N. Y.

JEWELRY! JEWELRY!—The Head-Quarters for all Cash Buyers of fine and cheap Jewelry, Miniature Pictures, Watches, Silver Ware, Plated Ware, &c., &c., inclose stamp for full particulars. W. A. HAYWARD (Manufacturing Jeweler), 208 Broadway.

The New Gas Lamps,

For burning Warren's Camphine, Burning Fluid, or Coal Oil, or Self-Generating Gas Lamps, adapted for public and private buildings, gives great satisfaction. Sample lamp $8. "Cooper Lamps" and Camphene Lamps repaired and altered to burn those Oils. Send Stamp for Circular. CALLENDER & PERCE, 175 Broadway, N. Y., up-stairs.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance, which can not fail—free for 25 cents. Address T. William & Co., Publishers, Box 2390, Philad.

Cloaks! Cloaks!

BRODIE

has made his

Grand Opening

of

Fall and Winter Cloaks,

at his

OLD STAND,

300 Canal Street,

and

His Palace of Fashion,

Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,

Cor. of 23d Street,

New York.

A New Cartridge Revolver,

Carrying Six Balls (60 to the pound). Any one wanting a superior Pocket or Belt Arm will find this to be the best in the market. Price $12 00. Send for circular.

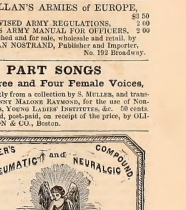
MERWIN & BRAY, Agents, 145 Broadway, N. Y.

MCCLELLAN'S ARMIES of EUROPE. $1 50
NEW REVISED ARMY REGULATIONS. 1 00
PAYTEN'S ARMY MANUAL FOR OFFICERS. 50
Just published and for sale, wholesale and retail, by
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher of Military Books,
No. 192 Broadway.

PART SONGS

For Three and Four Female Voices,

Selected mostly from a collection by S. MULLER, and translated by FANNY MALONE RAYMOND, for the use of NORMAL SCHOOLS, YOUNG LADIES' INSTITUTES, &c. 50 cents. Copies mailed, post-paid, on receipt of the price, by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.



A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agents F. C. WELLS & CO., 119 Franklin St., New York. Sold by Apothecaries everywhere.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT TO HIRE AGENTS

SOUTHERN COTTON PLANTER. "Look hyar, Mr. MEMMINGER, how're we going to Feed our Niggers if the Darned Government won't Buy our Cotton or let us Sell it to some one else?"

SECRETARY MEMMINGER. "That, Gentlemen, is a very interesting question of Economical Science, and I recommend you to study it closely. As for the Government we have established, so far from being able to Help you, it needs all your Money and Portable Property, and I rather reckon it will take 'em by and by."

COLUMBIA. "Now, it's no use you're coming round here, JOHN, I haven't any Cotton for you."

JOHN BULL (an English Peddler). "Well, Mum, it ain't the COTTON I care so much about just now, but if you would only Purchase a few small Articles to help me to Buy BREAD for my Starving Children."

A COCK AND A BULL STORY.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Retirement of Lieut.-Gen. Scott.

The Life and Military Services of
LIEUT.-GEN. WINFIELD SCOTT,
And a full Account of his Victories,
(Beadle's Dime Biographical Library, No. 6.)
Price Ten Cents. For sale by all Army Sutlers, Booksellers and Newsdealers. Address
BEADLE & CO., Publishers,
New York.

To the Public.

Permit us to inform you that we have now opened a complete and extensive assortment of
NEW GOODS,
adapted for fall and winter clothing, to which we particularly invite your personal inspection, and which we are willing to make up to order in our usual well known style of excellence, without any advance in prices although a great advance has taken place in all fashionable imported goods within sixty days.
Assuring you of our continued determination to merit the confidence we have so long enjoyed, We are
Your obedt. servants
P. DERBY & COMPANY,
Tailors and Importers, 57 Walker Street.
By the request of many of our customers, and during the present disturbed state of public affairs, we are declining for cash.

Army and Navy Equipments positively not cash on delivery.

Winter Gloves, Undershirts, &c.

Our large stock at very low prices, all qualities and sizes,
Wholesale or Retail.
IRA PERRIN & SONS,
No. 61 Nassau Street or No. 13 Broadway.

The New Gothic Furnace,

For warming Houses, Stores, Churches, &c. A GREAT IMPROVEMENT IN HEATING: Combining the advantages of steam and hot water. Also for sale, Portables, Registers, and the Polar Refrigerator.
BARTLETT & LEMAN,
No. 125 Broadway, N. Y.
Send for a Circular.

Officers' Swords.

100 STAFF-OFFICERS' SWORDS,
100 LINE-OFFICERS' SWORDS,
100 NAVY-OFFICERS' SWORDS, of superior quality. Also
Fine Gold NAVY EPAULETTES, for all ranks, just received by TIFFANY & CO., Nos. 550 and 552 Broadway.
All descriptions of MILITARY and NAVAL GOODS, at wholesale and retail.

"Something New for All."

GEO. GEO. B. McCLELLAN and our New Union Prize Gift Package is sure to be wondered at. Seventy-five cents worth of indispensable articles for 25 cent. Agents are making from $5 to $10 per day. Agents wanted, male and female, everywhere. Address, with stamp for circular, RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York.

$150 PER MONTH made by enterprising agents selling DOWNER'S HUMMER and SHUTTLE for home sewing. Protects the finger and makes a beautiful lock. Sample sent on receipt of 25 cents. Address A. M. DOWNER, No. 447 Broadway.

EXCELSIOR

For FARMERS, MILLERS, and OTHERS, and ANTI-FRICTION HORSE POWERS. These Mills and Powers have taken NINE FIRST PREMIUMS at Western State Fairs this Fall, and are superior to all others. Agents wanted in every county. Rights for sale. Send stamp for illustrated circulars to BENNET BROTHERS, 42 Greene St., New York.

Union Stationery.

AGENTS can satisfy themselves by sending for circular, that our UNION PRIZE PACKETS are superior to any others in market, and to be had on liberal terms.
P. HASKINS & CO.,
36 Beekman Street, New York.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS. — SELEOTOS' Patents, 536 Broadway, New York.
Send for a Circular.

Devlin & Co.

We are this week in receipt of large importations of choice
WINTER OVERCOATINGS,
FRENCH CASSIMERES,
NEW STYLES VESTINGS,
WINTER UNDERWEAR.
And have also added largely to our superior stock of ready made
WINTER CLOTHING.
All of which we are selling at exceedingly low prices.
DEVLIN & CO.,
Corner of Broadway and Warren and Grand Streets.

Fine Shirts & Collars

On hand and made to order in any style, by
UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway, New York.

ALL WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Wedding Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 182 Broadway. Samples by mail.

Employment at a liberal salary, and expenses. For terms address JULIUS BROTHERS, Boston, Mass.

Snow's Fure Confectionery,

200 Reads, 623 Broadway, N. Y. Wholesale and Retail. Dealers enclose stamp for catalogue and price.

How to Obtain a Patent.

Messrs. MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, and for fifteen years Solicitors of American and European Patents, have treated a neat pamphlet, giving advice "How to obtain a Patent," which they furnish free by mail. All Inventors who wish to take Patents should send for it. Address
MUNN & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

Ladies are invited to call and examine the splendid stock of fine fans and stationery lately just now open at PHILIP'S, 471 Broadway, New York.

Every Man his Own Printer!

By the introduction of the Cottage Printing Press, every merchant and professional man is enabled to have a printing office of his own, doing the work in a style equal to that of a practical printer, and at a vast saving in the expense. In connection with the Cottage Press, we put up an assortment of plain and fancy type, adapted to the printing of Handbills, Billheads, Circulars, Labels, Cards, &c., Type Cases, Ink, Chases, and other printing materials, in a neat and compact form, together with printed instructions for managing the press, setting type, &c.

	Prices.
Printing Office No. 2, press prints 5x 8 inches,	$25 00
" " 3, " " 7x10 "	40 00
" " 4, " " 12x18 "	60 00

ADAMS PRESS COMPANY,
31 Park Row and 117 Fulton Street, New York.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices,
Made to Measure at $18 per doz.
OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS,
MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2 50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $3 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

20 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 14½ c. per yd.	$4 35
7 yards of fine Linen, at 80c. per yard	5 60
Making and cutting	6 00
Laundry, 84; buttons and cotton, 50c.	1 34
Profit	2 65
Total	$18 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These rules are so simple as to understand that anyone can take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

AGENTS.—THE STORM INSURANCE, or 25 cent Pocket Key, greatest and most reliable novelty out. Sample 20 cents. Address Hubbard Bros., 63 Nassau St., N. Y.

Cassell's Illustrated Family Bible.

The THIRD Volume, which completes the OLD TESTAMENT,
is now ready. Price of each volume $2 00 Plain Cloth; $3 00 Beveled, Gilt Edges.
Single Parts 15 cents each. Free by mail. Back Numbers always for sale
CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN, 37 Park Row, New York.

1000 Agents always Wanted.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 256.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE WAR IN MISSOURI.—GENERAL JIM LANE'S CAMP, NEAR HUMANSVILLE, MISSOURI.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT ON OCTOBER 20, 1861.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

GEN. LANE AND HIS ARMY.

OUR artist with the army in Missouri, Mr. Alexander Simplot, lately visited the Camp of General Jim Lane, the famous Kansas General, the terror of Missouri, and has sent us the sketches which we reproduce on the preceding page. The correspondent of the New York Times, who accompanied him, thus describes the General, the Indian Scouts, and the Camp:

LANE is a man of some fifty years of age, of medium height, and of that slight rather compressible build of figure so slight, his head wide at the top and narrowing down to the jaw, that an inverted pyramid is how wide and high; his eyes small, black, and overhung by cliff-like eyebrows; his mouth somewhat, and, combined with a gleam of fun in his eyes, has an expression of great good-humour and enjoyment that what one irresistibly to the conclusion that he is the best fellow in the world. His hair is thin, slightly tinged with grey, and shaved away from his head in every direction, so if he had just come in from running breakneck against a strong wind. Its conservation he is ready, full of a rollicking sort of humor; and, in short, in his whole style of conversation, he reminded me of some Joe Bagstock New Rolling and laughing over this bursting of some Minerotten Rome.

Proceeding a few hundred yards below Lane's encampment, I came upon another of a different character. Flags flew blazed up, throwing great flashes of light upon the brown autumn woods, and making a play-ground for fantastic shadows across the prairie and the woodland, around which lay in supreme indolence, or sat comfortably inhaling the fragrant weed, a motley crowd of aborigines. I soon had the honor of shaking by the hand a copper-colored gentleman, who, stretched upon his right side before the genial fire, was inhaling tobacco-smoke through the bowls of his tomahawk, and who replied to me in the very choicest of Wa-no-pach-kugh. He replied to my "Good-morning, Sir," glad and happy to make your acquaintance," with a guttural "Ugh!" and the Indian salutation "How." After addressing a few remarks to him, he which he answered with perfected attention. I found that he did not know a word of English, and turned my attention to the braves. I next had the honor of an introduction to a gentleman in unbuttoned black, with a frill of grey hair, from which hovered upward a dozen peacock and goose feathers, who, I was informed, was John Conner, Esquire, chief of the Delawares. Mr. Conners indulged in a slight knowledge of English, and, after the usual commonplaces, I left him, and was presented to a little, good-looking young fellow in elfinere dress, who, I was informed, was Mr. Blackbird Conner, interpreter of the Delaware braves. John Johnny-cake, Esq., is said to be a young gentleman of great intelligence and modesty, and who spoke most excellently both English and French, and I regret to learn also other Indian vernacular.

He informed me that Wa-no-pach-kugh was war-chief of the Delawares; that there were 54 of his tribe in the field; that they were armed with tomahawks, scalping-knives, and rifles; that their principal business was scouting; and that about 30 of the 54 were head and good horses, and had accompanied General Frémont once before in search of the enemy across the plains and over the mountains. Mr. Johnnycake (whose Indian name I did not learn) added that a much larger force from his tribe would soon take the field, and that delegations from various other Indian tribes in Kansas would soon unite their arms and lives with the Union cause.

GENERAL HUNTER.

COMMANDING OUR ARMY IN MISSOURI.

WE publish on page 741 a portrait of GENERAL HUNTER, who has succeeded General Frémont in the command of our army in Missouri. General Hunter is about sixty years of age. He graduated at West Point in 1822, the twenty-first in a class numbering forty, and was appointed Second Lieutenant in infantry. Having risen to a First Lieutenancy, he was in 1833 made Captain of cavalry, but shortly after resigned. In 1842 he rejoined the army as Paymaster, in which position, with the rank of Major, the present Administration found him. He accompanied Mr. Lincoln from Springfield, on his tour to Washington, as far as Buffalo, where, owing to the pressure of the crowd, he suffered a dislocation of the collar-bone. Shortly after he was made Colonel of the Third Cavalry, and then Brigadier-General. He commanded a leading division at the battle of Bull Run, but was wounded early in the day.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1861.

THE STARS AND STRIPES IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

AT length we have the pleasure to report that the Stars and Stripes float once more over the disloyal soil of South Carolina. Though we are without direct or authentic intelligence from the fleet, the reports which reach us through hostile channels agree too well to be the result of fraud or mere baseless rumor. There is no reason to doubt that at this time General Sherman is in possession of the town of Beaufort, South Carolina, and of the forts which guarded the entrance to Port Royal Inlet.

It will be time enough to discuss the important considerations suggested by this event when the full report of the affair reaches us. Meanwhile three thoughts force themselves on the mind:

It was known at New Orleans as long ago as 17th October, long before the Northern public knew any thing about the expedition, that it was destined for Port Royal, and that it would consist of the vessels which actually sailed. The first authentic statement of the destination of the fleet was contained in a Richmond paper published about the end of October. The rebels were therefore thoroughly warned and prepared. If our expedition was nevertheless successful, what can the rebels expect hereafter?

The occupation of Port Royal will test the amount of Union feeling which lingers at the South; will verify the statement that the planters will not ship cotton; and, finally, will teach the rebels the practical danger which they court by making war upon the North wh e holding 4,000,000 slaves.

Lastly, the occupation of Beaufort is the first step toward a geographical redistribution of population, trade, and industry in the Southern country. The Government of Messr ns. Jinquish Beaufort. It will be an open port and a place of trade and activity long before the seals are loosed from the harbors of Savannah and Charleston. People will fly to Beaufort from the two latter cities, which will decay and die out just as the cities of ancient Chaldea have perished—a memorable monument of the cost and folly of treason.

ABOLITIONISTS AT THE SOUTH

MR. MEMMINGER, Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Jefferson Davis, advises the Southern planters to abandon the culture of cotton, and to devote their land to the production of food. Similar advice is urged upon them by the leading journals of New Orleans, New Orleans, and Memphis. It is very justly argued that, pending the blockade, cotton will be useless, while corn, wheat, and pork will be inestimable.

Such sensible counsel the planters can not well disregard. They have on hand at present nearly three million bales of cotton, much of which can only be sent abroad to market for want of bagging, and none of which can be sold at a price which would pay the planter for growing it. It would rejar great folly on their part to increase their stock under such circumstances.

This diversion of land and labor, however, from the culture of cotton to that of cereals must produce a great change in the whole Southern mind on the questions which have led to the pending rebellion.

Negro Slavery in our Southern States depends directly on the production of cotton. It does not pay to raise any thing but cotton with slave labor. Wherever cotton is not raised slavery can not be maintained for the profitable purpose of supplying the cotton-fields with fresh hands. Experience has shown that this is a mere question of figures. The price of slaves at the South depends upon the price of cotton. It is usual to say that male field-lands are worth one hundred dollars for every cent the pound of middling uplands commands. When middling negro lands is worth ten cents—as was the average last year—good field-hands could not be bought for less than $1200. If middling uplands fell to six cents, good field-hands could be bought for $600. If middling uplands could not be sold at all, there would be no market for slaves. This is precisely the condition of affairs at the South at present.

Its political significance arises from the fact that, when the price of slaves falls below a certain point it ceases to be a gain, and becomes a loss, to be a slave-owner. When, thirty years ago, male adult slaves fell to $400 in Virginia, the leading men of that State became emancipationists, and slavery would have been abolished if the decline of prices had continued at the far South had not suddenly created a demand for negro labor, and caused the price of slaves to advance one hundred per cent. in a few years.

The blockade is now producing precisely, over the whole revolted section, the state of things which existed in Virginia in 1830. There is no market for cotton, and consequently none for slaves. It is becoming a burden to be a slaveowner. Instead of rating men's wealth by the number of their slaves, as usual hitherto, Southern society will estimate those possessing the richest who have the fewest slaves to support in these trying times. And the estimate will be sound. If the North only persevere in its purpose for a year or two, no Southern man will be found at the end of that time rich enough to own slaves. The system will break down of its own weight. The planters will pray for the abolition of slavery as the only means of rescuing the richest who have the fewest slaves from starvation.

Growing corn and wheat with slave labor is like manuring the earth with gold de fole grras. The harvest will be fine, no doubt; but every ear of corn will cost its weight in gold.[1] Mr. Memminger is the most radical abolitionist of the day.

[1] Mr. Memminger is the most radical abolitionist of the day.

THE LOUNGER.

GENERAL FREMONT.

THE right of the President and Commander-in-Chief to remove any subordinate officer is unquestionable. The officer so removed, when he is persuaded of the dishonesty or incompetency of any such officer, is equally clear. Obedience is the indispensable point of discipline, and discipline is essential to military success.

While therefore, every loyal citizen will acquiesce in the removal of General Frémont from the Western Department, every thoughtful man in the country can not but consider the moment chosen for his removal most unfortunate. If a battle once followed the fall of Lexington, it would have been received in silence: with regret, indeed, for a noble man who was thought inadequate to a peculiar peril, but without any general impression of undue harshness.

But two months have essentially changed the aspect of affairs in Missouri. From the moment the General left St. Louis his course has been onward. Lexington was retaken, and to-day there is in ours once more. Operations which military men pronounced impossible have been quietly accomplished by Frémont. He has crossed rivers safely. His has moved a large army without apparent means. His body-Guard, which is simply the name for a picked body of men, like Scott's Body-Guard in Mexico, has achieved a brilliant victory, due alike to military skill and to personal courage. With his army flushed with conscious power, and devoted to him with that enthusiasm which incites honorable success; with the enemy before him, and an attack momently expected, the General in whom he was to lead it—has been superseded during the last few weeks had silenced even slander—who, for some reason, had been selected as the scape-goat for complaints and discontents—is summarily removed.

He does what every faithful soldier and patriot should do. He receives the order, obeys the command; addresses a few earnest words of satisfaction and sympathy, of encouragement, and of patriotic appeal to his soldiers, who, dismayed and indignant, threaten insubordination, remonstrate, at the request of the officers, to lead the army about the battle he offered that night; then returns with the same manly simplicity which has marked every act of his life.

For the honor of the country and for his own honor, General Frémont will, of course, at the proper time, demand a Court of Inquiry. And the honor of all good citizens is involved. Are charges of incompetency to be lightly entertained in support, of which the obvious tendency, if not intention, is to ruin the military character of a general, and to destroy the value of his services, unless there is a want of public confidence, to come to the newspapers? In regular course from the War Department with authority to go to the country. Letters any authorized statement of the removal of the General has been made? The authorization by the War Department of the publication of the ex parte memoranda of General Thomas against General Frémont is a more flagrant dereliction of duty than any of those measures of charge against the General. And if such statements, so many of which have been already shown to be erroneous, have been the grounds of removal, is the Commander-in-Chief of Western Department, how many such brazches of good faith with our soldiers are necessary to furnish adequate grounds for the removal of the Secretary of War?

The nation, which confides implicitly in the honesty and intelligence and purpose of the President, will acquiesce in his action in this case. But it has a vital interest in knowing why a leader of its armies so dear to the people, should, from whose path the mists of doubt were rolling away, and who stood with all the prestige of triumph before a dispirited and retreating enemy, was disgraced upon the very eve of battle. It is a just curiosity which nothing but the revelations of a Court of Inquiry can satisfy.

REUTER'S TELEGRAMS AND MASON'S COMMISSION.

THE telegraph for American news in England is in the hands of Messrs. Reuter and Havas, and Reuter serves up precisely such news from America as England desires. His bulletins are the unfiltered essence of the Governmental journals of the United States. Rebellion flashes rosy along his wires. The inevitable consequence is that the English have an impression of our condition is constantly conveyed.

One of his latest performances was the announcement that "Colonel Mansfield of the Army was surprised by General Mansfield at Fort Monroe. This is the all-important fact which commandes the entrance to the port of Pensacola, and which the Federalists have held so long."

This is the kind of news which is read by those who have the ear of the masses. And, as it has favorable change of sentiment, even in the newspapers, is very marked. There is, however, one thing to be borne in mind in all English discussions of our affairs; and that is, that they are made matters of party argument. Of course, the present condition of the country is held by Tories to be "a settler" of what Major Beresford calls "the horrible reform mania." Let us do the Major the justice to say that he has been most strict neutral.

In fact, those who are clamorous for open interference by England are too few to be noticed. The large and busy class of the rabble—that of foreign—is withering away. When Mr. Mason, the author of the Fugitive Slave bill, distinguishes in the streets of London, and is held by Tories to be a " glad; I didn't know your honor. But, ——, if I'd known it was you I'd have saved you all the same." This is the true soldier's spirit. Lastly, I would impress on the volunteers the necessity of drill, practice, exercise, brigade movements. Garibaldi's volunteers did excellently in guerrilla movements; they failed before a fourth-rate regular army. Our brave volunteers will never know what real war is: but they must make themselves a reputation to be feared by the enemy, in order not to lose enemy ever at their own hearth-stones.

"FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE."

WAR SONGS AND HYMNS.

The debate upon National Hymns being in order, the blogger has received this suggestive word from Barbarossa:

"Why is it that these songs (the "Marseillais," "Mourir pour la Patrie," or "Rule Britannia") have the power to fire a man's heart, brace his nerves, and make the timid courageous? Why can not "The Star-Spangled Banner," or "Hail Columbia," or "Yankee Doodle," or "God save the King," do it as well? Simply because the latter are only assortions of known facts and pious wishes, while the former, in words and music, contain a determination to act, to go ahead. And this is my opinion—the time we need most at present. Hymns will do after the battle is over, but while it lasts.

"After the battle of Leuthen, a few of the victorious Prussian soldiers erected a solemn hymn, in which every one who sung joined, and the dogs, fell mates brought tears to the eyes of Frederick the Great; but had it been sung before the battle, it is questionable whether it would have brought tears to Frederick's eyes or victory to his army."

ONE VICTORY.

THERE is one unexpected but most beneficent result of the war. It is gradually leading us all to discuss the question with good feeling and in good temper. Of course we all know, and say in perfectly good faith, that the war is solely for the supremacy of the Government. But we all know equally well that it must affect slavery somehow. It must help hurt it.

In truth, the question is now passing from its first stage into the second; from the eloquent appeal necessary to arouse the people to the calm consideration necessary to secure them. We all want peace—permanent peace—peace with honor. We shall therefore gravely consider this question. Whoever tries to shirk it is justly open to suspicion. He may have an unappeasable prejudice against the name Abolitionist. But this is a time, and the inevitable future is a time, in which we must "conquer our prejudices," as Mr. Webster said, upon quite another occasion. We must discuss our own and our prejudices. We must secure the national tranquility.

We shall all readily admit that it is a delicate question—a difficult question in some respects, and if not justly settled, a very dangerous question. For these reasons it will be most frankly discussed. Whatever in a time of peace can not be discussed in this country can not be honorably tolerated. The Tariff is a grave question; the Bank was a grave question; the old points of Federal and Republican difference were grave questions; and if discussion of them had been suppressed, as of late years the discussion of slavery has been, they would have brought us to war. Free talk is our only talisman of national safety. And until the mind and conscience of the people can be stopped, of what use is it to try to stop their mouths?

Or again, is the most vital of all our public questions the one we may most safely shirk? Is it not clear that if we had not hitherto so strenuously tried to avoid it, if there had not been an amusing if inconsistent effort made to appropriate the word "national" to the interests of a single class in one section of the country, we should have talked by the war and into a permanent peace? For the Government of this nation to publish opinion. The only way by which the policy of the Government can be directly fairly discussed. When disloyalty is fairly persuaded that opinion, it will lawfully indicate the change. That is all that any voter, however great or humble, has. And the voters are the great mass of the people. Those who are technically known as Abolitionists are, upon principle, non-voters, believing with unquestionable sincerity that the Constitution is fatal to human rights.

If you read the debates in the Constitutional Convention, in the first Congress, and in the first administration of Missouri, and in 1833 at the commencement of the moral anti-slavery appeal, and indeed the whole history of the country for sixty years, does it not seem incredible that a subject whose mere mention was so frantically exciting was not felt to be the very one which common candor could not be safely omitted for a day? If there is a spot in your body so morbidly sensitive that the least touch causes you to bind your head with a cloth, you must not be looked at, or is that the very one which the wise surgeon will thoroughly examine, even though he may have to bind you to that he may cut?

Taught by experience and common sense we shall no longer insist upon making the ostrich our symbol for discussing and hiding his head in the sand. Henceforth it shall be the eagle, in fact as well as in name, soaring heavenward and gazing at the sun.

OUR SOLDIERS.

"ABRAHAM HEAVEY" writes to the Lounger a very clever and very sarcastic letter from Washington upon the late heroic but hapless battle at Ball's Bluff. At the close he says:

"I trust, my dear Lounger, you would set me right, for brother Ben is a Republican, and won't listen to my arguments; saying that civilians don't prate, I suppose, is what he means—as we have no opinion whatever about military affairs, unless they tether to the militia or are amateurs."

Let us spare our sarcasm, Abraham, in the presence of heroism, unhappy though the result was. Perhaps those who were to blame exploited the error by dying on the field. The bitterness of feeling which bursts out in sarcasm is natural. But let us rather ponder with secret pride this extract from General Stone's report of the battle. Upon the retreat "the smaller boats had disappeared, no one knew whither. The largest boat, rapidly and too heavily laden, swamped some fifteen feet from the shore, and nothing was left to the gallant soldiers but to swim, surrender, or die. With a devotion worthy of the cause they are serving, officers and men, while quarter was being offered to such as would lay down their arms, stripped themselves of their swords and muskets and hurled them out into the river to prevent their falling into the hands of the foe, and saved themselves as they could by swimming, floating on logs, and concealing themselves in bushes and forests to make their way up and down the river, back to the point of crossing. The instances of personal gallantry of the highest order were so many that it would be unjust now to detail particular cases. Officers displayed for their men, and men for their officers, that beautiful devotion which is only to be found among true soldiers."

OUR BATTLE-CRY.

THERE is some justice in the complaint that we have no inspiring war-cry. The rebels shout for independence. They cry out against invasion. They declare their homes and shrines and property in danger. They will fight, can you oppose them? Our cry of "Constitution" to that of "Home?" How can you kindle enthusiasm by demanding the enforcement of the laws? What, even, is the cry of "Union," when mistaken men thrill their own hearts and their neighbors' by appeals for wife and child, although it is they who are the assailants?

If we are a nation—and, if not, what are we fighting for?—if we are a great people, with a collective individuality, the cry which will command is the word of all victorious patriotic enthusiasm flame upon our lips as it burns in our hearts. When the very air is electric with the sense of near charging line, it is a burst of music in which each soldier's heart hears separate strains. Wife, parent, child; their peaceful home; the old and sacred shrines of prayer; the glory of the Past, the promise of the Future; the hopes of Humanity given to our keeping; the fair fame of Freedom; the peace and prosperity, of justice and liberties;—for these they fight, for these they fall, whose bubbling cry of Death or Victory is the honor of their country.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A RUSH OF ROBALS.—Amidst the mob of monarchs that have lately been trying to find a precipice which to society, we think there is one king whom of all others the stop to plunge is the King of Naples and Two Sicilies this year, and certainly his presence would be the most welcomed by the unanimous Press in England—for that is KING COTTON, from America.

DIFFERENCE OF TASTES.—In taking a new house the first thought of the woman is, where shall the piano be? Of the man, where shall the bar be established?

SPECIMEN OF A SCHOOL EXAMINATION.

SCHOOLMASTER. "What do you call the Cotton-Tree?"
PATRIOTIC PUPIL. "A branch of Treason."
SCHOOLMASTER. "What is Slavery?"
PATRIOTIC PUPIL. "Slavery."
SCHOOLMASTER. "What is to be sold like?"
PATRIOTIC PUPIL. "Sedition."

(The Pupil is plainly sent to bed, and presented with a hundred-blanket bonne-bouche by way of prize.)

We see there is advertised a "Rotary Umbrella." This may be useful in the event of losing one's property, for there may be a circumbendibus chance then of its coming round again to its original owner.

SOME FRIENDS ARE NEVER SATISFIED.—A poor simpleton was complaining to a friend that a present that he had lost through a friend, when the companion, into whose sympathetic ears he was pouring his grief, replied, "Why still retained his friend? Upon being answered in the affirmative, the friend exclaimed, "Then you must be content, my dear fellow; you can't expect to have both your money and your friend!"

HUMORS OF THE WAR.

One evening last week Secretary Cameron was at the —— Club in New York, and was conversing with some members on the subject of Colonel Ellsworth. Another Secretary, "that Stone should have acted thus: his appointment was urged on the Government by very leading men in New York."

"I never recommended it," instantly replied Mr. M——, of the —— Bank.

"Nor I," stated Mr. V——, of the ——.

"Nor I," said another.

"Oh! somebody must have recommended it," blandly retorted the Secretary. "I remember the names perfectly, for they were the same as I noticed on the petitions I received about my appointment."

The mention in the —— Club can be imagined.

Why can not the rebels ever dress well?—Because they've proved, by deserting their flag, that they have no duty for the clothes to cover.

One of the Massachusetts prisoners taken at Bull's Bluff was being "chaffed" by his captors at Richmond. "Say, Yankee," said one, "what do you think your sunny regiment has Massachusetts in the fields?"

"Bull thirty or forty," was the reply.

"Reckon she won't send any more," said the Southerner.

"Massachusetts will be in the field as long as the sun rises up, "still send a regiment a day so long as the war lasts, and it shall work do' and do' for you."

THE BEST JOKE OF THE SEASON.—The New England woolen manufacturers protesting that our troops had better go half clad rather than that any woolen cloths should be bought outside of their shop.

Why do we know that the Union would be preserved? Because it is a patch-y nation.

The late Mr. John Jones being asked by a friend "how he kept himself from being involved in quarrels?" replied, "By letting the angry person have all the quarrel to himself."

A man with a large family was complaining of the difficulty of supporting all them. "Ah!" said a friend, "you have some pig enough to earn something for you now." "The difficulty is," said the man, "they are too big to work."

"Mamma," said little Nell, "might governess to fig me for what I've not done?" "Why, my child, what do you mean?" "Cause she fogged me to-day when I didn't do my sum."

At the Newcastle bazar a gentleman lingered for some time at one of the stalls, which was attended by a very handsome young lady. "The charge of your inspection of my wares," said the fair dealer, "is half-a-crown, Sir." "I was admiring your beauty, ma'am, and not your goods," replied the gallant. "That's five shillings," responded the lady with great readiness; and no demand, perhaps, was ever more cheerfully complied with.

THE BATTLE OF LIFE.—Courtship is the engagement or skirmish; the proposal is the assault; and matrimony the victory.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Ever eating, ever eloying,
All-devouring, all-destroying,
Never finding full repast,
Till it eats the world at last.

Fire.

Why is cold cream like a good chaperon?
Because it keeps off the chaps.

What fish could be called in church without shocking the congregation?
John Dorse and Ann Chovie (John Dory and Anchovy).

When was B the first letter of the alphabet?
In the days of Noah (A) and (Ark).

Why are doctors' prescriptions good things to feed pigs on?
Because there are grains in them.

No rose can boast a livelier hue
Than I can when my birth is near,
Of shorter life than that sweet flower,
I bloom and fade in one short hour;
Like Marplot, eager to reveal
The secret I would fain conceal,
A blush.

Why is a fen like a railway-engine?
Because it mouses over ditches.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE GREAT EXPEDITION.

At the hour of going to press we are still without news direct from the Great Expedition. Enough dribbles continue to reach us through the telegraph to be enough to indicate the success of the enterprise. Intelligence has been received by way of Hatteras Inlet, brought by Fortress Monroe by the steamer Spaulding, and by way of Cairo, through Memphis papers received there.

A person has arrived at the Inlet from the main land in a small boat, and communicated the information that two forts at Port Royal entrance had been taken; that a large National force had been landed; that Beaufort had been occupied; that Fort Pulaski, down had been bombarded and that our troops had advanced and taken possession of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad, and were marching on Coosahatchie—capturing a large quantity of stores. No doubt can be felt that Beaufort is one of the best harbors of the South, and that the capture of Pulaski and the occupation of the railroads mentioned to be most valuable.

Deserters from the rebels, who have reached Newport News from Yorktown, state that the utmost consternation exists in the rebel army, and that a number of regiments have refused to march to the front, and are hooted to the bogus Confederacy. The Memphis papers received at Cairo complain bitterly of the Secession fully confirming the loading of our forces and the capture of three forts—this is the first intimation we have had of the capture of the rebels—at Fort Royal, Hilton Head, and Bay Point. The statement that the National troops had possession of the town of Beaufort is also confirmed, and the losses of the rebels are admitted to be heavy.

THE BLOCKADE AND OUR VESSELS.

The report of the wreck of the steamer Union is confirmed by the gun-boat Albatross, which has arrived at Hampton Roads from the blockade on the North Carolina coast. She went ashore on the 6th inst., about eight miles to the south of Cape Hatteras. The crew of the Union and Scott is said to have been in company with her, and it is conjectured that they were also on board. This has been by no certainty about it. The rumor of the loss of the steamer Ocean Express is also confirmed.

GREAT VICTORY IN KENTUCKY.

It appears that a body of Union troops, under General Nelson, who are stationed in the interior of the United States Navy, fell in with the rebels at Pikeville, Pike County, on the 8th inst., and after a severe contest of four hours defeated them. While he was approaching them, Colonel Luke Moore, with 300 rebels, attacked a camp of Union men, at Prestonburg, with 600 men at the Second Ohio Regiment, met Harris, with 600 men of the Second Ohio Regiment, met Harris, with 600 men, and after a brief struggle put them directly in the midst of Nelson's brigade: then pressing in on all sides, the Union troops had the victory at their mercy. The fight is said to have lasted two days, and resulted in the total annihilation of the rebels. Four hundred of them were killed and two thousand taken prisoners, including the whole staff of Humphrey Marshall. Williams and Hawes, both of them formerly United States officers.

UNION MOVEMENT IN TENNESSEE.

The Union men in East Tennessee are giving vigorous evidence of their loyalty. By a dispatch from Fortress Monroe we learn that they have burned and destroyed several railroad bridges and telegraph lines on the East Tennessee Railroad, thereby causing transportation of rebel troops. Four bridges on the line north of Knoxville have been demolished, and another at Charleston, Tennessee.

THE BATTLE OF SANTA ROSA ISLAND.

It is reported by a letter received on 13th, in Washington, from Lieut. Com. Porter, of the Niagara Sentee, off Galveston, the 25th ultimo, that the privateer Sumter had been captured by the boat-howitzer of the Niagara. The privateer vessel, and had approached too close when she discovered her error. The gun-boat, however, turned upon the privateer, and in a short time captured her officers and crew prisoners. They were subsequently transferred to the Niagara.

FIGHT AT GUYANDOTTE.

On Sunday night, 3d inst., at Guyandotte, Virginia, situated on the Ohio River, was attacked by six hundred rebels, who were driven off by the National troops stationed there, all but fifty were killed or taken prisoners. The rebel force afterward beat a hasty retreat, and nothing has been heard from them. The loss on the side of the Union troops has been sent in pursuit. Our troops afterward fired the town of Guyandotte, which was entirely destroyed.

AFFAIRS ON THE POTOMAC.

A reconnoissance was, on Sunday, made to Pascoe's Hill, in front of Washington, and the rebels and their forces of the rebels were found, not one was seen. The pickets at Falls Church were driven in, and the mouth of the Accotink, up the Accotink Ridge, ten miles in front of Fort Lyon. The rebels fled in all directions, leaving their camps within the National lines. Affairs appear to be unchanged along the Upper Potomac and Harper's Ferry.

RECONNOISSANCE UP THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

The United States gun-boat Reserve, on Thursday last, left Fortress Monroe and proceeded up the Rappahannock River as far as Urbana Creek, off the mouth of which she encountered a large number of rebels. Boats and munitions of war were removed, and the vessel then burned. Returning down the river, a masked battery was opened, but the battery was completely silenced, and subsequently every place along the river, which was supposed to harbor rebels, was shelled.

AFFAIRS AT NEW ORLEANS.

A letter in the New Orleans Delta from the United States steamer Cuyler, on blockade duty at the mouth of the Mississippi, gives interesting information of the state of affairs in the City of New Orleans. The ruin of the South is the universal view. A specie currency is the almost complete. The levee, formerly so busy with the traffic of the Mississippi, is the deserted scene of desolation. Many of the stores have been closed, and there is no other employment than that of soldiering. Corn has at the city mart for sale, and that is scarce, poor, and dear; flour is sold at eighteen dollars per barrel, and sweet potatoes fourteen dollars per barrel, and sweet potatoes about the same. A free market for the poor was established some time ago, the supplies being furnished by voluntary contributions from the farmers; but there was a prospect that it would soon be closed for want of means. There is undoubtedly a strong Union element in the population, which only awaits a properly opportunity to exhibit itself.

THE REMOVAL OF FREMONT.

On 3d November General Fremont received an unconditional order from Washington, relieving him at once from his command. The intelligence spread like wild-fire through the camps, and created indescribable excitement. General Fremont spent much of the time expostulating with the officers and men, urging them by their patriotism and their personal regard for him to abandon their posts. He also issued the following address to the troops:

HEAD-QUARTERS, WESTERN DEPARTMENT,
SPRINGFIELD, MO., Nov. 3, 1861.

SOLDIERS OF THE MISSISSIPPI ARMY!—Agreeably to orders received this day I take leave of you. A hostile army has been of sudden growth, we have grown up together, and I know the peculiar wile of its brave and generous spirits which you bring to the defense of your country, and which makes me anticipate for you a brilliant career. Continue as you have begun, and give to my successor the same cordial and enthusiastic support which you have encouraged me. Emulate the splendid example which you have already before you, and let me remain, as I am, proud of the noble army which I have been for a short time honored to lead.

Soldiers! I regret to leave you. Most sincerely I thank you for the regard and confidence you have invariably shown me. Indeed I feel sorry to leave you before the war is over, and before the victory which you are just about to win; but I shall claim the right to share with you in the joy of every triumph, and trust always to be personally remembered by you. JOHN C. FREMONT.

Major-General.

On 5th General Hunter issued his first address to headquarters at Springfield, announcing his assumption of the command of the army, and reviewing the movements of the divisions and brigades to report to him at once.

General Fremont left the day before for St. Louis with his body-guard.

THE BATTLE OF BELMONT.

There was a battle at Belmont, Missouri, opposite Columbus, on 7th. An expedition numbering about 3200 men, and including the Twenty-seventh Illinois regiment, Colonel Smith, and Thirty-first Illinois Regiments, the Seventh Iowa Regiment, Taylor's Chicago Artillery, Dollman's and Delano's Cavalry, proceeded down the river on steamboats, accompanied by the gun-boats Tyler and Lexington. It landed on Thursday morning, and made the attack on the rebels, three thousand strong. About 11 o'clock the engagement strongly interested, and being so much superior in numbers, made a strong movement to flank us. We were driven out of their camp, which was destroyed, and their battery, consisting of twelve pieces, was captured, and all the guns being brought away. Their camp and baggage were destroyed, their tents were struck and burned. Quite a large number of them were taken prisoners. The object of the expedition having been accomplished, the National forces were retiring to their boats when they were attacked reinforcements from Columbus, on the opposite side of the river, and were compelled to fight their way to places, which continued until our forces were all withdrawn. The loss in killed on the rebel side must be very large indeed. How much the rebels suffered in this respect is not known with certainty, but the number is estimated at 1500. We, in killed, wounded, and missing, are estimated at three to five hundred—probably the latter number. The expedition was commanded by Generals Grant and McClernand.

STATE ELECTIONS.

The New York Municipal Election took place on 5th, and resulted in the success of the People's Union ticket. The vote in the city was not passed off quietly, and the vote is probably about one-half what it was last year.

The Massachusetts election for Governor took place on 5th, resulted in the re-election of Governor Andrew, and a strong Republican Legislature. The vote throughout the State was remarkably small—probably not more than one-half of the full vote.

The Maryland State Election took place on 6th, and resulted in the overwhelming triumph of the Union party.

THE NEW STATE OF KANAWHA.

The ordinance for dividing the old Commonwealth of Virginia, and forming a new State out of the western part of the Alleghany mountains, has been adopted by the voters by a majority of 18,408 votes. It now goes before Congress, and a new Convention, the members of which have just been chosen, will assemble at Wheeling on 26th inst., to ratify the action of the people. The new State will be called Kanawha, and will contain a population of two hundred and eighty-two thousand, and will elect eight thousand slaves.

THE STORM AT HATTERAS.

The storm of 1st November at Hatteras Inlet was very severe, and the recent high tides and northeast gales flowed the space outside the fort; and, as a new channel is forming between the fort, it is apprehended that they may wash away the fort entirely, and render the position of the Twentieth Indiana regiment had been landed from the U. S. Spaulding and the steamer Adelaide, and were met with tremendous severity, and it was washed away, together with many of the tents.

Colonel Hawkins, who commands at Hatteras, arrived in Washington on Sunday, and reported the nature of affair protecting their position from such heavy gales as had at Friday and Saturday, and proceeded to Fortress Monroe. It appears that, in addition to the destruction of Government property, the encampment of portion of the Twentieth Indiana regiment were drowned in the breakers during the storm.

It is decided to strengthen the garrison at Hatteras.

PERSONAL.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette states that Mr. Brockinridge has received the reward for his services in the shape of a commission as Major-General, and that he is now in the rebel army at Bowling Green.

Mr. KOSSUTH, the Hungarian, the ex-Governor and ex-member of Parliament, of England, has been admitted to practice in the United States Supreme Court.

Colonel Mulligan, who was captured by the rebels at Lexington, Missouri, was in Richmond on 7th inst.

Major Doubleday, of Fort Sumter fame, is now an assistant of Brigadier-General Casey, in the Provisional Army of the Potomac, and is in charge of the artillery brigade of the Reserve on the Virginia side of the Potomac.

The foundation for the rumor that Beauregard had resigned his command in the rebel army may perhaps be found in the fact that he has been appointed to Charleston, in view of the possibility of an attempt to capture that place by the national forces.

General Tom Thumb, who is at present making the tour of the Canadas, had a narrow escape from serious injury at St. Catherines on the 4th inst. The carriage in which he was going from his hotel to the railway station capsized in consequence of the axle breaking, and the General was thrown out. Several of his suite were severely injured, but he received only slight bruises.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE BLOCKADE NOT TO BE INTERFERED WITH.

A correspondence has been taken place between the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs and a Mr. Hayman, a prominent merchant of Liverpool, on the subject of the blockade. The mercantile interlocutor represents himself as one of a number of persons who are anxious to trade to the Southern ports; and desires to know what protection they are to receive from British Government in running a blockade they regard as illegal. Earl Russell assures him they will receive no protection whatever; that they will be violating obvious principles of international law, and that the British Government will certainly have them to suffer all the penalties of their offence.

FRANCE.

PRINCE NAPOLEON FOR THE UNION.

Unofficial communications from loyal citizens of the United States, residing in Paris and London, say that in Paris, and in the provinces of all France, and declared that the insurrection can not prevail, and other letters say that secession is out of fashion, if not unpopular in France.

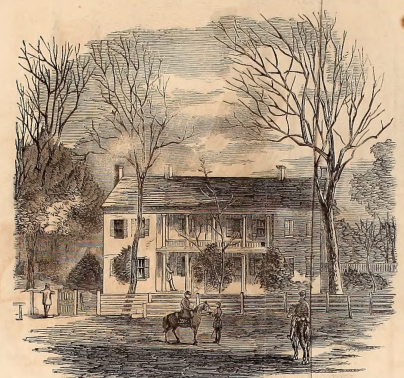
CAPTURE OF A REBEL PICKET NEAR SHREVE'S FARM, VIRGINIA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 747.]

DEPARTURE OF TROOPS FOR PORT TOBACCO.

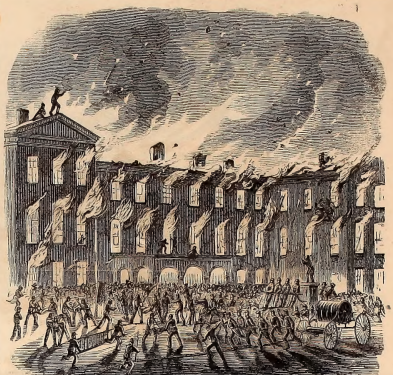
OUR special artist with the army of the Potomac happened the other day to be present at one of the mysterious movements which are taking place daily in General M'Clellan's army; viz., the departure of reinforcements for General Sickles's Brigade at Port Tobacco on Sunday morning, November 3. He sketched the scene, and we reproduce it on this page. The troops represented are the New Hampshire Fifth, the Rhode Island Fourth, and the Pennsylvania Forty-fifth. They had previously been encamped at Camp Union, near Bladensburg. They are a fine body of men, and will doubtless do good service on the Lower Potomac when the right time comes.

We are assuming the offensive on the Lower Potomac, and have heavy batteries erected in positions which command the rebel batteries. These troops are sent down to support the gunners, and perhaps when the right time comes they may pay Aquia Creek a visit one of these days. The river is now thoroughly commanded by our batteries.

DEPARTURE OF TROOPS FROM CAMP UNION, AT BLADENSBURG, MARYLAND, TO JOIN SICKLES'S BRIGADE AT PORT TOBACCO, NOV. 3.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]



HEAD-QUARTERS AT CAMP DICK ROBINSON, NEAR BRYANTSVILLE, KENTUCKY.
[SKETCHED BY MR. ALFRED E. MATTHEWS.]



BURNING OF THE GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL IN E STREET, WASHINGTON, NOVEMBER 4—RESCUE OF THE SICK AND WOUNDED.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

THE WAR IN KENTUCKY.

WE publish on this page two illustrations of the WAR IN KENTUCKY, from sketches sent us by Mr. Alfred E. Matthews. He writes as follows:

CAMP DICK ROBINSON, KENTUCKY, Nov. 1, 1861.

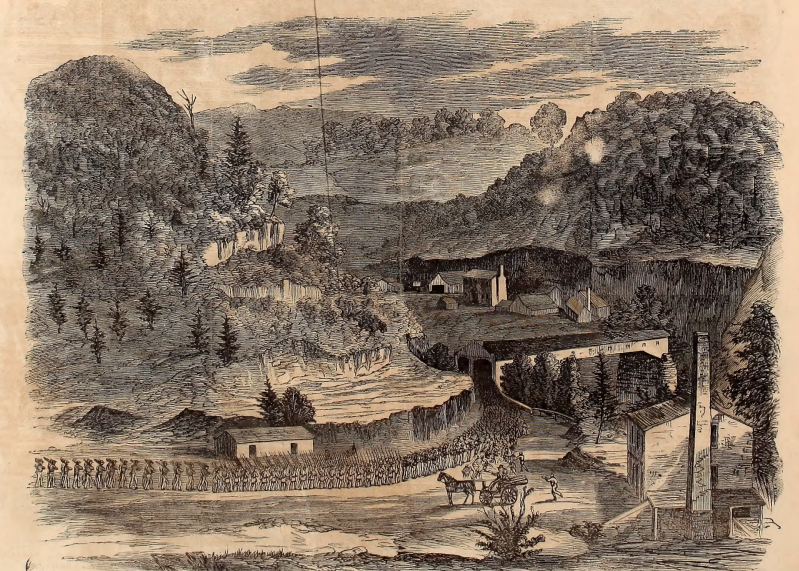
Herewith I send you two sketches of the campaign in Kentucky. One represents the Ohio Thirty-first Regiment crossing the Kentucky River at Boone's Knob. Additional interest is given to this locality from the fact that it is a prominent place in the life of Daniel Boone. It was here he escaped from the Indians, who were pursuing him down the river in canoes, by paddling up a small creek near the knob on the left. He secreted himself in this knob five days. From this circumstance it is called "Boone's Knob." It stands isolated from the other bluffs, and at that time, the river being very high, was entirely surrounded by water, so that he paddled round it in his canoe. The other sketch is Dick Robinson's House, which is head-quarters at CAMP DICK ROBINSON.

BURNING OF A MILITARY HOSPITAL.

ON this page we illustrate the DESTRUCTION BY FIRE OF THE MILITARY HOSPITAL in E Street, Washington, which took place on 4th inst. The sketch was taken by our special artist correspondent, who happened to be there at the time. The Washington Star thus relates the affair:

This morning, at a very early hour, the E Street Hospital, better known as the Washington Infirmary, was discovered to be on fire. It contained at the time from ninety to one hundred sick and wounded soldiers, and a considerable number of other Government patients. The fire is believed to have originated in a defective flue from the furnace, which was located in the cellar under the addition which projected from the centre of the main building in the rear. The rooms of the Sisters of Charity were in this addition—over the furnace—and the three medical cadets had a room on the floor above. The rooms of the Sisters were filled with smoke about half an hour after midnight, and the Sister Superior first gave the alarm. They had barely time to hurry on their clothing and escape, leaving every thing but the clothing they had on in the burning building. Their cries brought in the guard, and soon the alarm became general. Doctors Rodman, Hutchins, and Allen, the cadets above alluded to, lost all their personal effects, with the exception of the clothing which they hurriedly put on to leave the burning building. The Metropolitan police were soon upon the ground, and ran through the house arousing all the inmates; and about this time the scene was awful in the extreme.

All of the sick and wounded able to rise wrapped the bed-clothing around them and escaped from the building, and the shrieks of those unable to do so were terribly piercing, and thrilled the hearts of all who heard them. The citizens present, the officers of the institution, and the Metropolitan police were all active in rescuing the weaker patients, who had to be taken up bodily and brought through the smoke and flames to a place of safety. Some were carried to the City Hall, some to the school-house on Judiciary Square (a hospital for some time past), some to the former quarters of Griffin's battery, some to Old Trinity Church on Fifth Street, and many to private residences in the neighborhood. It is believed by the officers of the institution that all the patients were rescued. An aged woman, named Mrs. Hussey, who was sent to the infirmary some time since by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, has been missing, but has since been found.



THE THIRTY-FIRST REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEERS (COLONEL WALKER) CROSSING THE KENTUCKY RIVER AT BOONE'S KNOB, OCTOBER 2, 1861.
[SKETCHED BY MR. ALFRED E. MATTHEWS.]

The bold soldier boy
Hail to the Chief
THE GIRL I LEFT BEHIND M
GLORY HALLELUJAH

THE WAR.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

A STRANGE STORY.

By SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

The manuscript was written in a small and peculiar handwriting, which, though evidently by the same person whose letter to Strahan I had read, was neither from haste nor some imperfection in the ink, much more hard to decipher. Those parts of the memoir which related to experiments, or alleged secrets in nature, that the writer intimated a desire to submit exclusively to scholars or men of science, were in Latin—and Latin which, though grammatically correct, was frequently obscure. But all that detained the eye and attention on the page necessarily served to impress the contents more deeply on remembrance.

The narrative commenced with the writer's sketch of his childhood. Both his parents had died before he attained his seventh year. The orphan had been sent by his guardians to a private school, and his holidays had been passed at Derval Court. Here his earliest reminiscences were those of the quaint old room in which I now sat, and of his childish wonder at the inscription in the chimney-piece—who and what was the Simon Forman who had there found a refuge from persecution? Of what nature were the studies he had cultivated, and the discoveries he boasted to have made?

When he was thirteen Philip Derval had begun to read the many mystic books which the library contained, but without other result on his mind than the sentiment of disappointment and disgust. The impressions produced on the credulous imagination of childhood vanished. He went to the University—was sent abroad to travel; and on his return took that place in the circles of London which is so readily conceded to a young idler of birth and fortune. He passed quickly over the period of his life as one of extravagance and dissipation, from which he was first drawn by the attachment for his cousin to which his letter to Strahan referred. Disappointed in the hopes which that affection had conceived, and his fortune impaired, partly by some years of reckless profusion, and partly by the pecuniary sacrifices at which he had effected his cousin's marriage with another, he retired to Derval Court, to live there in solitude and seclusion. On searching for some old title-deeds required for a mortgage, he chanced upon a collection of manuscript much disordered, and in part eaten away by moth or damp. These, on examination, proved to be the writings of Forman. They were the chronological observations and predictions of what were upon the nature of the Cabala—upon the invocation of spirits and the magic of the Dark Ages. He had a certain interest, for they were interspersed with personal remarks, anecdotes of eminent actors in a very stirring time, and were composed as Colloquies, in imitation of Erasmus; the second person in the dialogue being Sir Miles Derval, the patron and pupil; the first person being Forman, the philosopher and expounder.

But along with these shadowy lucubrations were treatises of a more uncommon and a more startling character; discussions on various occult laws of nature, and detailed accounts of analytical experiments. These opened a new, and what seemed to Sir Philip a practical field of inquiry—a true border land between natural science and imaginative speculation. Sir Philip had cultivated philosophical science at the University; he resumed the study, and tested himself the truth of various experiments suggested by Forman. Some, to his surprise, proved successful—some wholly failed. These lucubrations first tempted the writer of the memoir toward the studies in which the remainder of his life had been consumed. But he spoke of the lucubrations themselves as valuable only where suggestive of some truths which Forman had accidentally approached without being aware of their true nature and importance. They were debased by absurd puerilities, and vitiated by the vain and presumptuous ignorance which characterized the astrology of the Middle Ages. For these reasons the writer intimated his intention (if he lived to return to England) to destroy Forman's manuscripts, together with sundry other books, and a few commentaries of his own on those studies which had for a while misled him—all now deposited in the safes of the room in which I sat.

After some years passed in the retirement of Derval Court, Sir Philip was seized with the desire to travel, and the taste he had imbibed for occult studies led him westward to those Eastern lands in which they took their origin, and still retain their professors.

Several pages of the manuscript were now occupied with minute statements of the writer's earlier disappointment in the objects of his single research. The so-called magicians, accessible to the curiosity of European travelers, were either but ingenious jugglers, or produced effects that perplexed him by practices they had mechanically learned, not of the rationale of which they were as ignorant as himself. It was not till he had resided some considerable time in the East, and enjoyed a familiar knowledge of its current languages and the social habits of its various populations, that he became acquainted with men in whom he recognized certain cultivators of the love which tradition ascribes to the colleges and priesthoods of the ancient world men generally living remote from cities, and seldom to be bribed by money to exhibit their marvels or divulge their secrets. In his intercourse with these sages Sir Philip arrived at the conviction that there does exist an art of magic, distinct from the guile of the conjuror, and applying to certain hitherto concealed powers in nature a philosophy akin to that which we receive in our acknowledged schools, inasmuch as it is equally based upon experiment, and produces from definite causes definite results. In support of this startling proposition, Sir Philip now detailed, from time to time, the steps in the detail of various experiments, to the process and result of which he pledged his guarantee as the moral operator. A few of these I shall select—experiments appeared to me wholly inexplicable, and as all of them were unfamiliar to my practical experience, and to which I have not as yet satisfied by tests that would require no inconsiderable amount of time and care, I passed, with little heed, the pages on which they were recorded. What I was impatient to arrive at that part of the manuscript which might throw light on the mystery to which my visitor had alluded. What were the links which connected the existence of Margrave with the history of Sir Philip Derval? This knowledge, even after page, I tardily forward the end of the volume, came upon a name that arrested all my attention—Haroun of Aleppo.

He—he who has read this narrative—will to me in my trance may well conceive the thrill that shot through my heart when I came upon that name, and will readily understand how much more vividly my memory retains that part of the manuscript to which I now proceed than all which had gone before.

"It was," says Sir Philip, "in an obscure suburb of Aleppo that I at length met with the wonderful man from whom I have acquired a knowledge immeasurably more profound and occult than that which may be tested in the experiments to which I have devoted so large a share of this narrative. Haroun of Aleppo had, indeed, mastered every secret in nature which the nobler, or the meaner, magic seeks to fathom.

"He had discovered the Elixir of Life, which had hitherto baffled the subtlest anatomist:—provided only that the great organs were not irremediably destroyed, there was no disease that he could not cure; no decrepitude to which he could not restore vigor; yet his science was based on principles so simple that expounded by the best professional practitioners of medicine—viz., that the true art of healing is to assist Nature in her own efforts—that the physician, as it were, the whole system to eject the enemy that has fastened on a part. And thus, his processes, though sometimes apparently in the means employed, all combined in this—viz., the reinvigorating and recruiting of the principle of life."

No one knew the birth or origin of Haroun; no one knew his age. In outward appearance he was in the prime of life—that of mature manhood. But according to testimonies in which the writer of the memoir expressed a belief that, I need scarcely say—so ridiculously and grossly credulous, Haroun's existence under the same name, and known by the same repute, could be traced back to the days of the Crusades. He told Sir Philip that he had thrice renewed his own life, and had resolved to do so no more—he had grown weary of living on. With all his gifts, Haroun owned himself to be consumed by a profound melancholy. He complained that there was something wanting to his happiness as a possessor; he had tired out all the affections and all the passions of the human heart; he was in the universe as in a solitude. In a word, Haroun would often repeat, with mournful solemnity, "The soul is not meant to inhabit this earth, and in fleshly tabernacle, for more than the period usually assigned to mortals; and when by art in repairing the walls of the body we so retain it, the soul pines and frets within, or rejected. He only," said Haroun, "would feel continued joy in continued existence who could preserve in perfection the sensual part of man, with such mind or reason as may be independent of the spiritual essence, but whom soul itself has quitted! Man, in short, as the grandest of the animals, but without the sublime discontent of earth, which is the peculiar attribute of soul."

One evening Sir Philip was surprised to find at Haroun's house another European. He paused in his narrative to describe this man. He said that for three or four years previously he had himself foregone the study in the cultivators of magic of an Orientalized Englishman engaged in researches similar to his own, and to whom he ascribed a fuller knowledge in those branches of the art which, even in the East, are condemned as instrumental to evil. Sir Philip here distinguished at length, as he had so briefly distinguished in his conversation with me, between the two kinds of magic—that which he alleged to be apart from sin as any other sciences of experimental knowledge, and that by which the agencies of witchcraft are invoked for the purposes of guilt.

The Englishman, to whom the culture of this latter and darker kind of magic was ascribed, Sir Philip Derval had never hitherto come across. He now met him at the house of Haroun; described, enacted, bowed down with infirmities, and racked with pain. Though little more than sixty, his aspect was that of extreme old age, but still on his face there were seen the ruins of a once singular beauty, and still in his mind there was a force that contrasted the decay of the body. Sir Philip had never met with an intellect more powerful and more corrupt. The son of a nonconformist minister, heir to immense wealth, and endowed with the talents which justify ambition, he had entered upon life burdened with the odium of his father's name. A deity, to which he had been provoked by an ungenerous taunt on his origin, but in which a temperament fiercely sensual had led him to violate the usages prescribed by the social laws that regulate such encounters, had subjected him to a trial in which the jury convicted either by a flaw in the technicalities of legal procedure or by the compassion of the jury,* but the moral presumptions against him were sufficiently strong to set an indelible brand on his honor, and an insurmountable barrier to the hopes which his early ambition had fixed in the career. After this trial he had quitted his country to return to it no more. Thenceforth much of his life had been passed out of the circumference of civilized men, in remote regions and among barbarous tribes. At intervals, however, he had reappeared in European cities, dissipated by and shunning his equals, surrounded by parasites, among whom were always to be found men of considerable learning, but whose powers were paralyzed by the influences of his wealth. For the last nine or ten years he had settled in Persia, purchased extensive lands, maintained the retinue, and exercised much of the power of an Oriental prince. Such was the man who, prematurely worn out, and assured by physicians that he had not six weeks of life, had come to Aleppo with the gaudy escort of an Eastern satrap, had caused himself to be borne in his litter to the head-hut of Haroun of Aleppo, and now called on the magician, in whose art was his last hope, to reprieve him from the—grave.

He turned to Sir Philip when the latter entered the room, and exclaimed in English, "I am here because you are. Your intimacy with this man is known to me. I took your character as the guarantee of his own. Tell me that I am no credulous dupe. Tell him that I, Louis Gordon, am not a credulous dupe. Tell me of his wisdom; assure him of my wealth."

Sir Philip looked inquiringly at Haroun, who remained seated on his carpet in profound silence.

"What is it you ask of Haroun?"

"To live as I live—to be every year of

* The reader will here observe a discrepancy between Mrs. Poyntz's account and Sir Philip Derval's narrative. According to Mrs. Poyntz's story he was tried in Italy for a murder committed in England, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment, which his flight enabled him to evade. According to the latter, he was tried and acquitted, and obtained a verdict of acquittal. Sir Philip's account must, at least, be nearer the truth, for Mrs. Poyntz's informant, Mrs. Gryste could not, according to English law, have been tried on a capital charge without the presence of the body. The whole history on a woman generally does tell a story—save to the practiced lawyer, who can detect the assertion of fact—unconsciously perhaps to herself—the Woman of the World would give facts in her narrative so as to save the personal dignity of the hero, who has captivated her interest, and from the moment of a great crime, but the debasing position of a prisoner at the bar. Allen Ewelick, no doubt, purposely or unconsciously, misrepresented effective statements, or to unmask'ert on the mistake of Mrs. Poyntz's. But the world absorbs Mrs. Poyntz's. It is consistent with some of the objects for which Sir Philip Derval has left his manuscript, to invite the reader to draw his own inference from the conflicting accounts. Mrs. Poyntz's most commonplace matter (and how much more in any tale of wonder!), a fact stated by one person, and denied by another, is contradicted by another. The rapidity with which a truth becomes distorted in passing from the mouth of one to travels from lip to lip, is illustrated by an assessment at the time among the Italians, that the assassination was the party of eight or ten persons, let one whisper to another an apparently trivial circumstance—the assertion of leaving or going visiting to absent persons, dead or alive; let the person who hear this person whisper to another, and let us exactly as he can remember what he has just heard, to the next person, and so on from one to neighbor, and so on, till the tale has run the round of the party. Each narrator, as each hearer, is perfectly honest, and yet the most important feature of the whole narrative is altogether unheard—unwritten. Is human altogether wrong, purposely absurd, has been added. At the close of the experiment one is tempted to exclaim, "How, after this, can any of those pictures of history which the chronicler has left us be relied on?" But, above all, does not every particle of scandal which has passed, not through the lips, but only through the thoughts of Howard, John, has reached us, become quite as perplexing to him who would get at the truth, as the assertions are to the bewildered reason of Fenwick the Skeptic?

life he can give me I will load these floors with gold."

"Gold will not tempt Haroun."

"What will?"

"Ask him yourself; you speak his language."

"I have asked him; he vouchsafes me no answer."

Haroun here suddenly roused himself as from a reverie. He drew from under his robe a small vial, from which he let fall a single drop into a cup of water, and said, "Drink this. Send to me to-morrow for such medicaments as I may prescribe. Return hither yourself in three days; rest before I resume."

When Grayle was gone, Sir Philip, moved to pity, asked Haroun if indeed it were within the compass of his art to preserve life in a frame that appeared so thoroughly exhausted. Haroun answered, "A fever may so waste the lamp of life that one pulse more gust of air could extinguish the flame, yet the sick man recovers. I think sick man's existence has been one long fever; this sick man can recover."

"You will aid him to do so?"

"Three days hence I will tell you."

On the third day Grayle revisited Haroun, and, at Haroun's request, Sir Philip came also. Grayle declared that he had already derived unspeakable relief from the remedies administered; he was lavish, in the profusion of gratitude, promised large gifts on Haroun, and seemed gained when they were refused. This time Haroun conversed freely, drawing forth Grayle's own irregular, perverted, stormy, but powerful intellect.

I can best convey the general nature of Grayle's share in the dialogue between himself, Haroun, and Derval—recorded in the narrative in words which I can remember in my memory in repeat in detail—by stating the effect it produced on my own mind. It seemed, while I read, as if there passed before me the convulsions of Nature—a storm, an earthquake. Outcries of rage, of scorn, of despair; a despot's vehemence of will; a rebel's defiance of authority. Eye, ear and mouth, some swell of lofty thought, some burst of passionate genius—abrupt variations from the vaunt of superb defiance to the wail of intense remorse.

The whole had in it, I know not what, of uncouth but colossal—like the chant, in the old Pictet records, of one of those mythical giants, who, proud of descent from Night and Chaos, had held sway over the elements, while still rude and intelligent to be overthrown under the rocks, upheaved in their struggle, as Order and Harmony subjected a brightening Creation to the milder influences personified and throned in Olympus. But it was not till the later passages of the dialogue in which my interest was now absorbed that I could distinctly trace how the latter response lost a gloomy pathos, not the less impressive for the awe with which it was mingled. Grayle, when it seemed to me that in that tempestuous nature there were still broken glimpses of starry light; that a character originally lofty, though undue and fierce, had been embittered by early and continuous war with the social world, and had in that war become animated and distorted by the under happier circumstances, its fiery strength might have been disciplined to good; that even now, where remorse was so evidently poignant, evil could not be irredeemably confirmed.

At length all the dreary compassion previously inspired vanished in one unqualified abhorrence.

The subjects discussed changed from those which, relating to the common world of men, were within the scope of my reason. Haroun led his wild guest to boast of his own proficiency in magic, and, despite my incredulity, I could not overcome the shudder with which I heard, however extravagant, that deal with that dark Unknown abandoned to the chimeras of poets, and, at night and in solitude, we imagine to be the veins of men the least accessible to imaginary terrors.

Grayle spoke of the power he had exercised through the agency of evil spirits—a power to fascinate and to destroy. He spoke of the aid revealed to him by the love for Isa, which, if still alive, could afford, not only to a private revenge, but to a kingly ambition. He had acquired the knowledge he declared himself to possess from the fetishes of the deserts which he had explored, and from lengthen the term of the Pestilence, or profane the secrets of Nature to restore vigor and youth to the failing energies of Crime?"

Grayle, as if stunned by the rebuke, fell on his knees with despairing entreaties that strangely contrasted his previous arrogance. "And it was," he said, "because his life had been evil that he dreaded death. If life could be renewed he would repent, he would change; he retracted his vaunts, he would forsake the arts he had boasted, he would re-enter the world as its benefactor."

"So ever the wicked man lies to himself when appalled by the shadow of death," answered Haroun. "But know, by the remorse which preys on thy soul, that it is not thy soul that addresses this prayer to me. Couldst thou hear, through the storms of the Mind, the Soul's melancholy whisper, it would dissuade thee from a wish to live on." While I speak I behold it, that SOUL Sad for the stains on its essence, awed by the account it must render, but dreading, as the direst calamity, a renewal of years below—darker stains and yet heavier accounts! Whatever the sentence it may now undergo, it has no hope for mercy in the remorse which the mind vainly struggles to quell. But darker its doom if longer retained in earth, yoked to the mind that corrupts it, and enslaved to the senses which thou bidst me restore to their tyrannous forces."

And Grayle bowed his head and covered his face with his hands in silence and in trembling.

Then Sir Philip, seized with compassion, pleaded for him. "At least could not the soul have longer time on earth for repentance?"

And while Sir Philip was so pleading Grayle had prostrated his brow in the dust of death. When he recovered his head was leaning on Haroun's knee, and his opening eyes fixed on the glittering vial which Haroun held, and from which his lips had been moistened.

"Wondrous!" he murmured; "how I feel life flowing back to me. And that, then, is the elixir! it is no fable!"

His hands stretched greedily as to seize the vial, and he cried, imploringly, "More, more!" Haroun replaced the vessel in the folds of his robe, and answered:

"I will not renew thy youth, but I will release thee from bodily suffering; I will leave the mind and the soul free from the pangs of the flesh, to reconcile, if yet possible, their long war. Myself I may afford the morsel yet for repentance; seek in that interval to atone for the evil of sixty years; apply thy wealth where it may most compensate for injury done, most relieve the indigent, and most aid the virtuous. Listen to thy remorse. Humble thyself in prayer."

Grayle departed, sighing heavily, and muttering to himself.

The next day Haroun summoned Sir Philip Derval, and said to him:

"Depart to Damascus. In that city the Pestilence has appeared. Go thither thou, to heart and to wise. In this casket are stored the surest antidotes to the poison of the plague. Of that essence, undiluted and pure, which tempts to the undue prolongation of soul in the prison of flesh, this casket contains not a drop. I curse not my friend with so mournful a boon. Thou hast learned enough of the art to know by what samples the health of the temperate is easily restored to its balance, and their path to the grave smoothed from pain. Not more should Man covet from Nature for the solace and weal of the body. Nobler gifts far than aught for the body this casket contains. Herein are the essences which quicken the life of those duplicate senses that lie dormant and coiled in their chrysalis web, awaiting the wings of a future development—the senses by which we can see, though not with the eye, and hear, but not by the ear. Herein are the links between Man's mind and Nature's; herein are secrets more precious even than these—those extracts of light which enable the Soul to distinguish itself from the Mind, and discriminate the spiritual life, not more from life carnal than life intellectual. Where thou seest some noble intellect, studious of Nature, intent upon Truth, yet ignoring the fact that all animal life has a mind, and Man alone on the earth owns a soul, and has asked, from the hour his step trod the Earth and his eye sought the Heaven, 'Have I not a soul—can it perish?'—there, such aids to the soul, in the immense vision vouchsafed to the mind, thou mayst lawfully use. But the treasures contained in this casket are like all which a mortal can win from the master he explores—good or ill in their uses as they pass to the hands of the good or the evil. Thou wilt never confide them but to those who will not abuse; and even then, thou art an adept too versed in the mysteries of Nature not to discriminate between the powers that may serve the good to good ends, and the powers that may tempt the good—where less wise than experience has made them and me—to the ends that are evil; and not even to thy friend, the most virtuous—if less proof against passion than thou and I may become—will thou confide such contents of the casket as may work on the fancy, to defraud on the conscience and imperil the soul."

Sir Philip took the casket, and with it directions for use, which he did not detail. He then spoke to Haroun about Louis Grayle, who had inspired him with a mingled sentiment of admiration and abhorrence, of pity and terror. And Haroun answered. Repeating thus the words avoided to him, as far as the case runs, in regard to them—as to all else in this marvelous narrative—to a memory habitually tenacious even in ordinary matters, and strengthened to an almost extent of its power by the strangeness of the ideas presented to it, and the intensity of my personal interest in whatever admitted a ray into that cloud which, gathering fast over my reason, now threatened storm to my affections:

"When the natural deliverance of man himself or the spirits of evil, he surrenders the citadel of his being to the guard of its enemies; and those who look from without can only dimly guess what passes within the precincts abandoned to Powers whose very nature we shrink to contemplate, lest our mere gaze should invite them. This man, whom thou priest, is not yet everlastingly consigned to the fiends, because his soul still struggles against them. His life has been one long war between his intellect, which is mighty, and his spirit, which is feeble. The intellect, armed and winged by the passions, has benefited and spoiled the soul: but the soul has never ceased to repine and to repent. And at moments it has gained its inherent ascendency, persuaded revenge to drop the prey it had seized, turned the mind astray from hatred and wrath into unwonted paths of charity and love. In the long dissect of guilt there have been spots and fountains of good. The fiends have occupied the intellect which invoked them, but they have never yet thoroughly subdued the soul which their presence appalls. In the struggle that now passes within that breast, amidst the flickers of wrong mortality, only Allah, whose eye never slumbers, can aid."

Haroun then continued, in words yet more strange and yet more deeply graved in my memory:

"There have been men (thou mayst have known such) who, after an illness in which life itself seemed suspended, have arisen, as out of a sleep, with characters wholly changed. Before, perhaps gentle and good, and youthful, they now become bitter, malignant, and false. To the persons and the things they had before loved they evince repugnance and loathing. Sometimes this change is so marked and irrational that their kindred ascribe it to madness. Nor in madness which affects them in the ordinary business of life, but that which turns into harshness and discord the moral harmony that results from natures whole and complete. But there are dervishes who hold that in that illness, which had for its time the likeness of death, the soul itself has passed away, and an evil genius has fixed itself into the body and the brain, thus left void of their former tenant, and animates them in the unaccountable change from the past to the present existence. Such mysteries have formed no part of my studies. I tell you the conjecture received in the East without hazarding a comment whether of incredulity or belief. But if, in this war between the mind which the fiends have seized and the soul which implores refuge of Allah; if, while the mind of your traveler now covets life lengthened on earth for the enjoyment it had perverted its faculties to seek and to find in sin, and covets so eagerly that it would shrink from no crime, and revolt from no fraud, that could promote the gift—the now shudderingly implores to be saved from new guilt, and would rather abide by the judgment of Allah on the sins that have darkened it than pass forever irredeemably away to the demons: if this be so, what if the soul's petition be heard? —what if it rise from the mind around it?—what if the ruins be left to the witchcraft that seeks to rebuild them? There, if demons might enter, that which they could not gain by the mortal consultation of man, might unhallowed reminiscences gather all the arts and the charms of the sorcery by which fiends tempted, the soul, below expelled, through the passions of flesh and the cravings of mind: the Thing, thus devoid of a soul, would be diabolically perfect in cunning, doubtless, but an instrument that of itself could not design, invent, and complete. The demons themselves could but work permanent hell on the perishable materials. They might enter it for some gloomy end which Allah permits in his inscrutable wisdom; but could not, save in the trace where they pass from it, because there is no conscience where soul is waiting. The human animal without mind, but endowed with personality, might in its mere vital organization, might ravage and destroy, as the tiger and the serpent may destroy and ravage, but could not after, would pass away in the sunlight harmless and rejoicing, because, like the serpent and the tiger, it is incapable of remorse."

"Why startle my wonder," said Derval, "with so fantastic an image?"

"Because, possibly, the image may come into palpable form." I know, while I speak to thee, that this miserable man is calling to his aid the evil sorcery over which he boasts his control. To gain that knowledge he must pass through a crime. Sorcery whispers to him how to pass through it, secure from the detection of man. The soul struggles, but is weak against the tyranny of the mind to which it has submitted so long. Question me no more. But if I vanish from thy sight, if I seem hear that I am dead within, to my sorrow and in my foolishness I have failed to recognize as the merciful minister of Allah, I commend me at last to flee from the earth, believe that the Pale Visitant was welcome, and that I humbly accept as a blessed release from the poor human bondage. To Sir Philip went to Damascus. There he found the pestilence raging—there he devoted himself to the cure of the sufferers—no single instance —so, at least, he declared—did the antidotes stored in the casket fail in their effect. The pestilence stayed its pace, and predominance were exhausted, when the news reached him that Haroun was no more. The sage had been found, one morning, lifeless in his solitary home, and, according to popular rumor, marks on his throat betrayed the murderous hand of the strangler. Simultaneously Louis Grayle had disappeared from the city, and was supposed to have shared the fate of Haroun, and been secretly buried by the assassins who had deprived him of life. Sir Philip hastened to Aleppo. There he ascertained that on the night in which Haroun died Grayle did not disappear alone; with him were also missing two of his numerous suite—the one, an Arab woman, named Ayesha, who had for some years been his constant companion, his pupil and associate in the mystic practices to which his intellect had been debased, and who was said to have acquired a singular influence over him, partly by her beauty, and partly by the tenderness with which she had nursed him through his long decline; the other, an Indian, specially assigned to her service, of whom all the wild retainers of Grayle spoke with detestation and terror. He was believed by them to belong to that murderous sect of fanatics whose existence as a community has only recently been made known to Europe, and who strangle their unsuspecting victim in the firm belief that they thereby propitiate the favor of the goddess they serve. The current report in Aleppo was that if these two persons had conspired to murder Haroun, perhaps for the sake of the treasures he was said to possess, it was still more certain that they had made away with their own English lord, whether for the sake of the jewels he wore about him, or for the effect of treasons and doubtful than those imputed to Haroun—and of which the hiding-place would to them be much better known. "I did not share that opinion," wrote the narrator; "for I assured myself that Ayesha sincerely loved her awful master; and that love need excite no wonder, for Louis Grayle was one whom if a woman, and especially a woman of the East, had once loved, before old age and infirmity fell on him, she would love and cherish still more devotedly when it became her task to protect the being who, in his day of power and command, had exalted his slave into the rank of his pupil and companion. And the Indian whom Grayle had assigned to her service was allowed to have that brute kind of fidelity which, though it recoils from no crime for a master, refuses all crime against him.

"I came to the conclusion that Haroun had been murdered by order of Louis Grayle, for the sake of the elixir of life—murdered by Zema the Strangler; and that Grayle himself had been aided in his flight from Aleppo, and tended, through the effects of the life-giving drug thus murderously obtained, by the womanly love of the Arab woman Ayesha. These convictions (since I could not, without ridiculous and the wildest of dupes, even hint at the vital elixir) I failed to impress on the Eastern officials, or even to communicate to the people whom I chanced to find at Aleppo. They only arrived at what seemed the common-sense verdict—viz., Haroun might have been strangled, he might have died in a fit (the body, little examined, was buried long before I came to Aleppo); Louis Grayle was murdered by his own ruffianly dependents. But all trace of the fugitives was lost.

"And now," wrote Sir Philip, "I will state by what means I discovered that Louis Grayle still lived—changed from age into youth; a new form, a new being; realizing, I verily believe, the image which Haroun's words had raised up, in what then seemed to me the metaphysics of romance—a disembodied, without consciousness of crime; the dreadest of the mere animal races, an incarnation of the blind powers of Nature—beautiful and gorgeous, wanton, and innocent, and destroying! Such as ancient myths have personified in the idols of Oriental creeds; such as Nature, of herself, might form man in the moments of favor, if man were wholly the animal, and spirit were no longer the essential distinction between human and brute! The race to which I appeal for information and subtler perceptions he would still be the king.

"But the being is yet more dire and portentous than the mere animal man; for in him are not only the fragmentary memories of a pristine intelligence restored to no mind, unaided by the presence of soul, could have originally compassed, but amidst that intelligence are the secrets of the magic which is learned from the sly agencies of spirits to our race the most hostile. And who shall say whether the fiends do not enter at their will this void and open mansion, now that the soul has departed, and use as their tools, passive and unconscious, all the faculties which, skillful as sorcery, still place a Mind at the control of their malice?

"It was in the interest excited in me by the strange and unique fate that befell an Armenian family with which I was staying a year after the murder of Haroun for the sake of the elixir of youth.

"In this Armenian family there were three daughters, and one son—

I had just read thus far when a dim Shadow fell over the page, and a cold air seemed to breathe on my cheek. I—a man who had long halted in my veins as if suddenly frozen! Involuntarily I started and looked up, sure that some ghastly presence stood in the room. And then, on the opposite side of the wall, I beheld an unsubstantial likeness of a human form. Shadow I call it; but the word is not strictly correct, for it was luminous, though with a pale shine. In some exhibition in London there is shown a colored appearance of a human being: at the end of a corridor you see, apparently in strong light, a human skull. You are convinced it is there as by your approach it grows, you only a reflection from a skull at a distance. The image before me was less vivid, less seemingly permanent, than is the likeness of a skull. I was not deceived. I felt it was a spectrum, a phantasm, but I felt no less surely that it was a reflection from an animate form—the mind and the face of Margrave: it was there, distinct, unmistakable. Conceiving that he himself must be behind me, I sought to rise, to turn round, to examine. I could not move; limb and muscle were overmastered by some incomprehensible and dreadful power; my senses forsook me—I became unconscious as well as motionless. When I recovered I heard the clock strike Three. I must have been nearly two hours insensible; the candles before me were burning low; my eyes rested on the table; the dead man's manuscript was gone!

"WHEN HE RECOVERED HIS HEAD WAS LEANING ON HAROUN'S KNEE," ETC.

CAPTURE OF A REBEL PICKET.

On page 740 we publish an illustration of the CAPTURE OF A REBEL PICKET by our troops near Fall's Church. The Washington Star thus describes the affair:

General Butterfield dispatched Brigade Quarter-master Norton with ten wagons and escort of fifty men, to Forty-fourth to Shreve's farm, four miles northwest of Fall's Church and west of the Leesburg Pike, to obtain forage. A short distance north of Falls church they captured a rebel picket, who had left his post to forage for whisky. Captain Norton at once sent him to head-quarters, though he learned from the prisoner that the rebel pickets were stationed not far back of Shreve's place. Captain Norton judiciously pushed his men up to attack, but he successfully accomplished the purpose of his expedition without encountering rebel pickets.

The prisoner's name is C. B. Bell, a private of Company E, Captain Reeves, Sixth Regiment Louisiana Volunteers, commanded by Colonel Seymour, editor of the New Orleans Commercial Bulletin. The regiment is a part of General Walker's Louisiana Brigade. He states that around Centreville is one continuous camp of Confederate troops, Beauregard was at Centreville, his head-quarters being but half a mile from the village. A new regiment of cavalry from North Carolina had just arrived.

VIEW OF THE MOUNTAIN REGION (THE SEAT OF WAR) IN WESTERN VIRGINIA, FROM THE SUMMIT OF LIMESTONE MOUNTAIN.

THURLOW WEED, ESQ.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 761.]

THE NORTHERN LIGHTS.

THEY shone like lightning overhead,
They flashed along from shore to shore,
The bright reflection of their red
Crimsoned the streets of Baltimore;
And men who saw, serene and clear,
Their progress through the heavenly heights,
Made the world ring with cheer on cheer,
Crying, "Behold the Northern Lights!"

They shone on Ellsworth's murdered form;
They gilded Lyon's far-off grave;
Where Baker's army met the storm,
They smiled a blessing on the brave.
While Winona turned her head in shame
To feel her secret thoughts laid bare,
The patriot hailed the sacred flame
That nerved his heart against despair.

Men of the North! fresh courage take;
Fear not to meet a little loss;
Ere long our Northern Lights shall break
The clouds around the Southern Cross.
Our banner floats above us yet,
And treason o'er it in darkness fights;
Not yet our star of hope is set,
Not yet are quenched our Northern Lights.

We will not stop to reckon all
The vacant chairs—twice needless pain—
Of those who at Columbia's call
Joined to have hot of freedom's slain.
From every grave wherein they lie
Shall one day burst a victor song;
The Northern Lights are in the sky,
And all the land shall smile ere long!

S. J. A.

LOVE AND DUTY.

"Is that your fixed determination?"

"I am a Virginian, Helen, and can adopt no other!"

Then listen to me, Randolph Wyvil! I, too, a daughter of the dear old Bay State—God bless it!—which has shed its first blood in this dreadful quarrel, have my sense of right and duty, and, Heaven helping me, will act up to it! And loving you as I have, and as I do, I tell you I will never, never be your wife!"

"Helen!"

"I mean it! I am no heroine—nothing but a girl who must be infinitely wiser and better; but this I am sure of, that you are wrong—desperately, wickedly wrong in this matter. You, a soldier, an officer in your country's service, to desert her in her time of need, and, not content with that, to strike at her life by joining this ceaseless and detestable rebellion! I want words to express my horror of it!"

"You use words which I can hardly listen to with patience, and which I would never breed from a man's mouth! I repudiate the idea of allegiance to a miserable crew of abolitionists and fanatics who have behaved with the blackest dissimulation and treachery—who are not fit to rule over a people every way superior to those they hope to subjugate!"

"The discussion is worse than unprofitable, and I despair of changing your opinion. But it must separate us, and forever."

"Why?"

"I have told you already."

The listener gnashed his teeth.

"When we lay this accursed city in ashes," he said, "you may think differently! Be wise in time and accompany me to a Southern home."

"If your vain boast were to be accomplished—and so sure as I live I believe the sun will never shine on its fulfillment—I would rather be dead in my coffin than be the wife of any man who had sided in it."

"They have provoked it! They have invaded us! How can you deny it, or justify them? Would you have me a traitor to the soil I was born on?"

"I would have you loyal to your oath and country, not to a miserable misguided section of it. We differ irreconcilably and had better part."

"You have said you love me, Helen, yet you break out on me thus!"

"Your act, not mine, cancels it! May God forgive you! I pray for your safety and pardon night and day, but—but—I can not do what is wrong before Heaven and my own soul!" And Helen Grant burst into a paroxysm of sobs, weeping and hiding her face with her hands, like the woman she was.

Randolph Wyvil threw his arms about her, and would have improved his opportunity and her supposed weakness. But out of that kind of weakness came a woman's strength. She put him off almost with violence, dashed the tears from her eyes, and confronted him with a look more passionately resolute than he had ever beheld in her good, sweet face.

"I am a fool," she said, "I know, to let you see this, but I suppose I don't change my resolution. My heart shall be broken before my word."

Wyvil both loved and hated her at that moment. Perhaps one passion is only the other turned inside out.

"Helen!" he cried, "there is no woman on earth who shall be more dearly worshiped in the innermost core of man's heart than you by me if you become my wife. I can respect your convictions, mistaken as you are about our Southern institutions and about this war, which can have but one ending, for Yankees will run like dogs before Southern gentlemen, sudden!"

Helen interrupted him vehemently, her face flushing. "Spare your insults," she said, "and recollect that I am a Yankee!"

He took his rebuke with an ill grace, but apologized. "Forgive me, Helen," he replied; "and for Heaven's sake do not persist in casting away the happiness of both our lives for a miserable fanatical idea."

"That idea is DUTY, Randolph. By no means so romantic a word as love, but one which I have been taught in regard to be our sure foundation of happiness, if not in this world, in the next. May we meet there if divided here!"

"Amen to that. But must we part in this?"

"If you persist in your determination."

He took her hand, and looked long, earnestly beseechingly into her countenance. She loved him very dearly despite his faults, and innumerable tender recollections of past happiness crowded into her mind, all pleading in his behalf, and endeavoring to sap the strength of her resolution. In vain! He might read sorrow there and affection, but, above all, an intense, high-souled conviction of Right, and a determination to abide by it at whatever cost or suffering.

Then an unworthy thought took possession of him. "You have ceased to love me. You will wed another," he said.

She released her hand, and an expression of sweet, sad reproach came into her face. With her upper lip slightly, very slightly curved, she answered, simply: "I think you had better go, Randolph."

It was a thousand times more effective than any stronger or more elaborate condemnation. Goaded, however, to further injustice by the sense of having already committed it, he continued:

"Will you promise to be no other man's wife than mine, Helen?"

"You have no right to exact any such promise, and I shall not give it."

Captain Wyvil burst out into something like an execration. "Farewell, then," he said; "like all of your sex, you have been the Juggernaut of this before which every thing must be crushed, which is incapable of reason or consideration. I will not bow to it—no, not even to-day! Go and make Havelocks and scrape lint for your ill——d Yankees, for by Heaven they will need the latter!" And without further word or leave-taking he flung himself out of the apartment.

And what did Helen? She has avowed herself no heroine: never to the world-wide end will she one. Instead of being stung into high-spirited resentment at his taunts, and indignantly dismissing him forever from her memory, she sank dreadfully pale, pressed her hands to her heart as if to quiet its beatings, bowed down her head, and presently wept long and bitterly over the last hour would have. She was that Juggernaut idea of Duty, objurgated by Captain Wyvil, not an easily-worshiped deity.

What time that officer rode across the Long Bridge over the Potomac into that Virginia, the claims of which he considered superior to those of honor, Helen Grant sat motionless in the Old Dollar House, which art in Heaven, beseeching Him to forgive preserve him, and to turn his heart. Two days afterward she read of his having joined the Southern army.

Three months have passed and a memorable Sunday in July has come—a day which will be remembered in history less in connection with its equally tragic and ludicrous accompaniments as the one event necessary to arouse a great people to the full extent of the grave and tremendous responsibility they had undertaken. We are at Centreville, eight miles from Bull Run, within an hour of midnight.

It is a close, rainy night, succeeding a sweltering day. There is a heavy, thunderous boom of cannon in the air, almost continuous, insomuch that the rain-drops seem to be heavily jarred and shaken by the concussion, to the ground, which has been trodden into a miry quagmire by hosts of living feet, and is strewn with the wasted waste of clothing, knapsacks, and other appurtenances of a soldier. The murky blackness brooding over the woods is here and there relieved by the reflection of a distant conflagration, and portentously lightened at intervals by the glare of rockets. The occasional rattle of musketry, the hoarse shouts of sentries, the roll of drums, the cries of men calling to one another, the shrill neighing of horses, mingled with many unintelligible sounds of marching, blending into one, are heard ominously in the direction of the recent battle. The main body of the defeated army of that word is approaching in disorder. The mere panic—have swept by, onward to Fairfax Court House, followed by its pursuers. We stand in the Little Old Dollar House church of Centreville, occupied by the Confederates, as a sanity guard at the door, posted by a rebel officer, intimates. It has been hastily converted into a hospital, where Helen Grant and foe, tended by a handful of heroic surgeons, who prefer certain capture, possible death, to a selfish abandonment of the duty of humanity. With them is one solitary woman, a self-appointed hospital nurse.

She grew up and fro in that house of pain, amidst shrieks and groans and sickening sights such as might appall the heart of woman or man, with a hunched chest but a steadfast purpose, quietly performing the duties assigned to her. The good surgeons know her, and have almost ceased to wonder at her nerve and heroism.

One of them demands her assistance. It is in behalf of an officer sorely wounded by a bayonet-thrust in his side, from which ghastly orifice the blood is welling in dark-red jets. He wears the uniform of a Southern regiment, and the straps on his shoulders indicate the rank of Colonel. Enfeebled by pain and loss of blood he yet preserves his consciousness, and his eyes meet those of the hospital nurse. And with a scream that rings loud above all other sounds of human agony around, and penetrates the brain like a knife, Helen Grant recognizes Randolph Wyvil. At that moment she has sprung to his side, and her white face bends over and touches his.

"Helen!"

"Randolph!"

They said no more, but a silence as intense as full of meaning supplied the place of words. It was broken by Wyvil.

"Thank God we have met!" he said, "though thus. I shall die with less regret now."

"Die! Is there no hope?"

"I think not; I am bleeding too much."

He smiled faintly, and turning on his unwounded side with difficulty, so as to look her in the face, took both of her hands in his. In accordance with the agonized entreaty expressed in Helen's countenance, the surgeon carefully examined his wound. Wyvil eyed him closely, and read sentence of death in his grave aspect.

"Dearest, it is better so!" he said, as Helen sank stricken at her heart, beside him whose fastebbing life she would willingly have ransomed with her own. "I have been foolish—headstrong—embarrassing throughout. I know it now; and death may explain treason. You were right—you always are right—but I did not think so then; only of late I have awakened to the truth. If I had had the courage to act on my convictions, I should have been in the opposite ranks to-day. I could not fight for that cause any more, nor live shamed and dishonored. Tell me you forgive me for my brutality at our last parting, and let us pray we may meet in heaven!"

"Oh, may He grant it! My forgiveness you need not ask; I have loved you and prayed for you always!"

Randolph's face lighted up with a smile of inexpressible gratitude and affection, almost triumphant in its fervency, and he raised his arm and feebly embraced her.

"Put your face closer; I shall not see it long. Do you know you are about to make a glorious adherence to one idea—the idea of Duty—and calling it a Juggernaut? Well, it is I who have been the worshiper of a senseless idol, and you the priest who has offered up your heart before I could see it. Love me, and I want you to know it, and to tell others. With a dying man's clearer vision I have insight into their mad, cruel ends; their emptiness, ambition, and selfishness; the horrible folly and crime in which the whole land is involved. I thought I fought for freedom and for Old Virginia: I have raised an impious hand against both. I know my error now: I see it in the light of death."

Helen's passionate, burning words of sympathy and consolation need not be recorded. What pen could do justice to them?

"This will be a cruel war—a cruel war!" Randolph said; "but I see the end of it. Ha! what noise is that?" and a flash of temporary animation shaking him, he rose on his pillow, still holding her, and listening.

A confused clamor without; a rush of horses and men; a shout and splash of the hoofs of the former on the miry ground; the jangle of accoutrements; oaths, shouts, outcries, and muskets-shots; the ruin of the door, the surgeons gather hastily together, and one of their number quits the building, waving the green sash which he wears as an officer of the day, in the hope that its recognition will secure the safety of the inmates.

"Take mine, dearest!" cries Randolph to Helen, as he tears the sash from his wounded shoulder, seeing his flimsy eyes, which the hand of death is fast glazing. "Bind it around you! it may protect you. I know what is coming!"

A crash of musketry and pistol-shots pouring into the shattered windows interrupts further speech. Helen, overpowered, amidst shrieks of pain, outcries, and expostulations, answered by wild yells, savage oaths, and more savage laughter. When the edifying whirl of smoke that filled the building had passed away Helen Grant lay dead on the lifeless breast which would fain have shielded her, a score of bullets having torn through the faithful heart that had sacrificed Love on the altar of Duty, to bury themselves in the already mangled body of Randolph Wyvil.

And, exulting in their devilish work, the rebels rode off into the rain and darkness.

THE TALE HE TOLD THE MARINES.

"SOME time ago," said Jenkyns to three officers of marines with whom he was sitting smoking cheroots, "I was staying with Sir George P——, the governor of Gibraltar. Great number of people there—all kinds of amusements going on. Driving, riding, fishing, shooting, every thing in short. The governor's daughter, Miss Grace, was also a companion in these expeditions, and I was considerably struck with her. For she was a girl to break any man's heart, she could dance like Terpsichore, she could run like Diana, she walked like Juno, and she looked like Venus. I've even seen her smoke.

"Ah! she was a stunner: you should have heard that girl whistle, and laugh—you should have heard her laugh. She was truly a delightful companion. We rode together, drove together, fished together, walked together, danced together, sang together; I called her Fanny, and she called me Tom. All this could have but one termination, you know. I fell in love with her, and determined to take the first opportunity of proposing. So one day, when we were out together fishing on the lake, I went down on my knees among the gudgeons, seized her hand, pressed it to my waistcoat, and in burning accents entreated her to become my wife.

"'Don't be a fool!' she said. 'Now drop it, do! and put me a fish on my worm.'

"'Oh! Fanny,' I exclaimed; 'don't talk about worms when marriage is in question. Only say—'

"'I will—when you've done it it now,' she replied, angrily, 'if you don't drop it I'll pitch you out of the boat.'

"Gentlemen," said Jenkyns, with strong emotion, "I did not drop it; and I give you my word of honor, with a sudden shove she sent me flying into the water; then seizing the sculls, with a stroke or two she got several yards between us, and burst into a fit of laughter that fortunately prevented her from going any further. I swam up and climbed into the boat. 'Jenkyns,' said I to myself, 'revenge! revenge!' I disguised my feelings. I laughed—hideous mockery of mirth—I laughed. Failed to the bank, went to the house, and changed my clothes. When I appeared at the dinner-table I perceived that every one had been informed of my ducking—universal laughter greeted me. During dinner Fanny repeatedly whispered to her neighbor, and glanced at me. Smothered laughter invariably followed. Revenge,' said I, 'revenge!' The opportunity soon offered. There was to be a balloon ascent from the lawn, and Fanny had incautiously let her mother bring her second with the aeronaut. I instantly took my plans; bribed the aeronaut to plead illness at the moment of departure, and made the ascent myself, learned from him the management of the balloon, though I understood that pretty well before, and calmly waited the result. Fanny arrived. The weather was fine. The balloon was inflated. Fanny was in the car. Every thing was ready, when the aeronaut suddenly fainted. He was carried into the house, and Sir George accompanied him to see that he was properly attended to. Fanny was in despair.

"'Am I to lose my air expedition?' she exclaimed, looking over the side of the car; 'some one understands all the management of this thing, surely? Nobody! Tom,' she called out to me, 'you understand it, don't you?'

"'Perfectly,' I answered.

"'Come along then!' she cried, 'I'm quick; before papa comes back.'

"The cords in general endeavored to dissuade her from her project, but of course in vain. After a decent show of hesitation I climbed into the car. The balloon was cast off, and quickly sailed heavenward. There was scarcely a breath of wind, and we rose almost straight up. We rose above the house, and she laughed, and said,

"'How jolly!'

"We were higher than the highest trees and she smiled, and said it was very kind of me to come with her. We were so high that the people below looked mere specks, and she hoped that I thoroughly understood the management of the balloon. How was my time.

"'Oh, I understand you quite up to part,' I answered; 'we come down in not so easy,' and I whistled.

"'What do you mean?' she cried.

"'Why, when you want to go up faster you throw some sand overboard,' I replied, suiting the action to the word.

"'Don't be foolish, Tom,' she said, trying to appear quite calm and indifferent, but trembling unmistakably.

"'Foolish!' I said. 'Oh, dear no! but whether I go along the ground or up in the air I like to go the pace, and so do you, Fanny, you know. Go it, you cripples!' and over went another sand-bag.

"'Why, you're mad, surely,' she whispered in utter terror, and tried to reach the bags, but I kept her back.

"'Only with love, my dear,' I answered, smiling pleasantly upon my wife love for me. Oh, Fanny, I adore you! Say you will be my wife!'

"'I gave you an answer the other day,' she replied; 'now which I should have thought you would have remembered,' she added, laughing a little, notwithstanding her terror.

"'I cannot take it perfectly,' I answered, 'but I intend to have a different reply to that. You see those five sand-bags; I shall ask you five times to become my wife. Every time you refuse me I shall throw over a sand-bag—so, lady fair, as the cabmen would say, reconsider your decision, and consent to become my wife, Jenkyns.'

"'I won't!' she said; 'I never will! and, let me tell you, that you are acting in a very ungenerous way indeed, Mr. Jenkyns.'

"'You acted in a very ladylike way the other day, did you not,' I rejoined, 'when you knocked me out of the boat?' She laughed again, for she was a plucky girl, and no mistake—a very plucky girl.

"'However,' I went on, 'it's no good arguing about it—will you promise to give me your hand?'

"Never!' she answered. 'I'll go to Uras Major first, though I've got big enough here to do it all conscience. Stay! you'd prefer Aquarius, wouldn't you?'

"She looked so pretty that I was almost inclined to let her off (I was only trying to frighten her, of course—I knew how high we could go safely well enough to carry two), but recollection is one of the strong points of my character, and when I've begun a thing I like to carry it through. I threw over another sand-bag, and whistled the Dead March in Saul.

"'Come, Mr. Jenkyns,' she said, suddenly, 'come, Tom, let us descend now, and I'll promise to say nothing whatever about all this.'

"I continued the execution of the Dead March.

"'But if you do not begin the descent at once I'll tell papa the moment I set foot on the ground.'

"I laughed, seized another bag, and, looking steadily at her, said:

"'Will you promise to give me your hand?'

"'I've answered you already,' was the reply.

"Over went the sand, and the solemn notes of the Dead March resounded through the car.

"'I thought you were a gentleman,' said Fanny, rising up in a terrible rage from the bottom of the car, where she had been sitting, and locking perfectly beautiful in her wrath; 'I thought you were a gentleman, but I find I was mistaken: why a chimney-sweeper would not treat a lady in such a way. Do you know that you are risking your own life as well as mine by your madness?'

"I explained that I adored her so much that to die in her company would be perfect bliss, so that I begged she would not consider my feelings at all. She dashed her beautiful hair from her face, and standing perfectly erect, looking like the Goddess of Anger or Destruction—if you can fancy that personage in a balloon—she said:

"'I command you to begin the descent this instant!'

"The Dead March, whistled in a manner essentially gay and lively, was the only response. After a few minutes' silence, I took up another bag, and said:

"'We are getting rather high; if you do not decide soon we shall have Mercury coming to tell us that we are trespassing—will you promise me your hand?'

She sat in sulky silence in the bottom of the car. I threw over the sand. Then she tried another plan. Throwing herself upon her knees, and imploring me, she said:

"'Oh, forgive me for what I did the other day! It was very wrong, and I am very sorry. Take me home, and I will be a sister to you.'

"'Not a wife?' said I.

"'I can't! I can't!' she answered.

"Over went the fourth bag, and I began to think she would beat me after all; for I did not like the idea of going much higher. I would not give in just yet, however. I whistled for a few moments, to give her time for reflection, and then said:

"'Fanny, they say that marriages are made in Heaven—if you do not take care, ours will be solemnized there.'

"I took up the fifth bag.

"'Come,' I said, 'my wife in life, or my companion in death! Which is it to be?' and I patted the sand-bag in a cheerful manner. She hid her face in her hands, and did not answer. I nursed the bag in my arms, as if it had been a baby.

"'Come, Fanny, give me your promise!'

"I could see her sobs. In the most softhearted creature breathing, and would not pain any living thing, and, I confess, she had beaten me. I hesitated at the ducking: I forgave her for rejecting me. I was on the point of dinging the bag back into the car, and saying: 'Dearest Fanny, forgive me for frightening you. Marry whom soever you will. Give your lovely hand to the lowest groom in your stables—endow with your priceless love the Chief of the Ranks—and his Indians. Whatever happens, Jenkyns is your slave —your dog—your footstool. His duty, henceforth, is to go whithersoever you shall order—to do whatever you shall command.' I was just on the point of saying this, I repeat, when Fanny suddenly looked up, and said, with a quorish expression upon her face:

"'You need not throw that last bag over. I promise to give you my hand.'

"'With all your heart?' I asked, quickly.

"'With all my heart,' she answered, with the same strange look.

"I tossed the bag into the bottom of the car and opened the valve. The balloon descended.

"'Gentlemen,'" said Jenkyns, rising from his seat in the most solemn manner, and stretching out his hand, as if he were going to take an oath; "gentlemen, will you believe it? When we had reached the ground, and the balloon had been given over to its recovered master—when I had helped Fanny herself to the earth, and turned toward her to receive anew the promise of her affection and her hand—will you believe it?—she gave me a box on the ear that upset me against the car, and running to her father, who at that moment came up, she related to him and the assembled company that I had called my disgraceful conduct in the balloon, and ended by informing me that all of her hand that I was likely to get had been already bestowed upon my ear, which she assured me had been given with all her heart.

"'You villain!' said Sir George, advancing toward me with a horse-whip in his hand. 'You villain! I've a good mind to break this over your back!'

"Sir George,' said I, 'villain and Jenkyns must never be coupled in the same sentence; and as for the breaking of this whip, I'll relieve you of the trouble,' and, snatching it from his hand, I broke it in two, and threw the pieces on the ground. 'And now I shall have the honor of wishing you a good-morning. Miss P——, I forgive you.' And I retired.

"Now I ask you whether any specimen of female treachery equal to that has ever come within your experience, and whether any excuse can be made for such conduct?"

THURLOW WEED, ESQ.

ON page 740 we publish a portrait of THURLOW WEED, Esq., from a photograph by Brady—the first ever taken of him. Very few public men of the day are so well known, or so justly entitled to esteem and honor, as Thurlow Weed.

Born, in 1797, at Catskill, New York, he commenced life as a cabin-boy on board a North River sloop; then became "devil" and 'prentice in a printing-office; then, at sixteen, drummer in the army during the war of 1812. His vocation, however, was the press, not the army; and at the close of the war we find him printing and editing a paper in Onondaga County, and afterward in Chenango. His journals do not seem to have succeeded; for at intervals he reappears as a printer, first in New York and then in Albany. We may mention here that, in 1817, he worked at the same press with the senior member of the firm of Harper and Brothers, in the employ of Jonathan Seymour, of this city. His first active connection with politics is said to have been during the canvass which preceded the election of John Quincy Adams; he became still more prominent in the anti-masonic war, in 1826-'27, and during part of this time conducted a journal in Rochester in the interest of the anti-masons.

In the year 1830 the Albany Evening Journal was established, and Mr. Weed became its editor. With a brief interval three or four years since, Mr. Weed has ever since edited that influential sheet, and its consequence and power have been mainly derived from his personal influence and sagacity. It is not too much to say that ever since 1835, for a period of twenty-five years, Mr. Weed's strength in this State has been greater than that of any other man. This power he has owed partly to his intuitive knowledge of character and sagacity, and partly to the general public conviction—which, however assailed, has never been shaken—that he is a pure man, and has no other ruling motive than a desire to promote the good of the country. He has invariably refused to share the spoils of political victory. For a short term, a quarter of a century since, he was State printer, but refused a reappointment; and in early youth he served three terms in the State Legislature. With these exceptions he has never accepted office, though there are few places in the gift of either the Government or the people which he might not have held. It is not understood that he is rich, though he has had ample opportunities of amassing money. He has left that, as well as the rewards of office, to hungrier politicians, and has contented himself with the more substantial prize of political power.

The services rendered by Mr. Weed to the Government since the election of Mr. Lincoln have been great. His influence in raising the movement of troops and the purchase of supplies has been untiring. He has really been "the State" in this part of the country, from which the troops have come and drawn no pay. It was he who, with the aid of detectives, discovered the plot which was to have brought Mr. Lincoln secretly to the capital, close in Baltimore in February last, and who frustrated the plot by the famous night-journey through Baltimore. What Mr. Weed has been instructed with General Scott, during the terrible days of March and April last, will never be known until the secret history of that eventful time comes to be written.

Mr. Weed left this port on Saturday last for Europe. He leaves himself in the gross on private business; the public, however, will be apt to suspect that his private business concerns the public interest. If the suspicion be correct, we may feel assured that our country will suffer no mischance in his hands. Few men in the country are such true patriots as Thurlow Weed.

REBEL BATTERIES ON THE POTOMAC.

On page 742 we publish two pictures of the Rebel BATTERIES ON THE POTOMAC, from sketches from an occasional correspondent with the Potomac flotilla. One represents the batteries at Evansport; the sketch was taken from the mouth of Chicamocon Creek, directly opposite: the other is Budd's Ferry, on the Maryland shore, directly opposite the batteries, where our troops now are. The Herald correspondent thus speaks of the rebel batteries on the Potomac:

The batteries, as far as they are known to exist, and without counting such as may remain unknown, now begin at Occoquan's Neck, that into extending four miles, to Claiborne creek, and thence to Quantico, a line of eight miles to Aquia creek, where, as is well known, another line of batteries begins, extending to Potomac creek, a distance of six and three-quarter miles. From Potomac creek to Falmouth is a distance of fifteen miles in a straight line, or, following the curve of the shore, seventeen miles. From the former point, on the Virginia side, is a chain of earth-works, but no guns are believed to be mounted. Some distance above Falmouth, with the division of Phelps's chain this morning, and have not been guessed at. With regard to the batteries, I have seen them, and more than once near feeling them to some purpose. Going up the Potomac, especially from Occoquan's Neck to Potomac creek, with a probable gap between, for which I could not learn to prevent communication, a line of batteries of nearly twenty miles is clearly made out; and that without taking into account the space between Potomac creek and Mathias Point, or calculating on the strong probability of masked batteries between Freestone's Neck and Freestone Point, in the opposite direction.

COLONEL DOUGHERTY,

OF THE TWENTY-SECOND ILLINOIS REGIMENT.

We publish on page 741, from a sketch by Mr. Bill Travis, a portrait of the gallant COLONEL DOUGHERTY, who was taken prisoner at the battle at Belmont, Missouri, on the 7th inst. Colonel Henry Dougherty was born in Wilmington, North Carolina, Aug. 15, 1827. In 1833 his father emigrated to Carlyle, Clinton County, Illinois, where, shortly after their arrival, both of his parents died; so, when only eight years of age, he was left an orphan, to provide for and protect himself. He remained on a farm until sixteen years of age, when, having a passion for adventure, he joined a Rocky Mountain Fur Company, and remained with them one year. On his return to St. Louis he enlisted as a private in the First United States Dragoons, Captain Bergain: went to Oregon, and joined Colonel Steptoe's command. In the spring of 1816 he went to New Mexico with the same company, and served through the whole Mexican war, under the command of Generals Scott, Taylor, and Harney. He was in nine different battles—viz., Kenyardo, Lambutla, Taos, Brasito (on the Rio Grande), Sacramento, Buena Vista, and at the taking of the City of Mexico.

A little incident which occurred at the battle of Taos will illustrate his character. He was severely wounded in the leg from a rifle-ball, fell from his horse, and tried to get off. He no longer ran, about four hundred yards off, but he became faint and blind. Surgeon Simpson came to his support and carried him to the hospital, dressed his wound, and laid him upon a cot. At this time another of his company was brought in wounded, and while the doctor was looking after him, Colonel D. (then a private), receiving somewhat, slipped out at the rear end of the tent, mounted his horse, and galloped to the hottest of the battle. Smarting from his wound, he fought like a madman till the fight was over, when he returned to the hospital, entirely exhausted, he received a severe reprimand from the doctor, who knew nothing of his absence. When asked why he did so, he only replied, "The fight was not over yet, and I thought it my duty to go and do my part." It was three weeks before he left his cot again. At this time he was only nineteen years of age.

At the close of the war he sailed from Vera Cruz for New Orleans, and was wrecked at Brazos Santiago. He then returned again to New Mexico, and joined Colonel Sumner's command against the Navijo and Apache Indians. On receiving his discharge he returned to Carlyle, in 1852. In 1855 he married, and since then has resided on his farm at Carlyle. At the call of President Lincoln he raised a company, but failed to get accepted. He then joined Captain Johnson's company as a private, was elected lieutenant, and at the election of regimental officers was unanimously elected Colonel.

Colonel Dougherty stands full six feet high, is finely proportioned, an agreeable companion, perfectly unassuming, strictly temperate and religious, being a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Ladies — Try it.

ANDREWS' EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER, for many years established in public favor, is still the most desirable article for the Delicate Housekeeper. This compound is perfectly healthful and delicate, and ready for use in one minute! There can be no delay or mishap in the raising of Bread, Pancakes, or Tea Biscuits! It is the acting preparation extant. Dr. CHILTON'S certificate of its efficacy and wholesomeness on each label. Ask your Grocer for ANDREWS' YEAST POWDER. On using it, you will tell him it is THE BEST!

Sold at Wholesale by

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,

138 and 140 Cedar Street, New York.

DR. BRONDRETH'S COMPOUND RHEUMATIC and NEURALGIC

A successful Combination, Neuralgia, and Pain Disease. Wholesale Agents E. C. WELLS & CO., 115 Franklin St., New York. Sold by Apothecaries everywhere.

Cloaks! Cloaks!

BRODIE

has made his

Grand Opening

of

Fall and Winter Cloaks,

at his

OLD STAND,

300 Canal Street,

and

His Palace of Fashion,

Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,

Cor. of 23d Street,

New York.

A New Cartridge Revolver,

Carrying Six Balls (60 to the pound). Any one wanting a superior Pocket or Belt Arm will find this to be the best in the market. Price $12 00. Send for circular.

MERWIN & BRAY, Agents, 165 Broadway, N. Y.

Friends of Soldiers!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, and all other places, should be sent, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged 25 cents.

IMPORTANT Information sent to weak and debilitated Females. Address Dr. C. M. BROWN, N. Y.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—A Clergyman having cured his son of Consumption in its worst stages, after being given up to die by the most celebrated physicians, desires to make known the mode of cure, which proves successful in every case to those afflicted with Coughs, Colds, and Consumption, and he will send it free of charge to all who desire it and will forward him their address. Address

DANIEL ADEE, 578 Pearl Street, New York.

PATTEN'S

APPROVED

MILITARY WORKS,

PUBLISHED IN THE

English and German Languages.

Price Twenty-five Cents each.

CAVALRY DRILL,

Containing the

SCHOOLS OF THE TROOPER, PLATOON, AND SQUADRON.

165 Pages and 93 Engravings.

ARTILLERY DRILL,

Containing the

MANUAL OF THE PIECE AND LIGHT BATTERY MANOEUVRES.

160 Pages and 73 Engravings.

INFANTRY TACTICS,

PART I.,

Containing the School of the Soldier, Manual of Arms for both Mounted and Rifle, School of the Company, Instruction for Skirmishers, Bayonet Drill and the Small Sword Exercise.

160 Pages and 92 Engravings.

INFANTRY TACTICS,

PART II.,

Containing Instruction in the School of the Battalion.

160 Pages and 45 Engravings.

Parts I and 2 INFANTRY TACTICS can be had bound in one Volume. Price Fifty Cents.

ARMY MANUAL,

Containing Instruction for Officers in the preparation of

ROLLS, RETURNS, AND REPORTS,

And papers pertaining to the Subsistence and Quartermaster's Departments. Price Two Dollars.

This work contains many forms in constant use that are not introduced in the published Army Regulations. It also contains instructions how and when the several duties are to be performed, none of which are contained in any other work. It also recommends itself to the soldier on account of its condensed form and portability. It is bound in flexible morocco, and can be carried without inconvenience about the person, and will be sent free by mail on receipt of the price, Two Dollars, by the Publisher,

J. W. FORTUNE,

Chatham Street, New York.

Wholesale Dealers, the Trade, and Sutlers supplied by

H. DEXTER & CO., } 121 Nassau St., N. Y.

ROSS & TOUSEY, }

A. WILLIAMS & CO., Newsdealers, Washington St., Boston, Mass.

HENRY TAYLOR, Baltimore, Md.

T. R. CALLENDER, Philadelphia, Pa.

MOSES E. WILSON, Chicago, Ill.

251 Pennsylvania Av., Washington, D. C.

J. R. WALSH, Chicago, Ill.

GRAY & CRAWFORD, St. Louis, Mo.

!!!For Beautiful White Teeth!!!

Use Thurston's Tooth Powder. For Hard and Healthy Gums, use Thurston's Tooth Wash. Price 25 cents.

F. C. WELLS & CO., 115 Franklin Street, N. Y.

AT GIMBREDE'S Stationery Depot and Card Engraving Establishment, 585 Broadway, a line of Initialed Note Paper and Envelopes is marketed, forwarded free of charge on receipt of Three Dollars.

585 Broadway, Gimbrede's Wedding Cards, Unurpassed for Beauty and Finish.

THE BEST portable or Cabinet Printing Presses can be had of JOHN R. NEVILL, Camden, Md. Send for Circular. Also STAMPS of all kinds.

The New Gas Lamps,

For burning Warren's Coze-Naptha and other Coal Oils as safe and economical for public and private buildings, gives great satisfaction. Sample lamp $5. "Verger" Lamps for churches, &c., always repaired and altered to burn these Oils. Send Stamp for Circular. CALLENDER & BRADLEY, 113 Broadway, N. Y., up stairs.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance, which can not fail—free by 25 cents. Address T. William & Co., Publishers, Box 2240, Philad.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT to HIRE AGENTS in every County at $75 per month and expenses, to sell a new and cheap Family Machine. Address (with stamp) S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—Dr. Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (or the money sent back) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of the order. E. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Commercial Agents wanted. Large commission, honorable business. Circular sent. A.W. Harrison, Phila.

COOLEY'S Cabinet Printing Office for small Printers and Amateurs. Price $3. Send for Circulars.

J. G. COOLEY & CO., 1 Spruce Street, N. Y

JEWELRY! JEWELRY!—The Head-Quarters for the Latest Styles of fine and cheap Jewelry. Miniature Fins of all the Heroes. Persons wishing to see Specimens, enclose stamp for full particulars. W. A. HAYWARD (Manufacturing Jeweler), 208 Broadway.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS.—(SELMUS'S Patent), 501 Broadway, New York.

Send for a Circular.

$150 PER MONTH made by enterprising agents selling DOWNER'S HEMMER and SHIELD for hand sewing. Protects the finger and makes a beautiful hem. Sample and terms sent on receipt of 25 cents. Address A. H. DOWNER, No. 442 Broadway.

THE FIRST TELEGRAPHIC MESSAGE FROM CALIFORNIA.

"It is understood that Messrs. SLIDELL and MASON are empowered to pledge CERTAIN SOUTHERN INTERESTS to Great Britain and France on condition of their establishing a Protectorate over the Southern Confederacy."—Daily Paper.

For the Holidays.

Read what the New York Tribune, Nov. 8th, says:—

THE UNION PRIZE STATIONERY AND RECIPE PACKAGE.

We have been shown a package of Stationery and Jewelry put up by Messrs. Rickards & Co., of No. 102 Nassau Street, and must express our surprise at the quantity and quality of the articles they give for 25 cents. We must confess we were organical at first, but seeing is believing. There is no secret in their trade. As they are largely engaged in the manufacture of Jewelry, and purchase all their other articles for cash, they manage, by their large sales and strict business integrity, to make a small profit on each package. There is no need of our citizens going to strange stores when they want small quantities, and paying exorbitant prices, when they can get a dollar's worth for twenty-five cents. They have completely revolutionized the Stationery business, and now a poor man can get as much Stationery as he will want in a year for twenty-five cents. They are, indeed, public benefactors.

AGENTS — EITHER MALE OR FEMALE will be convinced, by sending a stamp for our circular, that our Prize Package

Contains more Articles,
of a better quality, and Sells more Readily

than any other in the market. For your benefit we enumerate each article in the package:—Six sheets commercial note paper, six sheets ladies' note, six sheets bolted paper, one accommodation penholder, two fine steel pens, one pencil, one sheet blotting paper, one fine engraving (size) of General McClellan, six white envelopes, with patriotic Union designs in colors, six ladies' white envelopes in beautiful colors, six buff envelopes.

Seventy-five Valuable Recipes, which alone make the package sell rapidly. In addition to these articles, we give with each package a
SUPERB PIECE OF JEWELRY,
of a richer quality than anything in the market, and
WORTH DOUBLE THE PRICE
paid for the whole, consisting of the following articles:—Brooches, lockets, sleeve buttons, rings, crosses, gentspins, &c. If the contents of one of our packages were purchased elsewhere they would cost at least $1. Agents can make from $5 to $10 a day.

Read what the New York Times, Nov. 9th, says:
A BLESSING FOR POOR PEOPLE.

A man who gives a dollar's worth of anything for twenty-five cents in these hard times is a friend to the poor man, in the broadest sense of the term. Rickards & Co., No. 102 Nassau Street, are public benefactors. They put up a Stationery and Jewelry package containing such a quantity of useful articles, that if bought elsewhere, would cost about one dollar. We are assured by parties who sell their packages that 85 a day can be realized by agents.
RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Fine Shirts & Collars

On hand and made to order in any style, by

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York.

Winter Gloves, Undershirts, &c.

Our large stock at very low prices, all qualities and sizes.
Wholesale or Retail.
IRA PEREGO & SONS,
No. 61 Nassau Street, or No. 175 Broadway.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS

Retailed at Wholesale Prices,
Made to Measure at $18 per doz.
OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS.
MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2 50 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

10 yards of New York Mills Muslin of 14c c. per yd. $1 40
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard..... 3 50
Making and cutting..... 6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 60c..... 1 60
Profit..... 5 50
Total..... $18 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

Ladies are invited to call and examine the splendid stock of fine furs and children's fancy hats now open at WARD'S, 387 Broadway, New York.

To the Public.

Permit us to inform you that we have now opened a complete and extensive assortment of
NEW GOODS,
adapted for fall and winter clothing, to which we particularly call your personal inspection, and which we are willing to make up to order in our usual well known style of excellence. From our many advantages, although a great advance has taken place in all fashionable imported goods within sixty days.

Assuring you of our continued determination to merit the confidence we have so long enjoyed, we are
Your obedient servants,
T. DERBY & COMPANY,
Tailors and Importers, 57 Walker street.

By the request of many of our customers, and during the present disturbed state of public affairs, we are declaring no fine pay coat, for ready money in all purchases from this date.

Army and Navy Equipments positively not cash on delivery.

For List of VALUABLE CHEAP MILITARY BOOKS, See Inside, Page 761.

The New Gothic Furnace,
For warming Houses, Stores, Churches, &c. GREAT IMPROVEMENT IN HEATING! Combining the advantages of steam and hot water. Also for sale, Portables, Registers, and the Polar Refrigerator.
BARTLETT & LEACH,
No. 406 Broadway, N. Y.
Send for a Circular.

Portable Printing Offices
For the use of Business and Professional Men who would like to do their own Printing. Send for a Circular.
ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 31 Park Row, N. Y.

Chapped Hands, Face, Lips, &c.
Certain cure and preventive. HEGEMAN & CO.'S CAMPHORINE WITH GLYCERINE will keep the hands soft in the coldest weather. Sold by druggists generally. Price 25 cents; sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.
HEGEMAN & CO., Chemists and Druggists, N. Y.

AGENTS.—THE STORM INDICATOR, or 25 cent Barometer; unrivalled and most reliable curiosity out. Sample 50 cents. Address Stubbard Bros., 63 Nassau St., N. Y.

A GREAT STORY by a POPULAR AUTHOR.
NOW READY IN
THE NEW YORK WEEKLY,
The greatest Story and Sketch Paper of the Age, a New and Thrilling Historical Romance, entitled
THE SEXTON OF SAXONY;
Or, The Bride's Burial.
From the Pen of
FRANCIS S. SMITH,
Author of "Forsters Widow," "Florence O'Neil," &c, The Rebel's Daughter," "Lilian, the Wanderer," "Maggie, the Child of Charity," "Calumet, the Gladiator," &c., &c., &c.
For sale everywhere.

SPLENDID WINTER FASHIONS, NOW READY.—Extraordinary and best Fashion Magazine, brilliant Novelties, reliable Information, large and magnificent Fashion Plates, nearly 100 fine Engravings, and over 60 cents worth of threefold sized Patterns in each number of Mme. DEMOREST'S Quarterly Mirror of Fashion, winter number now ready. Yearly, $1, with a valuable premium; single copies 25c. Postage 3c. Published at 473 Broadway, and sold everywhere. Indispensable to every lady, mother, milliner and dressmaker in the Union, especially to ladies who are desirous of improving their taste and skill in arranging leaders or children's dresses. Ladies, do not fail to see the splendid winter number, now ready. The full-sized Patterns alone are worth more than twice its cost, comprising a new and elegant Cloak Sleeve, and Ladies' Zouave Jacket.

WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Marriage Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 129 Broadway. Samples by mail.

Devlin & Co.

We are this week in receipt of large importations of choice
WINTER OVERCOATINGS,
FRENCH CASSIMERES,
NEW STYLES VESTINGS,
WINTER UNDERWEAR.
And have also added largely to our superior stock of ready made
WINTER CLOTHING,
All of which we are selling at exceedingly low prices.
DEVLIN & CO.,
Corner of Broadway and Warren and Grand Streets.

Agents Wanted.—Something New.
Articles of REAL MERIT wanted in every family: "Patent Hosery" or "Table Mantas."—Sample by mail 25c.—Recips, with Family Right to make it, $5. "Clark's Patent Indelible Pencil," for marking linen; "Patent Match Safe," for vest pocket; "Downer's Patent Hemmer and Shield;" "Coffee Strainer and Economizer;" "Egyptian Cement," for family use; "Patent Work-Holder." Satisfaction given or money refunded. Address (with stamp) RICE & CO., 83 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Snow's Pure Confectionery,
200 Kinds, 622 Broadway, N. Y. Wholesale and Retail. Dealers enclose stamp for catalogue and price.

CHOICE FURS. No. 49 Broadway. Opening at Retail of an entirely new stock of Sable, Mink and other choice FURS, to the most desirable styles, much below usual prices.
S. GOSS,
Practical Furrier.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 257.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MAJOR-GENERAL HALLECK, U.S.A., COMMANDING OUR ARMY IN MISSOURI.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

MAJOR-GEN. HALLECK, U. S. A.

ON the preceding page we publish a portrait of the new Commander in Missouri, MAJOR-GENERAL HALLECK, United States Army, from a photograph kindly furnished us by Mrs. Halleck.

Major-General Henry Wager Halleck was born on Long Island, New York, about the year 1818, and graduated at West Point in the class of 1839. He stood second in his class, Brigadier-General Stevens, of Oregon, now in command of a brigade at Beaufort, South Carolina, alone outranking him. On the 1st of July, 1839, he received a commission as Second Lieutenant of Engineers, and remained at the Academy as Professor for a year.

In 1840 he published a military work on "Bitumen and its Uses," etc. In January, 1845, he was appointed First Lieutenant; and during that year he was ordered, by the committee of the Lowell Institute, at Boston, to deliver one of the regular courses of lectures—the subject being "Military Science and Art." These lectures he compiled into a neat volume during the following year, adding thereto a lengthy introduction on the "Justifiableness of War." The work contains much valuable elementary instruction, as well as abundance of historical illustration, and is written with marked ability. In 1847 he was brevetted Captain for gallant conduct in affairs with the enemy on the 19th and 20th days of November, 1847, and for meritorious services in California. He was Secretary of State of the province of California, under the military governments of Generals Kearney, Mason, and Riley, from 1847 to the end of 1849. He was chief of the staff to Commodore Shubrick in the naval and military operations on the Pacific coast in 1847 and 1848, and was a member of the Convention in 1849 to form, and of the Committee to draft, the Constitution of the State of California. In July, 1853, he was appointed Captain of Engineers, and resigned August 1, 1854.

Independent of his military capacity, General Halleck is ranked as an able lawyer, in all branches of his appointment, being the principal partner in the law firm of Halleck, Billings, & Co., of San Francisco. He left his lucrative business and took up arms in defence of the cause of the Government of the United States, and was created by Congress a Major-General of the Army, his commission bearing date August 19, 1861. He is, with good authority, reputed to be a very wealthy man and a good soldier.

He has just published a most important work on "International Law," the fruit of fifteen years' study.

The country expects great things of General Halleck. His past record and his physiognomy encourage the belief that these expectations will not be disappointed.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1861.

THE PROSPECT.

THE arrest of the rebel ex-Senators Mason and Slidell fills the cup of the perplexities of the traitors. Upon the success of the efforts of those experienced politicians the last hope of the insurgents depended. From the first they admitted that they were incapable of coping with the North; but they relied on the power of King Cotton, and felt certain that Great Britain and France would help them by breaking the blockade. Seven months of actual warfare without European interference have somewhat shaken that conviction; but still it was hoped that the consummate address of Mason and Slidell would verify the predictions of the authors of the rebellion. The capture of these worthies overturns the scheme, and annihilates the rebel hopes at a blow.

In truth, as we remarked in a recent number, the hand of a just Providence has been heavily laid, of late, upon the wicked wretches who have tried to destroy our Government.

The published correspondence between Secretary Memminger and the cotton planters shows that the latter are grievously straitened for want of a market for their produce; those who reflect upon the wants of a slave-holding planter will readily realize how imperious his necessities are, how intolerable the rent which rendered his condition. Governor Pickens's Message affords further evidence of the suffering of the rebels. Refugees all agree in stating that the distress which prevails at New Orleans, Mobile, and other cities which were formerly centres of Southern activity and industry, is without precedent in history. Every branch and description of business is paralyzed, and thousands of people are fed daily at New Orleans by a State charity. The strength of the South is now its weakness: the people who have grown rich by using the labor of 4,000,000 of human beings without paying them for it, are now impoverished by the necessity of feeding and clothing those four millions without getting any return for their outlay. The merchant has no business to transact; the shipowner can get no ships to sea; the planter can not sell his produce; the laborer can not obtain work; all classes are suffering acutely from the want of articles of prime necessity—woolen cloths, leather, boots, needles, drugs, tools of all kinds, and the thousand and one articles for which the shiftless South has always been dependent on the industrious North. In a military aspect the South has been ground steadily ever since the battle of Bull Run. Our fortifications at Washington are now impregnable, and the hope of taking that city is lost forever. Maryland is now firmly secured to the Union, and we garrison Accomac County, Virginia. Kentucky has cast her lot with the North: Zollicoffer has abandoned the all-important position of Cumberland Gap, and it seems doubtful now whether all the forces of Tennessee will save Buckner from the fate of Williams. The rebels have been fairly expelled from the soil of Missouri. The defeat of Lyon and the capture of Lexington have proved barren victories, which have cost the rebels men and money, and have had the same results as would have ensued from defeats. On the coast we hold Hatteras, which puts an end to privateering; we hold Port Royal, the best sea-port on the Atlantic coast; we hold Fort Pickens, and will soon be in possession of Pensacola: our blockade is as nearly perfect as any blockade can be. Every privateer sent to sea by the insurgents has either been taken or wrecked; our fleet suffers a safety through the Gulf of Mexico as they did before the war. On every side we see the same evidences of decay of rebel strength and defeat of rebel schemes.

On the other hand, the Union has during the past summer been slowly gathering up its strength for the fight, and the result is one of which an American citizen may well be proud. The United States army will number 575,000 men under arms, including the regiments not yet sent forward from their States. They have over 300 ships of every known kind at sea and in the various dock-yards and navy-yards—enough to blockade every creek from the capes of the Chesapeake to the Rio Grande. And—what is still more important—the country is ready money to pay their soldiers and sailors and to carry on the war. The Associated Banks of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston have already lent the Government a loan of $150,000,000, another sum of $250,000,000 will be forthcoming on 1st January; besides which the people have taken and hold in circulation $13,000,000 of United States Notes, a legal-tender issue, which is convertible into the amount daily. All this has been done without any panic or trouble in the money market; there has been no dinger of any suspension of specie payments, or forced issues of paper money; and there is no prospect of any thing of the kind. Our foreign relations are steadily improving. In April last, Europe was convulsed at "the republican bubble had burst." Now every Court in Europe is satisfied that the Republic is strong enough to maintain itself against all comers, and the Foreign Minister of any power would warn a British subjects against infringing our blockade. There is no fear now that Europe will interfere with the suppression of the rebellion.

We have, since last year, conquered Missouri, Kentucky, and Maryland; we have rendered Washington safe beyond all hazard; we have occupied two important sea-ports on the rebel coast; we have driven the rebel chief of the mob which flocked to the defense of the country when the war broke out; we have got rid of incompetent officers, and have put our soldiers at the head of our troops; we have created a navy; we have, in a word, developed in this country a military and naval strength equal, if not superior, to that of any Power, incidentally superior to that of any other nation in the world.

We are now commencing our work. The past has been experimental merely. We are now going to see how long it will take millions of people, without industry, without money, without military resources, and with the distracting element of three and a half millions of natural enemies among them, and under the deliberately gathered strength of twenty-one millions of people, who have emphatically staked their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor on the suppression of the rebellion and the maintenance of their united nationality. Every day now we shall be making history.

THE LOUNGER.

JOHN BULL

A FRIEND just from England says that he met very few Englishmen who were not in full sympathy with the rebellion in this country; and yet not one of them thought that in any case England would or should interfere. The persons he saw were chiefly of the mercantile class, and they naturally regard our civil war from a single point of commercial interest. They do not understand, nor ought they to be expected to understand, the merits of the case.

But this testimony only confirms the conviction that we are vindicating ourselves in every way by the war. We have to teach other Powers that we are a nation. We have, by the maintenance of our Government, to put Toryism of every kind in the wrong. We have, by the same means, to conquer the confidence of Trade. The malicious hate of the London Times, the sneering, caustic flippancy of the Saturday Review, are nothing against the argument nor propitiated by silence. They will hiss, and strike, and sting as they have begun. They will disbelieve in our success until we succeed, and then they will prophesy that our success is a delusion. The spirit that animates such journals will never be just, or candid, or noble, or friendly, or human. It will always be British, and nothing else.

But the British ignorance and jealousy of America and American affairs will not, as our friend testifies, and as the chief organs of opinion show, lead England to embroil herself in our struggles. To do so would be to plunge the world into war. The occasion of interference would be the English necessity of cotton. But the first question that Power asks herself is, of course, whether war helps her necessity of cotton. No. But how much cotton is she likely ever to carry from America if she tries to obtain it forcibly? Such a movement upon the part of England would be scarcely less fatal than this rebellion. The whole energy of our people, devoted for the last half century, with such amazing success, to trade, would be turned to war. We should accept arms as our career for a generation. The slaves would be at once emancipated without any more hesitation. The cotton that was not destroyed by brave hands in the store-houses would be conveyed to England by a fleet. The vast merchant service of the United States, suddenly changed to war ships, would strike at English commerce in every sea. The American market for British cotton goods would be lost. The American supply of grain would be cut off. The five million of English subjects who live upon starvation wages, and for whom the poor-rate would be very heavily become at once the most dangerous army of paupers in the very heart of the kingdom. How much cotton is England likely to get, and at what price, when these are the necessary expenses?

Recognition of the rebellious section as an independent power is simply Mandarin nonsense. Attention. There are certain immutable truths in the conduct of human affairs: and one of the most fixed is, that the foreign like friend of the North or Northern States of this country will not suffer themselves to be expunged as a nation without a struggle. It is not even understood in any part of your youth, their vigor, their intelligence, and their Saxon quality.

In the event of some great disaster to our arms, it is the opinion of the most enlightened Americans in Europe that the rebellious section would be acknowledged immediately. But the great body of active themselves who suppose that such a movement would compel us to submit to the insurrection. It would be only a long and costly struggle. But we are quite as prepared for war, all things considered, as any nation. If we did not come out successful, certainly England would not come out scathless.

England has thrown away our friendship. For if she has any political sense she knows the course of our current history, he is aware that the spirit in our politics which has hitherto alienated foreign sympathy, and forced us to rely upon ourselves, is daily to destroy our Government. Consequently the opposing spirit is one which would have bound us more strongly in friendship ties with other powers. Had those powers not especially England, valued our friendship, they would have shown us natural sympathy. Certainly the fault is not ours that we are now regarded in feeling than if a year ago, since the Revolution. Certainly the fault will not be ours even if English jealousy becomes active and goes to war. That is not probable. But the alienation of the two nations is already accomplished.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

OUGHT we to exchange prisoners with the rebels? And if so, how? and why?

After the battle of Bull Run, when Secretary Cameron sent a letter to "whom it may concern" for the return of the body of the Colonel of the New York Seventy-ninth, the rebel General looked at the note, and said, sarcastically, "It doesn't concern me." And he sent the messengers.

In a war of this kind words are things. General Washington would not receive letters addressed to him simply as George Washington. They had to be required to be addressed as General of an army. It was natural, for he was a General of an army. Whether he liked the title or not he was signified by so, was not his affair. So the rebels have an army: an army naturalized to unite the work of Washington. Are they to receive only as Generals, or commanding officers. Is there any harm in saying so? If the address will lead to negotiations by which good men may be recovered, is there any sacrifice of honor?

On the other hand, if the condition of an exchange of prisoners be that the rebel leaders shall be addressed by the United States as a Government, we ought not to wish for an exchange. If we can not recover our men even in any other way than by calling Mr. Davis President of the Confederate States, the brave men who have been taken prisoners are not worth the price. We ought to be the very first to refuse an exchange. The army of the rebels is a fact, and must be so treated; but their government is a mere pretense, and must be so regarded.

But again, if they choose to release our captive soldiers upon their promise to bear arms against them, that is a matter for the soldiers themselves to decide. The difficulty in the way of our doing this is that the Catholic rebels regard the men of the Spaniards regarded Protestants, and hold that there need be no faith with heretics. If Southern officers do not feel themselves bound by the flag and their oath to the service of their country, why should we expect them to be bound by any other oath of allegiance or loyalty? If Ellsworth be caught and released upon his oath, would there be any doubt that he would fire at us the first gun he safely could? And if Ellsworth would do these we do not wish to insult any man by comparing him to Floyd—but could we wisely expect his soldiers to regard their oath?

There are not wanting those who say that the war must be taken as a fact, and its conduct governed by the rules of war; and that to address the Confederates as a power, in order to effect an exchange, is not to regard them any less as rebels. But is there much doubt that such an act at the close of the first campaign, and under all the circumstances of that campaign, would be regarded by other nations as a most significant and suspicious sign?

The question is grave. It is a terrible thing to leave our brave men in the hands of such an enemy as the rebels. It is hard for men going into battle to think that, if captured, they can not be exchanged. But it is a consciousness that weighs equally upon both parties. And if the condition of exchange be the recognition of the rebels as citizens of the rebellion, will not [illegible]? Yes, it is hard enough. But it is the [illegible] which we have to do our duty. They also serve who only stand and wait?"

THE WAR AND PUBLIC CRITICISM.

THE great principles of our political system are still unattacked although the war is raging. The right of candid discussion is not lost, nor is honorable criticism of the management of public affairs suppressed, or thought by any intelligent man to be suppressed. Constant, unsparing, unscrupulous attacks upon the Administration, prompted by palpable sympathy with treason, will be stopped with the cordial approbation of all loyal citizens. In like manner, incessant sneers, taunts, gibes, and insinuations upon the part of men and papers whose loyalty can not be suspected, although not to be repressed by authority, will certainly be condemned by patriotism and the public good sense.

We are to bear in mind that the administration of the Government in its present hands follows and does not lead public opinion. The President is a man of unsuspected honesty, and entirely unskilled in the dangerous sense. He is emphatically not Chief Minister. His aim is to be the interpreter of the law, and to be guided implicitly by the wishes of the nation. Hence, when General Fremont issued his proclamation freeing the slaves of rebels, the President, who did not mean to pass beyond the strict letter himself, and did not intend that any of his officers should, modified the proclamation so as to bring it verbally within the exact scope of the Act of confiscation. Congress, or the representatives of the people, had not disapproved, after saving precisely what they wished to have done. The President was of opinion that it was not for him or any other officer to do any thing more or less.

Public opinion is thus emphatically the guide of the emergency: and public opinion can only speak through honest and loyal debate. The utmost candor in the discussion of all subjects, limited only by good faith and common sense, will foster the condition of our success. If the discussion be not conducted in good temper, and with a tone which indicates an earnest wish for success, there will be captious, and clearly the result of prejudice and spleen—the remedy, and it is a sure one, lies in the same public opinion. To abdicate the right of fair and firm criticism at this era of our history is to betray the citadel. It is a Turkish stupor of subservience which would call our state upon the rack structed by the history of the summer and of the year. The more sagacious members will see that the wording of the law is vague. What is "aiding or promoting an insurrection?" If a man gives a rebel a gun, isn't that "aiding?" If he stays at home to do the rebel's work while the rebel creeps to the Potomac to use the rifle upon Baker — perchance upon M'Clellan — isn't that "promoting?" When Congress has meditated this question with "forbearance, patience, confidence," there are few loyal Representatives or Senators of any party who will not say, "Let the law say exactly what justice and common-sense require and the people wish."

And we shall not be surprised if the present session fourth of the Act of Confiscation is not amended to read: "The property, real and personal, of all persons who shall take up arms against the United States, or who shall be directly proven to have taken active part with their enemies in the field, is declared to be confiscated to the public use; and their slaves, if any they have, are hereby declared free men."

The necessity of this step may not yet plainly appear to all sincerely loyal citizens. Then until it does, or until it is substantially the public conviction, as Colonel Cochrane thinks it already is, let us remember M'Clellan's golden motto: "Forbearance, patience, confidence." The perception of the justice, the cause, and the necessity of the measure is sure to come. The permanent peace of the country and the manly honor of every citizen are sure to be saved. We have only to await the inevitable course of events, while we solicit the most searching and sincere discussion. Think how we have educated ourselves in a year! "Forbearance," says our wise young General, "patience, confidence," and all will be well.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

CAUTION TO WOOL-GATHERERS.—To those English steamers who are attempting to run the blockade of South America we beg to repeat the Spanish proverb: Take care, in going in search of wool, that you do not return home fleeced.

THE PERFECTION OF NEEDLE-WORK.—It is quite a prize pattern, if a body can "hem" a reticule without there being a single cross-stitch in it.

A BEND SINISTER.—A bow from a dun.

Flowers have their language, why not their religion? Of course it would be Buddhism.

Can a man who is charged with not having a right to a vote because he has copied it, justifiably plead that he has a copyright?

Can a man who has been fined by the magistrates again and again be considered a refined man?

Why does a confectioner resemble one of the West India Islands?—Because he is a jam-maker (Jamaica).

FLOWER GARDEN FOR NOVEMBER.—Now is the time for forcing. If you are not a good whist-player, the simplest plan will be to make good use of your best spade and a little art.

FANCY GARDENING.—Dump a postage-stamp and sow mustard and cress; it has a very pretty effect on a writing-desk. Plant your feet firmly somewhere ready for a good spring into your neighbor's garden—you may look for a speedy return.

KITCHEN GARDEN FOR NOVEMBER.—Dig deep into the vegetable and fruit rows to see how every thing is getting on. If not satisfied, dig on. To save capsicum, transplant your neighbor's available shrubs to your own garden. Select good dry soil for Greek roots.

TO SAVE A PERSON FROM DROWNING.—Run to him at once. Throw your great-coat over him, roll the patient in it until quite dry, at the rate of two shillings an hour. Stamp on his hands and face to restore animation, and drink his health in several glasses of stiff brandy-and-water.

ASK BARON BRAMWELL.—When a judge retires from the bench may he be said to "lay down the law?"

STOUT PRIVATE. "Oh Jem, I wish I'd your Legs!"
LEAN PRIVATE. "Why so, Bill?"
STOUT PRIVATE. "Because I could Rev from the first battle, and then they'd be sure to elect me SHERIFF or Alderman or maybe Mayor of New York."

CHROMATIC ASPIRATIONS.—We recently read a dramatic criticism which, in speaking of the omission of the music of an operetta, said that "it suffered from the injudicious application of the harmonic pruning-knife?" Harmonic pruning-knife is good; but did not the critic mean to say harmonic tuning-fork?

EARLY PLEASURE.—The individual who told his physician, the other day, that he was perfectly satisfied he had consumption, is the same who, a few years ago, was transported with delight.

THE PANGS OF ABSENCE.—The French say with great truth, "The Absent are always in the wrong;" and more especially are they, when they forget to send you a Money-Order to console one for their absence.—A Poor Pensioner of a wife, abandoned by her wretch of a UNCLE of the Sick-side.

ADVICE TO BACHELORETS.—The Hunchback dog not see his own tail, but he see clearly the hoard of worker bunchback. Therefore, it is well to know what there is of our own back before we venture to laugh behind the backs of others.

A bankrupt was confided with the other day for his embarrassment. "Oh, he is not embarrassed at all," said he; "it's my creditors that are embarrassed."

An Irish guide told Dr. James Johnson, who wished for a reason why Echo was always of the feminine gender, that "Maybe it was because she always had the last word."

"Johnny," said a mother to a son nine years old, "go and wash your face. I am ashamed to see you coming to church with so dirty a mouth." "I die wish I mamma!" and feeling his upper lip, he added, gravely, "I think it must be a mustache beginning."

A Glasgow auctioneer recently visited Cathcart Castle, and asked one of the villagers "if he knew any thing of an old story about the Castle?" "Ay," said the rustic, "there was another auld story, but it fell down lang syne."

Harry Turn recently married his cousin, of the same name. When interrogated as to why he did so, he replied that it had always been a maxim of his, that "one good Turn deserves another."

"Mr. D——, if you will get my cost done by next Saturday I shall be forever indebted to you." "It won't be done," said the tailor, "upon such terms."

Miss Tucker says it's with old bachelors as with old wood; it is hard to get them started, but when they do take them they burn prodigiously.

An old woman met in the street a friend whom she had not seen for a long time. "Oh, my friend!" she cried, "how are you? I see you have a wife." "Even I, your sister that died some months ago? I saw it in the paper." "It was my cousin." "Indeed, my cousin." "We were both sick; she died, but I was the worst."

Soon after the death of the poet Wordsworth, a gentleman met a former acquaintance in Cumberland, and said to him, "You have had a great loss." "What loss?" "Why, you have lost the great poet." "Oh ay," said the farmer, "he is dead; but we see doubt ye'll be sorry on't business, and mak' it as profitable to rivver it was."

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Why is it reasonable to suppose that tight-rope dancers are in general great favorites with the public?
Because their performance is always en-cored (an cord).

If you have a ten guinea joy for a competitive examination, why should he study the letter B?
Because it can neither be spared (Spa).

The beginning of eternity,
The end of time and space,
The beginning of every sale,
And the end of every race.

Letter E.

Why does a duck put its head under water?
For future reasons (forever).

Why does he take it out?
For sundry reasons (sun dry).

Why is an oyster a practical anomaly?
Because it has a beard, without a chin, and you take him from his bed before you cook him (a).

FERNANDINA, FLORIDA.

WANTED.—A lobster that will float on a "sea of troubles."

KEEPING THE LAW.—There was an old Quaker who had an unfortunate reputation of non-resistance. It was said that any one could pelt him, tread on his toes, or break his nose with impunity: until one market-day a blustering fellow, being told that Quaker was a man who, if he was smitten on one cheek would turn the other also, thought it would be rare sport to try him. Stepping up to the friendly, good-natured Friend, he slapped his face. The old man looked at him with gravity for a moment, then slowly lifted his cane to the cheek, and received a hearty buffet. Upon that he coolly pulled off his coat. "I have heard the law," said he, "and now then we'll take it." And he gave the cowardly rascal a tremendous thrashing.

PAT was severe on Scotchmen. Jordan, in his "Reminiscences," preserves this specimen of his brutality: "I met Pat Kennedy, he is a Scotch dog. I hate Scotch dogs; they growl like lurchers, they fawn like spaniels, they bark like Highlanders, they're sad dogs, and they're mangy into the bargain, and they stink like pigs."

"I have very little respect for the ties of this world," as the rogue said when the rope was put round his neck.

Cooke, the tragedian, was in the habit of giving passes to a widow Lolly, who was once sitting in the pit with her son Billy, when a fashionable friend, the performer, was about to be assailed by his stage rival. Roused by the supposed harmlessness of the attack, the girl started up, exclaiming, "Oh, don't kill him!—don't kill him! For if you do, he won't give us any more pit orders!"

"Husband, do you believe in special judgments of Providence upon individuals in this life?"
"Yes, my dear."
"Do you, indeed? Did one of the judgments ever happen to you?"
"Yes, love."
"When was it, husband?"
"When I married you, my dear."

Two Irishmen were recently looking at people stretching a rope across the street from one house-top to another, for the purpose of suspending lamps.

PAT. "Shure and what will they be after a doing at the top of them houses, Jerry?"

MICK. "Faith an' it's submarine telegraph they're after putting up, I suppose."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

☞ For a full account of the Bombardment of the Forts at Port Royal, South Carolina, and the performance of the great Expedition under Commodore Dupont, see page 763; for an account of the capture of the rebels Mason and Slidell see page 768.

PANIC AT THE SOUTH.

The panic in Savannah, consequent upon the success of the Port Royal expedition at Beaufort, is said to be terrific. The description of the city was so rapid and extensive that the papers were obliged to open the authorities to screen the flight of able-bodied men under sixty years of age. Great consternation is said to exist all along the Southern coast. The people are represented as fleeing from all the towns and villages on the sea-board. A dispatch to the Richmond Enquirer says that, dated from Charleston on the 14th, says that General Sherman, had taken possession of Hinckley Island.

AFFAIRS IN KENTUCKY.

Advices from Kentucky are of the highest importance. General Albert Sidney Johnston, lately appointed to the command of the rebel army of the Mississippi, is reported to be advancing with 30,000 men at the head of Key Island sand, for the purpose of making a descent upon Louisville, Kentucky, or perhaps Cincinnati, and General Buckner has ordered the National troops at Camp Calvert to fall back to Dunaffee, where the National forces will concentrate to oppose the progress of the rebels. Zollicoffer is understood to have united his forces with those of Johnston, leaving only a few hundred men at Cumberland Gap, while Cumberland Ford is evidently flooded.

RISING OF UNION MEN IN TENNESSEE.

The Unionists of East Tennessee appear to be terribly in earnest in their hostility to the rebel rule which has recently been forced upon them; and their operations in contempt of the remonstrance of the rebel armies, by destroying the railroad bridges and the telegraph lines, are creating the greatest trepidation in the whole region of Southern Kentucky. The long and costly bridge near Nashville, over the Cumberland River, has recently been burned, and the position of the rebel army at Bowling Green is thus rendered doubly dangerous. A dispatch from Nashville in the Norfolk Day Book, announces the burning of six other bridges—one on the Georgia State Road over Chickamauga Creek; one on the East Tennessee and Georgia Railroad, over the Hiawassee River; two on the Tennessee and Georgia Railroad over Sick Creek, and one over the Holstein River. Matters in East Tennessee, the dispatch states, are in a critical condition, and "much anxiety is felt for Zollicoffer."

THE ARMY IN MISSOURI FALLING BACK.

The divisions of Generals Hunter, Pope, and Sturgis have taken the route by way of Rolla, and those of General Sigel and Asboth, after nearing a short distance south as a point to cover the retirement of the main body, have returned to Springfield, and are to proceed to St. Louis, not Rolla. Springfield, it is understood, will be thoroughly evacuated, and the Union men of that city and the surrounding country have already left or are preparing to leave, not caring to trust themselves again to the tender mercies of the rebels.

General Halleck arrived in St. Louis on 18th, and will immediately assume command of the Western Department.

PRICE AND M'CULLOCH GOING INTO WINTER-QUARTERS.

A dispatch from St. Louis announces positively that the rebel armies of Price and Ben M'Culloch have returned into Arkansas, with the intention of going into winter-quarters at Fort Smith, where provisions abundant have been built. Before leaving Missouri they burned all the bagsacks and corn-cribs in the country, to prevent our forces from obtaining forage in case of pursuit.

FREMONT'S OFFICERS ARE SAID TO ROB THE MAILS.

The St. Louis Evening News states that while General Fremont's train was on its way from Springfield to that city, it was met between Warsaw and Springfield by Captain James A. Swain, of the Quarter-master's Department, with the United States mail for Springfield. One of the officers in charge of the advancing General took out all the bags from Captain Swain, in spite of his protestations, cut them open and overhauled their contents. When Captain Swain remonstrated against this outrage the perpetrator threatened him with arrest. The decoyated mail may have been brought back to St. Louis and deposited at the Post-office.

OCCUPATION OF ACCOMAC AND NORTHAMPTON COUNTIES, VIRGINIA.

General Dix has ordered 4000 of his troops from Baltimore to march into and locate themselves in Accomac and Northampton Counties, Virginia. It is said that Accomac County is loyal, and will receive the troops, but that Northampton County is disposed to resist them. General Dix has issued a most important proclamation, stating that the object of the advance of his troops is to maintain the authority of the Government, to protect the people and restore commerce to its original channel; that no one held in service under the laws of the State shall be interfered with, and that unless resistance is offered no fireside will be molested.

AFFAIRS IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

The reports from General Rosecrans in Western Virginia are very cheering. They state that Colonel Clark's brigade crossed the Kanawha and New rivers on the 10th inst., and drove the rebels back three miles from all their positions. General Benham also had a skirmish with the rebels, and after compelling them to retreat, followed them for twenty-five miles, and failing to come up with them, he fell back. Colonel Gregory, of the rebel army, and a few others were killed. General Benham lost only two men in the engagement.

ANOTHER ATTACK AT BELLY ISLAND ATTEMPTED.

The rebels recently made another attempt to capture Belly Island, off the Santa Rosa Island, but their failure was even more humiliating than on the first occasion. It appears that Colonel Wilson's gunboat steamed some fifteen hundred rebel troops about twenty miles from Fort Pickens, and immediately informed the commander of the Navy-Yard that there was not a form and shell in the rebels off the island with great loss.

CAPTURE OF A FORAGING PARTY.

The only item of news from the army of the Potomac relates to the capture of a portion of a foraging party by rebel cavalry on the 24th inst. Though we are sick of fifty of our men, including the two officers in command, were taken prisoners and carried off.

RE-ELECTION OF DAVIS AND STEPHENS.

The election for President and Vice-President of the Southern Confederacy has taken place, and the unanimous return of Jeff Davis and Alexander H. Stephens, the present incumbents.

COTTON AT NEW ORLEANS.

The New Orleans Bulletin says there is cotton enough in that port to load all vessels that choose to run the blockade and come up to the city.

ARREST OF SENATOR GWIN AND OTHERS.

The Pacific mail steamer which arrived here last week from California brought Senator Gwin, Judson Beckman, and another rebel as prisoners, in charge of detective-police. General Sumner, who was on board the steamer, is accredited with having made the capture while with him to this city. Gwin and Beckman have since been sent to Fort Lafayette.

SHOT-PROOF VESSELS FOR THE SOUTH.

The Norfolk papers contain an advertisement from S. R. Mallory, the rebel Secretary of the Navy, asking for proposals for the construction of four sea-going iron-clad and shot-proof steam-vessels, each of not four guns each.

YANCEY GIVES IT UP.

A letter from W. L. Yancey to his friends in Alabama has been found on the person of a Mr. James Brown, arrested as a secessionist in Boston last week. Mr. Yancey speaks very discouragingly of the prospects of either England or France recognizing the independence of the Southern Confederacy.

FOREIGN NEWS.

AUSTRIA.

AFFAIRS OF HUNGARY.

The Emperor of Austria has addressed an autograph letter to the Archbishop of Gran, directing a suspension of the civil offices.

MEXICO.

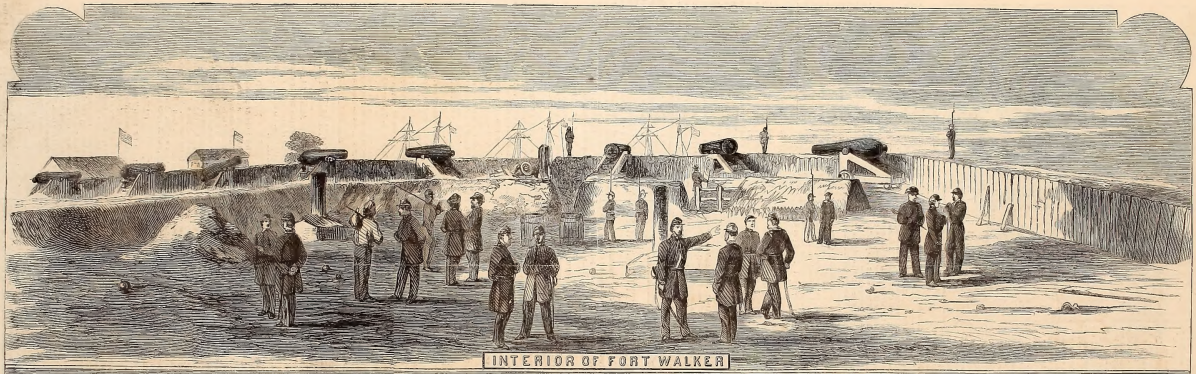
THE EUROPEAN EXPEDITION.

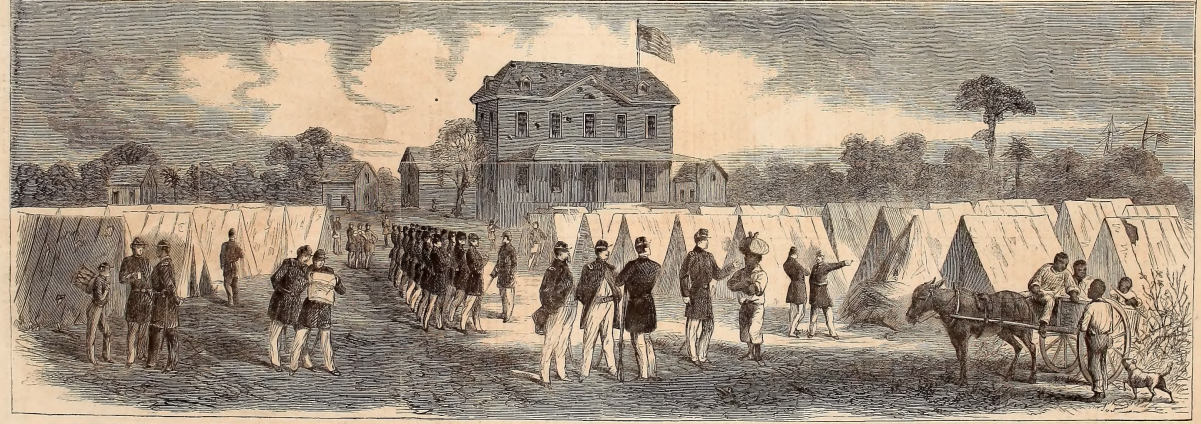
The Cuban Government is exertive its full power in aid of the expedition to the coast of Mexico. The Spanish troops, to the number of 8000 men, and a number of transports, are ready for service, and only very additional proposals from Spain and the French contingent. The Mexican papers say that the intervention is near. Troops have been made that on the firing of the first gun by the allies the Mexicans will fall upon and massacre every Spaniard in the country. The Spanish commander, it is said, also declares, in case any Spaniards are injured, to lay Vera Cruz in ashes. The country is most thoroughly disorganized, and Marquez has again been defeated.

CANADA.

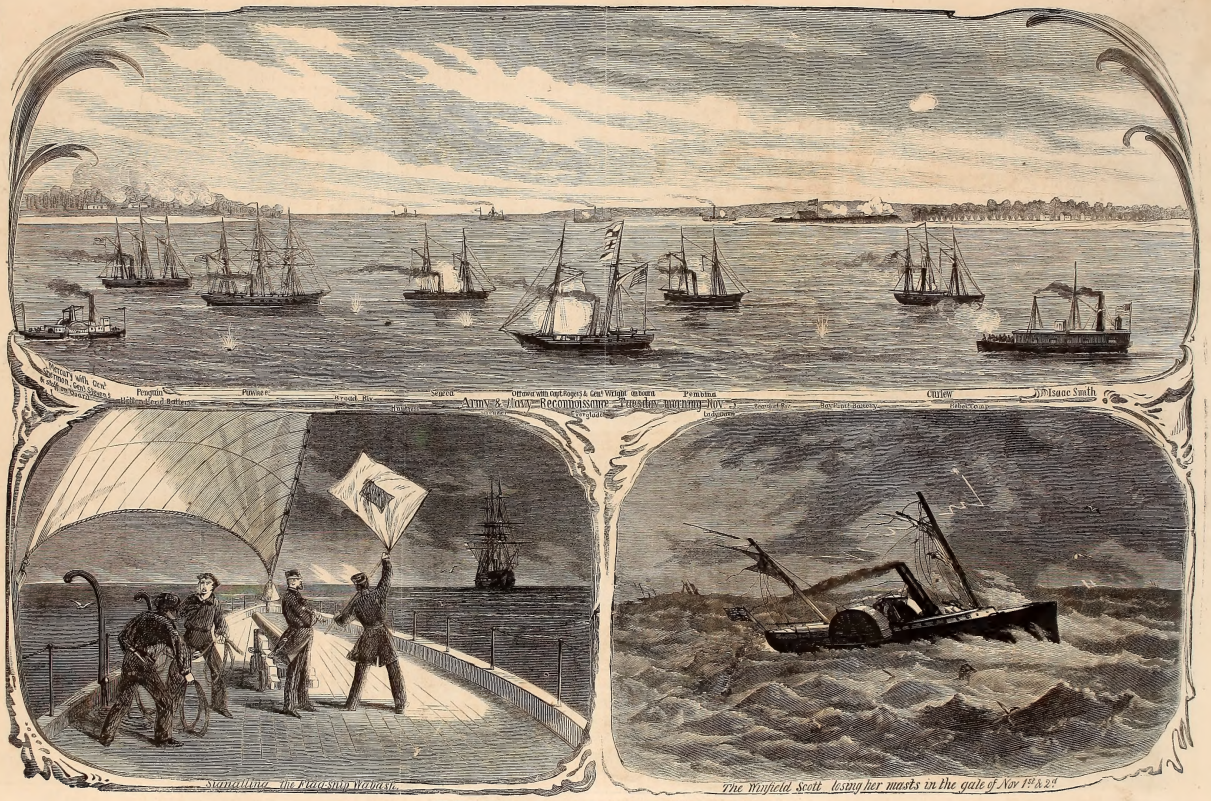
LOSS OF THE "NORTH BRITON."

The accounts given in the Canadian papers regarding the loss of the North Briton steamer, are meagre. The following is the substance of the details given: From the time that the vessel left Quebec until she ran ashore the weather was extremely rough, strong easterly gales prevailing. When the ship grounded it was piteh dark, with a strong wind blowing; and she labored so that fears were entertained that she would go to pieces every minute. The boats were got out as soon as possible, and this is all that is said concerning the wreck. Sixteen of the officers and crew were in two boats, which went adrift shortly after the North Briton struck. Both boats were knocked about in a fearful sea for two days, when one of them, in which the eight men on board the other had been transferred, was picked up on the 9th instant, by the J. G. Beckler, a brigantine bound from Liverpool to Cleveland. This was 250 miles below Quebec. The only additional fact concerning the wreck is that the North Briton struck on the rocks at Mingan, and is grounded by the bow in twelve feet of water.





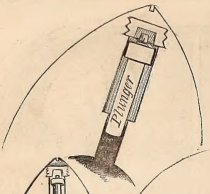
HEAD-QUARTERS OF GENERAL WRIGHT AT FORT WALKER, HILTON HEAD, SOUTH CAROLINA, FORMERLY THOSE OF GENERAL DRAYTON, OF THE REBEL ARMY.—SKETCHED ON THE SPOT BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 763.]

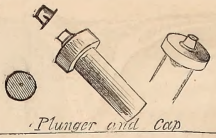


Steamer Monticello—the Rear Saving Vessel.

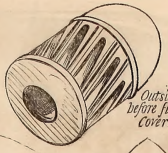
The Winfield Scott losing her masts in the gale of Nov 1st & 2d

THE EXPEDITION TO BEAUFORT—BEFORE THE ATTACK.—[SEE PAGE 762.]



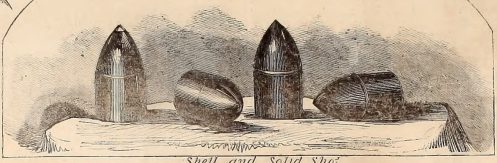


Plunger and Cap.

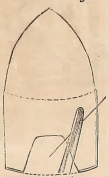


Outside of Shell before filling or covering

Section of Shell.



Shell and Solid Shot.



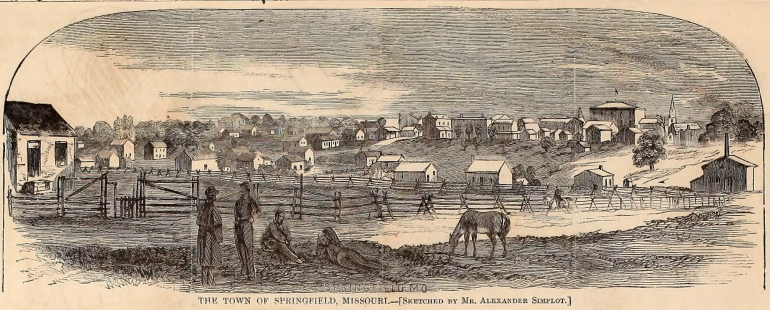
Section of Projectile, showing Direction of Lead.

Filling & Finishing Projectiles.

The Union Shell.

Pouring in the Lead.

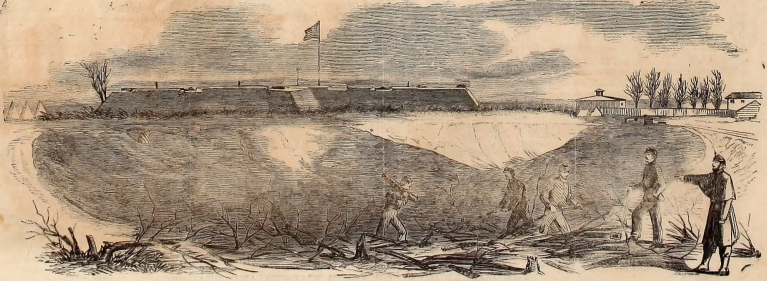
SHELLS AND THEIR MANUFACTURE.—[SEE PAGE 764.]



THE TOWN OF SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI.—[SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.]

PLAZA AT SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI.—[SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.]

INTERIOR OF FORT RUNYON, NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 767.]

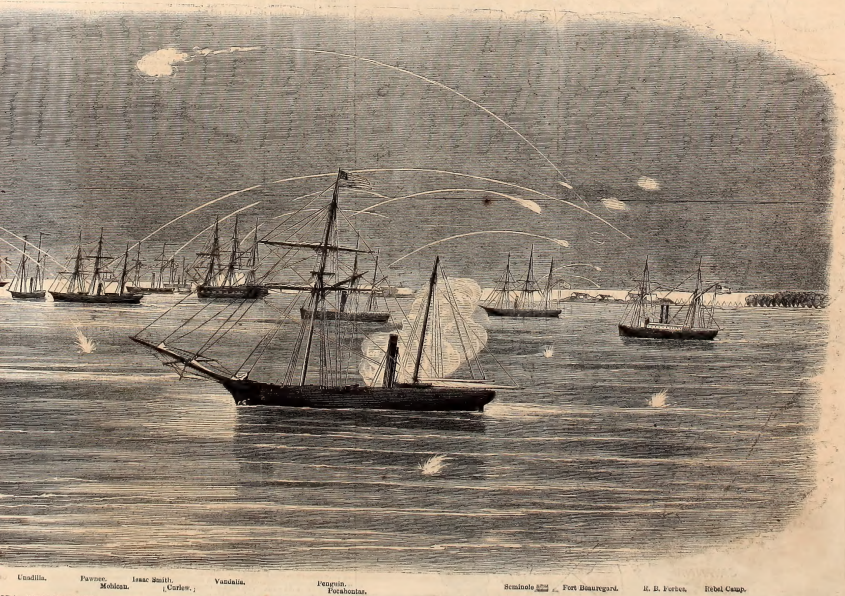


FORT ALBANY, NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 767.]

THE GREAT EXPEDITION, IN LAT. 34° 37′ N., LONG. 75° 50′ W ON THE WAY TO PORT RO

THE BOMBARDMENT OF FORTS WALKER AND BEAUREGARD, PORT ROYAL INLET, SOUTH CAR

L INLET.—[Sketched at Noon on 31st October, 1861, from the Deck of the Steamer "Matanzas."]



NA, NOVEMBER 7, 1861.—Sketched by our Special Artist on Board the "Mercury."—[See Page 762.]

MAP OF THE SEA-COAST OF SOUTH CAROLINA, SHOWING THE DEPTH OF WATER ON EACH BAR, ETC.

THE CAPTURE OF BEAUFORT, SOUTH CAROLINA.

We devote a large proportion of our space this week to illustrations of the glorious achievements of the GREAT EXPEDITION. On page 764 we give portraits of BRIGADIER-GENERAL SHERMAN, who commanded the troops, and of CAPTAIN DUPONT, who commanded the fleet; on pages 760 and 761 a view of the FLEET as it appeared in the ocean on Thursday 31st; on page 757 a picture of the RECONNOISSANCE which was made on the day previous to the attack on the forts; on the same page, illustrations of the METHOD OF SIGNALING adopted in the fleet, and of the "WINFIELD SCOTT" in the gale; on pages 760 and 761 a large view of the BOMBARDMENT OF FORTS WALKER AND BEAUREGARD; on page 756 a couple of pictures showing the general appearance of FORT WALKER, and the building occupied originally by General Drayton as his head-quarters, and subsequently by General Wright; and on this page A MAP SHOWING THE COAST OF SOUTH CAROLINA AND THE APPROACHES TO BEAUFORT, with the depth of water, in figures, on each bar.

Of the appearance of the fleet on 31st October the correspondent of the Herald writes:

The wind died out before sunrise, and the sea was as smooth as a millpond, only a gentle swell disturbing its bosom. At noon our position, by observation, was as follows: Latitude 34 degrees 57 minutes north, longitude 75 degrees 50 minutes west. Distance made sixty-eight miles, making a southwest three-quarter south coast; so that we are now about thirty miles off shore, and not yet in the latitude of Cape Lookout. The barometer is 30 degrees 3 minutes, and the thermometer at 70 degrees. Not a cloud has been seen to-day, and we have been enjoying the ocean very much. The sick are much better, and those who had but little peace of mind yesterday have found it to-day, and not one vacant place was to be seen at the dinner-table. The officers have been exercised in rifle firing this afternoon, and have acquitted themselves finely. Most of the vessels had canvas set this morning, but as it fell away dead calm this afternoon all sails were furled, and the yards braced sharp up.

The RECONNOISSANCE is thus described by the same writer:

At five on 8th we got under way and went alongside of the flag-ship for our orders. At daylight we were ordered to take on board Brigadier Generals Sherman, Wright, and Stevens, with their staffs, and to proceed under their direction to make a thorough reconnoissance of the batteries at Hilton Head and Bay Point. We lay astern of the flag-ship until the Generals were brought to us in one of the Atlantic's boats. Then we started upon our trip. The weather was beautiful, and all were in the best of spirits. We ran along as fast as possible, so as to join the firing at its earliest stages, so that we can make a careful note of positive strength, etc. On we steamed, expecting every moment the rebels would open fire on our ships; but they evidently were waiting until they should get into ranges which they had for their guns. At twenty minutes before seven o'clock the first gun was fired from the rebel flag-ship (the Enrolled), and in less than one minute afterward the Lady Davis let slip a shot at the ships. Its fire was minutes the firing became quite lively on both sides, the gun-boat Ottawa opening the fire on our side. The following boats took part in the skirmish: The Ottawa, Flag-Captain Rodgers on board; Pembina, Commander Corvier, Penguin, and Isaac Smith, the Pawnee coming in after the firing had well advanced. As we drew up toward the batteries the one on Hilton Head opened upon us—his being the first time we had any positive knowledge of there being any guns at that place. As we drew within ranges of the Bay Point battery it also opened upon us. After about twenty rounds we found the Hilton Head battery to contain sixteen guns, while the Bay Point battery had only thirteen; but just before that battery ran out which was not yet completed. The gun-carriages were there, but no guns were to be seen; men were seen working there yesterday, but to-day they have hung down to fight in the main battery. After the boats had run away they sought shelter behind the point, while our boats threw in shell toward the batteries at intervals. As we were only on a reconnoissance it was not necessary for us to attempt to rout the rebels—so the recall signal was hoisted, and we prepared to anchor. Just as we were hauling off the Pawnee got into position and opened fire upon the Hilton Head battery; most of her shot fell short, but a rifled sixty-eight-pounder threw in shell beautifully.

The rebels threw the shot around her very fast, but all fell short. As soon as we started to go back the rebel navy came down and followed us afar off. The Curtiss fired a few rounds at the battery, and then hauled off; and the little Mercury ran in, shoved them her stern, and let drive a shell at them from her thirty-pounder, it bursting close into the rebel camp. Thus ended the first regular army reconnoissance, in which the navy did all the work and the army did one half of the looking on.

The BOMBARDMENT itself is thus described:

Just as we had anchored, which was at five minutes before ten o'clock, the Hilton Head battery opened fire on the Wabash, in three minutes after another shot from the battery. Now the cheers arose from all the transports; the ball had opened. Still the ships stood on and did not apparently notice the efforts of the rebels, until the Wabash came in good range with the face of the battery, when she fired a shell at them which struck close to the battery. In a few minutes the Wabash opened a smart fire, throwing her shells into the woods, where the rebels were encamped in some force. After firing a few guns to ascertain the range, she opened a broadside fire on both batteries, which was one of the finest sights ever witnessed in this country. Now the troops did cheer. It was hearty and long. The other vessels now opened their fire, and the shells fell thick and fast into the battery. The rebel steamers now opened a smart fire, and it was the subject of general remark at the time under the circumstances. The small gun-boats now steamed rapidly ahead, and opened on them with their ten and eleven inch pivot guns. At fifteen minutes past ten o'clock the fire was so hot that they up helm and started for Broad River, the gun-boats chasing them. By this time the shells were bursting in the Bay Point battery at the rate of about two a minute, by which the rebels replied with rapidity and great precision.

The flag-ship and her division were rapidly driving up to the point around which they were to turn so that they could come down along the shore and engage the Hilton Head battery while the small gun-boats took up intermediate positions, and battered away at Bay Point and the rebel naval vessels. As the Wabash turned, so that her broadside could bear upon the rebel fleet, she opened upon them, and soon sent them up the river for a time at least. About this time the Vandalia came up in range, and she delivered a splendid broadside to the Bay Point rebels, several of her shells making the sand fly inside of the works. She kept up a galling fire upon them until out of reach, when she devoted her attention to the rebel navy. During this time the Wabash, Susquehanna, and Bienville had come around, and were close upon the Hilton Head battery. All eyes were upon these vessels, especially as we saw plainly that they were steering so as to come within one hundred yards of the battery, in which case each of which we knew were crammed with pieces of the most approved patterns. We expected great doings, and I will guarantee that we were not disappointed as to what we got will show. On they came, like the world in themselves, but the flag-ship seemed to be the one on which all glossed their hopes for a grand sight.

At about twenty minutes before eleven o'clock the Wabash commenced operations on the Hilton Head battery in good earnest, delivering a broadside at one command. All her gun-deck armament is nine-inch shell guns, while on her spardeck they are eight-inch shell guns, with a ten-inch pivot gun and a rifle-bolt Dahlgren gun on the forecastle. If you can imagine the scene you can do what Dahlgren gun on the forecastle. If you can imagine the scene you can do what I cannot describe. The scene was terrific, while the burning of the shells more than I can describe. The scene was terrific, while the burning of the shells was as terrible as it was destructive. I counted no less than forty shells bursting at one time, and that right in the battery and in the woods where each sight a hundred rebels lay. In addition to this the Susquehanna, with her tremendous battery, aided by the Bienville, the Pawnee, and half a dozen smaller gun-boats, was making the air brown with the sand, while the blue smoke as the explosion went to make up a most magnificent sight. The troops were wild with enthusiasm, and with deafening cheers hailed the boldness and courage of the gallant naval officer. A moment or two elapsed—just time enough to load the guns—and the same scene was enacted again. The rebels replied with seven guns, which were worked splendidly, and from appearances they did considerable execution. After the second broadside the firing became less concerted, and it seemed as if each division on all the vessels were endeavoring to outvie each other in the rapidity with which they worked their guns.

The tide drifted the vessels quite fast by the battery, but they backed them considerably, so as to remain as long as possible; and at eleven o'clock they had reached as near to the reef as it was safe to go, and they were obliged to haul off to again take up their position, but giving them another broadside as they turned. To do this a track, circular in form, and extending nearly five miles, must be sailed over. The Bay Point battery must again be passed, where they were served as before named, which were well served; and the navy of the Confederates must receive their due share of the shells which were destined to be expended this day's work. To this duty they undauntedly steamed up, while the little gun-boats fought the steamer. About this time the firing on both sides materially diminished. Occasionally the rebels fired from either battery, which was replied to by the gunboats.

At half past eleven the Wabash and her consorts drew near to the Hilton Head battery again, the rebels keeping up a brisk fire upon them as they approached. Occasionally the pivot gun of the Wabash and the Susquehanna threw a shell into the battery; but the grand affair was over, so to come. At ten minutes to twelve the ships were enveloped in a dense cloud of white smoke, and in a minute again the shells were bursting inside the battery in a splendid manner, few seconds after the shells were bursting in every direction, and it seemed impossible that any one could be saved from death who was within the walls of the battery. Such a sight was never witnessed before. The rebels now worked only two guns, but I will give them the credit of working them beautifully. The style of fighting lasted just twenty minutes, and in that time over two hundred shells had burst over their heads and in the works. At ten minutes past twelve again the ships hauled off, bride and in the works. At ten minutes past twelve again the ships hauled off, bride and in the works.

firing a parting round as they left.

Bay Point battery ceased firing about noon, and hauled down the barred rag. At twenty minutes past twelve the Bay Point battery opened fire on the Wabash at twenty minutes past twelve the Bay Point battery opened fire on the Wabash as she passed up to take her position. Five minutes afterward the gun-boats opened a terrible volley of shells on Hilton Head, broaching it in several places, and dismounting one of the guns. The display of pyrotechnics was a grand sight, and was kept up for the broadside firing of the other ships. The gun-boats kept up this kind of work several minutes, when they ceased down and fired at intervals, so that there was a shell striking about once in a minute. At this time the Pawnhanna, which had towed a transport ship in, let her go, and came up to join in the sport—port for us, but death to them. At half past twelve o'clock the little gun-boat Mercury, Acting Master S. G. Martin, came up close to us and stood right in toward the battery, and after taking a position ran round and fired her thirty-pounder Parrott gun, throwing in shell with great precision. Her conduct was brilliant in the extreme, and attracted the attention of the entire fleet.

The rebel battery is badly damaged, and the houses and tents bear the marks of shells, and it looks as if there was a savage for the rebel camp. At five minutes after four o'clock the Wabash and her consorts are in position to advance; but they have not yet let his gun-boats get entirely away at the battery, which only replies with one gun, which has only now and then been sung to us by some whistling shell. At two o'clock we weigh anchor, and get under way, feeling assured that there will have become pretty well used up, and will not or can not injure us.

The transports now launch their surf-boats, nearly one hundred in number, and place the troops between, all ready to commence landing the troops. At half past two o'clock the Wabash came down and fired one gun, and, to our surprise, there was no reply to it, although she waited for some moments. Signals were now made to the vessels, and the fleet ceased firing. Then ships got their orders, and, to our surprise, prepared to anchor.

At twenty minutes before o'clock a boat—the wheelboat of the Wabash—was manned, and, with a white flag from the bow and Commander John Rodgers in the stern, started for the shore. I can assure you that every stroke of the oars was watched by thousands of anxious people. She strikes the beach. Captain Rodgers, borne on the backs of brave and trusty tars, with the Stars and Stripes floating over his head and a large ensign, goes on shore, and a loud cheer rends the air from ship to ship, and wave in triumph over South Carolina soil and a deserted rebel battery. Success and brilliant success seems to have been won. All honor to the gallant seamen of the United States Navy!

With regard to FORT WALKER he says:

The armament of the work, which was of the latest patterns, was as follows: Thirteen 10-pounders, two 8-pounder 8-inch guns, two rifled 8-inch, one 10-inch Columbiad, two carronades, and one 8-inch Columbiad. Many of these guns had been dismounted, but were uninjured, and can readily be mounted on their carriages. In the magazines was an immense quantity of shot, shell, powder, fixed ammunition, etc., in very good order.

The enemy left FORT WALKER so hurriedly that their private effects—clothing, etc.—in many cases wholly abandoned, and we found every thing just as they left them. Dinner tables were set, and the food ready for the hungry fighters, and all left to us. The magazines and bomb-proofs are unbreaking, and all was taken possession of by our forces, and, while the exception of a few articles as mementos of the occasion, every thing is safe. Quite a number of original records of the rebel offices, etc., were found and distributed among the deserving.

The object of the fort seems to be seen on every hand in the work. On the line along the front three guns were dismounted by the bursting fire of our ships. One carriage had been struck by a large shell and shivered to fragments, scattering heavy gun metal in every direction, sending the splinters flying in all directions with terrific force. Between the fort and the village of the 9-gun—a large post of blood, mingled with brains, fragments of shell, and pieces of clothing, evidently from the face, or portions of whiskers still clung to it. This shot must have done horrible execution, as the number of human heads were found all about it. Another carriage to the right was broken to pieces, and the gun on the work was somewhat reduced unless by the enfilading fire from the gun-boats on the left flank. The bursting fire of shell, with which we swept with resistless fury and deadly effect across this long water front, has been fearful, and found their mortal mission, as terrible, without taking the precaution to place traverses between the guns, as much as any injury to drive the rebels from their works, in the hurried manner I have described. The works were abandoned by the rebel shot and shell so badly as to make immediate repairs necessary.

All the houses and many of the tents about the work were torn to pieces by flying shell, and hourly a light of glare could be found intact, in any building where a shell exploded. The trees in the vicinity of the object of our fire showed the heavy volleys given. Every thing, indeed, bore the marks of ruin. No wonder, then, that the rebels took to their heels, and do, cheerfully, this testimony to the gallant and courageous manner in which the rebels have been pounded from their hot fire, and fought at their guns when many would have fled.

Their loss in killed and wounded must have been heavy. About fifteen have been buried to-day by the marines; two or three dead have been found, the remainder are undoubtedly carried with the retreating forces.

Of the METHOD of SIGNALING our artist writes:

SOUTH CAROLINA COAST, on Board the Flag-ship "Wabash," on Port Royal Harbor, November 21, 1861.

I send you inclosed a sketch of Signal Officer Lieutenant Howard in the act of communicating with the frigate Wabash. In the daytime these signals are made by means of a flag, either a white ground and crimson centre, or a black ground and white centre. These flags are made so as to be protected from the wind by a peculiar arrangement of strips of bunting, allowing the flag to wave as usual. To each signal officer there are attached two sergeants who make the signals, and, by means of repeaters, the officer directing. The officers are equipped at the expense of the United States Government, and have night and day, telescopes, horses, and various other things. I send you another sketch of the fleet in proximity. The entrance to Port Royal is in the middle of the picture.

Of GENERAL WRIGHT'S HEAD-QUARTERS he says:

HILTON HEAD SOUTH CAROLINA, November 8, 1861.

I send you herewith a sketch of the head-quarters of General Wright, and the surroundings, which, as you will see, is a picturesque as well as an interesting subject. The old house, which is the mansion of a planter named William Pope, was, on the occupation of this place by the rebels, immediately appropriated and used as the head-quarters of the General-commanding, Drayton. During the bombardment the house was the recipient of a number of iron favors from the big guns of our little gun-boats. After the battle Drayton and his staff evidently were occupied by General Wright. The small buildings surrounding, it, formerly the negro quarters, were found filled with commissary stores of all descriptions, the encampment in front and around the house, of the Ninth South Carolina Regiment, commanded by Colonel William Hayward, a brother-in-law of Hon. Francis W. Pickens, late of Europe. It is now occupied by the Fourth New Hampshire Volunteers. In the foreground of my sketch that "cute contraband" have already begun to make their appearance, and as evening draws on the darky delights to visit, where the cry is still they come. Their delight is unbounded at the prospect of future freedom, and their method of expressing it ludicrous.

The following brief biographical sketches will introduce the MILITARY AND NAVAL COMMANDERS to our readers:

Acting Major-General Thomas W. Sherman—in charge of the land forces of the expedition—was born in Rhode Island, graduated at the West Point Military Academy in 1836, obtained a brother eighteen in a class of forty-one, and—an unusually large proportion—and was appointed second lieutenant in the United States Artillery in July, 1836. In March, 1837, he became Assistant Commissary of Subsistence, and in the same month of the following year was promoted to a first lieutenancy. Just at the breaking out of the troubles with Mexico he was promoted to a captaincy, his commission bearing date May 28, 1846. He served with distinction bearing date May Florida war, and accompanied General Taylor to Mexico, rendering himself conspicuous for the zeal and efficiency by for his services. He was brevetted Major for conduct at the battle of Buena Vista, February 23, 1847. Since the close of the Mexican war he has been on duty in various parts of the country, always rendering efficient service. In August, 1857, while on duty at the Minnesota agency, in the Indian country, he was distinguished for the prudence and firmness with which he acted in averting a war with the Mississippi tribes of the Sioux. On the formation of the Fifth Artillery he was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of the regiment, a portion of which was engaged in the Bull Run fight, under the name of Sherman's, and subsequently Ayres's battery. He was made a Brigadier-General May 17, 1861.

Commodore Samuel F. Dupont, the commander of the naval forces of the expedition, is a native of the State of Delaware, and has had a professional life from the navy from that State. His original entry into the service of his country was on the 18th of November, 1815; he is, therefore, nearly forty-six years in the service, and his forty-sixth anniversary will probably pass glory and blood him higher in the estimation of the people, both at home and abroad, than he has ever been before. The last service which Commodore Dupont has spent nearly twenty-four years on sea, eight and a half of which were spent on shore. The balance of his time has been unemployed. His present commission bears date July 16, 1862. He was last at sea in May, 1858, and since that time he has been commandant of the Navy Yard at Philadelphia, where his business of manner, together with his strict attention to his many friends.

Commodore Dupont is a man a little past what is usually termed the prime of life, although possessed of all the vigor, activity, strength, and endurance which characterize the younger men. In his personal appearance the Commodore is a person below the medium height, compactly built.

The following letter, published in the Herald, will show how narrow an escape the "WINFIELD SCOTT" had from the fate of the ill-fated Monitor:

The gale commenced on Friday west of Cape Fear, blowing hard; at three o'clock P.M., the ship laboring very much, and apparently leaking. The pumps were set to most-hand; could not go to her assistance; had to keep the vessel's head to the sea. At five o'clock, the gale was increasing, and the ship laboring very hard. Up to ten o'clock the sea was tremendous higher than I ever saw, and even that struck her seemed to twist her like a piece of whalebone. Midnight came, and found the ship's crew at five o'clock. Captain Edie was on deck all the time, giving orders to keep the ship's head to the sea. Saturday morning, five feet of water in the hold. The sailors were getting to the after-part of the vessel, crowding about in one mass. He then commenced to throw overboard every thing on deck—spars, boats, etc. The ship, in which work sailors, soldiers, and every person that could hand him their services. At half past four A.M. the ship had the floating rubbish. At half past four A.M. made signals of distress. At daylight the gale was moderating somewhat and told them we were leaking, and wanted them to stand by if we ran short of coal. At ten A.M. the leak was so much fast to her by a hawser, and lowered a boat with two men to come on board and see the lady, and got them on board all safe. The boat then got over to the Winfield Scott. She then sent us another boat, on board of which came over three men and the Chief Engineer. Soon after—the first men on board to descry his post, which example was followed by every one of the crew. The boat took her also got above, after landing them on board. She then parted the hawser, and commenced steaming for Hampton Roads. On account of the heavy sea she could not stay there, when soon after we saw her steaming up the river, and was very slyly, by damaged by coming together. About half past three P.M., the steamer Baltic came down and took us off from her, and we left the Baltic in the engine-room to see that no steam was blown off, and we arrived at Fort Monroe. The Captain, seeing that it was getting late, and finding that he could not get to the Winfield Scott that night, then sent the purser, Mr. Patterson, on board the Roanoke to ask the Captain to send assistance to the Baltic. The steaming some time for the Roanoke to come alongside he made up his mind to leave the ship, and, with the crew, which was advised to do by all the officers of the Baltic, with Captain Rogerson, and the crew on board, they promising him to keep the ship afloat by their own pumps. Accordingly, he then steamed away from the Roanoke at about six miles an hour. The Roanoke then commenced steaming, got into smooth water; the wind lowered by daylight, at eight A.M. the Baltic and Roanoke commenced pumping at work. At eleven A.M. made the land off Port Royal and sent down the pilot, all hands have been heavy.

With regard to the MAP of the coast of South Carolina, its author says:

The Map on page 769 is made from the charts of the United States Coast Survey and other good authorities, and represents the coast of the State of South Carolina which produces rice and sea-island cotton, also the territory lately ceded to the United States Government. It will be seen that Port Royal harbor is nearly midway between Charleston and Savannah, and that both the land and water communications between these cities are commanded by the forts holding possession of the Broad River.

On this map the Sea Islands, which produce fabulous 40 to 60 feet in island, and thereby the approaches of the harbor seem to be completely blocked up. The map also shows that this farm a bar to each harbor except that of Port Royal. The forts on Hilton Head are given in figure on each bar. The circuit which our fleet made in their attack on Forts Walker and Beauregard is also shown. After a reconnoissance made by a captain of the engineer department, a title for a battery of seven guns, with magazine. Here five heavy guns will command Skull Creek, which is the only inland water communication by which to Savannah.

On good maps and charts Bay Point is the name given to the southern point of Edisto Island. However, as in our disputations that point is known as Fort Beauregard, the name is here given on our map.

SUCCESS AND FAILURE.

I HAD come back after an absence of nearly twenty-five years, to linger for a brief time amid the old places made sacred to memory by childhood and youth. How familiar, and yet how changed in the interval! Not a single thing I saw—every thing but the living who remained; and they were few, for death had been there as every where. I looked for the old faces at church, on the thought of boyish friends came trooping back upon me, and the answer, "Dead," came so frequently that I felt as if a pestilence must have been there.

"What of Payson?" said I.

"Oh, he's all right," was the cheerful answer of the old friend with whom I was conversing.

"How all right?" I inquired.

My friend pointed to an elegant house standing on the other side of the square. Grounds that were adorned with fountains and statuary.

"He lives there," said he.

I remembered him as a young man of small means, but industrious and saving. We had been tolerably intimate, and I had liked him for his amiability, intelligence, and cheerful temper.

"Then he has become a rich man?"

"Yes, he is our wealthiest townsman; one of the most successful men in this region of country."

"Did he build that house?"

"Yes, and its style shows how well his taste is cultivated. We feel naturally proud of Mr. Payson."

"Then he is liberal as a citizen, using his wealth in enterprises that look to the common good?"

"Oh, as to that," was replied, "he is like other men."

"How like other men?"

"Thinks more of himself than he does of other people."

"And what of Melleville?" I asked.

"Henry Melleville?"

"Yes."

There was a change in my companion's countenance and manner that did not foreshadow a good report. He shook his head as he replied:

"Poor Melleville stands about where you left him; never has succeeded well in any thing."

"I am grieved to hear you say that. Of all my young friends I valued him most."

"It is too true; and I am sorry for it. That is his house." And he pointed to a plain white cottage, standing not far from the splendid residence of Mr. Payson, which made it look poor and almost mean in contrast.

"Strange diversity of fortune!" I said, speaking partly to myself. "Taking the two men as I now recall them, Melleville most deserved success."

"He was an excellent young man," was replied to this; "but lacked force of character, I suppose, or some other element of success. What, I don't exactly know; for I have not been very intimate with him for some years. He is peculiar in some things, and don't have a great many warm friends."

"Not as many as Payson, I presume."

"Oh no! Of course not."

I was surprised at this intelligence. Of the two men, I current to be the one to lay the pleasantest recollections of Melleville, and was prepared to hear of his success in life beyond that of almost every other one of my early native place.

"What of Henry Melleville?" I asked of another.

"Oh, he's a stick in the mud," was answered coarsely, and with an indifferent toss of the head.

I am sorry that my old friend Henry Melleville has been more successful," said I, speaking of him in a third direction. "What is the cause of it?"

"The causes of success or failure in life are rarely hidden," was the answer I received. "Some men profess to be gifted with a clear sight in these matters, and I own to being in the dark. There isn't an honester or more industrious man in the world than Melleville, and yet he don't get along. Five or six years ago he seemed to be doing very well, better than usual, when his shop burned down, and he lost not only valuable tools, but a considerable amount of stock, finished and unfinished."

"Had he no insurance?"

"Yes, but it was only partial; just enough to get him started again. Ten years ago he had a mill, and was doing; he told me, very well, when a spring freshet carried away the dam and water-wheel. He had to rebuild the mill, and as the owner was in pecuniary difficulty, and involved at the same time in a lawsuit about the very property, he was compelled to sell at a sacrifice forced to abandon a business that looked very promising. And so it has been with him all along. There ever seems to be a cloud back just as he gets fairly on the road to success."

"How does he bear his misfortunes?" I inquired.

"I never heard him complain."

"It has been different with Mr. Payson."

"O dear, yes; his whole life has been marked with success. Whatever he touches turns to gold."

The testimony in regard to the two men agreed in the general. I could not question it in life, the other had not. I felt interest enough in both of them to get a nearer point of view, and so, in virtue of my professional privileges in all of us. My first visit was to Mr. Payson. Was it because, like the rest of the world, I was more strongly attracted by the successful one? Have it so, if you will: human nature is weak.

"Will you send up your name?" said the servant, as I came from into a rather stylishly-furnished office, where it was plain, from the display of books and papers, that Mr. Payson met his visitors who came on business only.

I gave my name, and then waited for nearly five minutes before the gentleman appeared. I saw, at a glance, that I was not on his page, that he was in some unpleasant doubt as to the purpose of my visit.

"Mr. Payson," said I, warmly, as I arose and extended my hand.

He pronounced my name, but in a tone gullibles of pleasure. Something in the coldness or pressure of my hand received no appreciative return. His fingers lay in mine like the senseless fingers of a sleeper. I was chilled by his manner, and felt like retiring without another word. But having approached him, I was not willing to recede without bringing him to some terms.

"It is twenty-five years since we met," said I, after resuming the seat from which I had arisen. "Time works great changes in all of us."

"So long as that," he responded, without interest.

"Yes, it is twenty-five years since I went from the home-nest out into the world, an ardent, hopeful young man."

"And how has the world used you?" He did not look at me in direct aspect, but with a slightly angular range of vision, as if there were a selfconviction in his mind touching the object of my visit.

"I have no complaint to make against the world," said I.

"You are a rara avis, then," he replied, with the ghost of a smile; "the first man I have met in a decade who didn't rail at the world for treating him badly."

"Has it treated you badly?" I could not help smiling back into his face as I asked this question.

"Yes; or, at least, the people in it. The world is well enough, I suppose; but the people! Oh dear! Every other man you meet has some design on you."

"Your experience has been a more unfavorable than mine," said I.

"Then you are fortunate—that is all I have to say."

I had been reading the face of this friend of my younger days pretty closely, and it seemed to grow in. He looked older by forty years, instead of by twenty-five. But time had not improved his face, as it does some faces. Every feature remained; I would have known him among a thousand; but every feature was changed in its stronger or feebler developments. All that expressed kindness, humanity, and good-will had nearly died out; while hard selfishness looked at you from every lineament.

"You have been fortunate," I remarked, "as to this world's goods. Your garner is filled with the land's fatness."

The reference did not seem wholly agreeable.

"When I went from this neighborhood you were a poor young man. I return, and find that you have heaped up wealth in rich abundance. Only the few are successful in your degree."

"Many just happiness," he replied, his hard, heavy forehead contracting.

"No; but it may be made the minister of happiness," I said, with a warmth.

"Yes, I know. That's the common talk of the day." He answered in a kind of a growl. "I had it the other day from Bell."

"You surprise me. Rich men are not wont to speak after this fashion."

"Then they don't speak from their hearts, I do."

"You have health and a beautiful home. These are elements of happiness."

He shut his lips tightly and shook his head.

"I have no sound health. Don't know what it is to have a single moment bodily sensation. And as for the beautiful home to which you refer—" He checked himself, and became silent, while a painful expression settled in his face.

"You have children?"

He lifted his eyes to mine with a questioning look, as if he thought me probing him.

"Yes," he briefly answered.

"Pretty well grown by this time?"

"Some of them." He paused, and then added, "And only one left me. Children, like the rest, no sooner grow suddenly excited. But he checked himself, with a slight air of confusion; then went on.

"Children, then." Stopped once more, as if in shame.

"Happy is the man that his quiver full of them," said I, cheerfully.

Payson merely shrugged his shoulders, and looked stolid and unhappy. I referred, in order to change the subject, to a boy named Henry Payson. But his answers showed that he had no intelligent appreciation of a matter in which every man of thought like a human interest. When I left him, after half an hour's interview, it was with the impression that, outside of money, he was the most unsuccessful man it had been my fortune to meet in this world. In nothing besides money-getting had he succeeded. When I last saw him he was a cheerful, bright, hopeful, good-natured young man. Now he was morose, gloomy, and dull of intellect, except in a single direction—a great money faculty, without any of the elements of a noble and true life.

Upon inquiry I learned that, while his children were young, he had chosen to shield them from all in his merchandise that he had no time or inclination to cultivate their morals or to win their love. In matters of taste and interest in which the love of these children he would interfere with his wife's management of them in an arbitrary and tyrannical way; thus losing their minds against him, and destroying his influence over them for good. Badly managed, repressed unwisely in some directions and unwisely indulged in others, they were growing up selfish, ill-tempered, proud, and exacting; cursing with discord his home instead of blessing it. Such, I knew, was as far as I could learn, giving way to a morose temper, made their lives as uncomfortable as they made his. It was mutual misunderstanding, and unfortunate that precluded a separation. And here was my successful man!

"My dear old friend!" exclaimed Henry Melleville, grasping my hand as he opened the door of his modest little home, and stood looking me in the face, his eyes filled with tears and his voice full of pleasure. "This is a surprise! Come in! Come in!" And he drew me along the passage into a small parlor, the scanty furniture of which told the story of his limited means.

"When did you arrive? Where did you come from? Not from Rome—let me hope not! Twenty years since you were here, or at least since I have seen you here."

"Over twenty-five," said I.

"So long! Is it possible? Well, how are you, and where are you? Tell me all about yourself."

All about myself! And the tones were sincere, and cordial. "I must hear about you first," I answered, smiling back into his smiling face. "How's it with you?"

"Oh, as well as I deserve, and something better," he replied, cheerfully. No shadows came over his face.

"You have not succeeded in getting rich, I see."

"Not rich in this world's goods; but true success in life is not always to be measured by gold. We start, in early manhood, with happiness as the end in view, and in most cases wealth is considered the chief means of securing that end. I own to having fallen into the error myself. But my experiences have not been in that direction. Riches would have done me more harm than good, and so in mercy they have not been given. I struggled hard for them, and failed time after time; the greatest good, or the chief means toward attaining the greatest good. I was unhappy when disaster and disappointment came."

CAPTAIN S. F. DUPONT, U.S.N.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 763.]

BRIGADIER-GENERAL T. W. SHERMAN, U.S.A.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.—[SEE PAGE 763.]

"But a manly philosophy sustained you," said I.

"It were better called religion," he answered, his voice falling into a lower key. "I tried philosophy, but it wouldn't do; and so, in my weakness and pain, I went up higher, to the Strong for strength."

His face lighted up beautifully.

"And found Him a friend that sticketh closer than a brother," I remarked.

"Yes, in truth. I am poor; but "His are the cattle upon a thousand hills."

"You have children?" I said.

"Yes, and good children, thank God! Loving children!"

His eyes glistened as he spoke.

And this was the man who had not succeeded; this was the man of whom some spoke with pity, some with indifference, and some even with contempt as of no account. But Payson was "all right!" I referred to Payson.

"Poor man!" was the reply. "I never look at him without a feeling of pity."

"He has succeeded largely."

"There is a difference of opinion about that," said Melleville. "Some think he has failed miserably."

"He is rich."

"In money, and in nothing else; and of all riches that comes with fewest blessings. If not accompanied by riches of the mind and heart, gold always curses its possessor. So I read in the book of human life. It has cursed Payson. I would not exchange places with him, taking his consciousness and state of mind, for the wealth of a thousand worlds. No! no! no!"

He spoke with earnestness.

"I have seen him," said I.

"Well, how did he impress you?"

"As to all that is worth living for, I should say with you that his life has been a miserable failure."

"And so are the lives of thousands," he answered, "whom the world points out as its most successful men. Get close to them; see them in their true individuality; in their homes, if you can approach that near, and you will see poor wrecks of manhood, bloated selfishness, tormenting itself with ill-nature, or mad with pain from some eating cancer of the soul that goes on, day and night, with its work of ruin."

I saw them two men frequently during the few days that I lingered in the old familiar places, and when I went away it was with no nicely-balanced question in my thought as to which was the truly successful man.

SHELLS.

As the bombardment of the Port Royal forts has directed attention to the subject of shells, we devote page 758 to the illustration of their manufacture. In the centre of the picture will be seen the workmen in a national foundry filling and finishing shells; in the corner on the left a workman is seen pouring in the lead, the direction of which is shown in a small diagram on the right at the top of the picture; the other diagrams and pictures illustrate the various parts of the shell. At the bottom on the right is seen the great Union shell, for the Union gun at Fortress Monroe; it stands about two feet three inches high. The shells used at Port Royal were fired with fuses calculated to explode shortly after the shell landed; other shells explode on striking their object. The negroes at Port Royal called them "Yankee dirt-plows!"

TORCH-LIGHT PROCESSION OF GENERAL BLENKER'S DIVISION IN HONOR OF THE NEW COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.—DRAWN BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 767.]

THE CAPTURE OF THE REBEL COMMISSIONERS TO EUROPE.

WE devote this page to illustrations of the capture of the rebel Commissioners, MASON and SLIDELL, who were arrested on 8th inst. on board the British mail steamer Trent, in the Bahamas Channel, by Commodore WILKES of the United States sloop of war San Jacinto. The transaction was thus described by Captain TAYLOR, the bearer of dispatches from Commodore WILKES:

Captain Taylor reports that when the San Jacinto stopped at Clenfuegos the escape of SLIDELL and MASON was ascertained. Proceeding thence to Havana, it was understood they had taken passage on the 7th inst. on the British mail steamship Trent, plying between Vera Cruz by way of Havana, and St. Thomas and Southampton. While the San Jacinto was in the narrowest part of the Bahama Channel, about twenty-four miles to the westward, she met the packet, and, as usual in such cases, fired a shot across her bows, and brought her to. Two boats were sent to her under the command of Lieutenant FAIRFAX, who, boarding the packet, arrested Messrs. MASON and SLIDELL, who were personally known to him. They at first objected to being removed without the employment of force for that purpose. However, they were soon after removed without further trouble, and conveyed to the San Jacinto. Their respective secretaries, EUSTIS and M'FARLAND, were also brought on board, and are now on their way to New York.

Of COMMODORE WILKES, who commanded the San Jacinto, the Herald gives the following memoir:

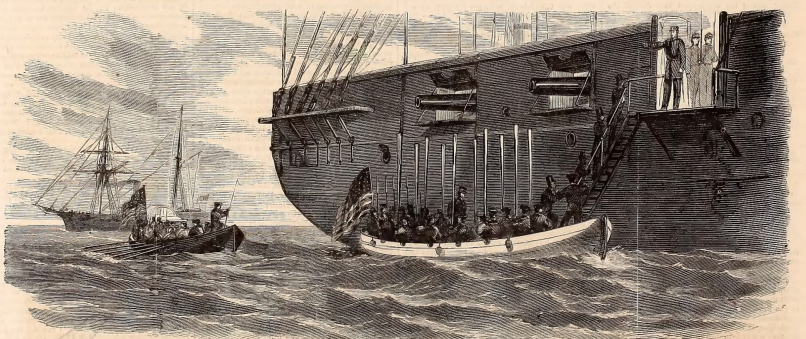
Captain Charles Wilkes, the captain of the San Jacinto at the time when she overhauled the Trent, is a native of New York, of which State he is a citizen, and from which State he was appointed to the navy. He was born about the year 1805, and at the early age of thirteen entered the naval service, his original entry therein bearing date January 1, 1818. He stands, according to the last Navy List, No. 51 on the list of captains, his present commission bearing date September 14, 1855. His sea-service under his present commission has been of short duration, his total sea-service being about ten years. He has been on shore and other duty about twenty-seven years, and has been unemployed about seven years, thus making his whole service under the Government of the United States about forty-four years. Previous to his present service his last duty at sea was in June, 1842. His principal employment from that time till ordered upon the San Jacinto was upon special duty at Washington. Captain WILKES is also noted as the great explorer and navigator, having, in consequence of his well-tested scientific ability, been appointed by the Government upon the command of the naval expedition gotten up for the purpose of exploring the countries bordering on the Pacific and Southern oceans.

At this time his command consisted of a brig, two war sloops, and two smaller vessels, as tenders, Charles WILKES having charge of the whole. Starting from New York, he pursued his route, via Cape Horn, toward Australia and the neighboring islands. He visited Singapore, Borneo, the Sandwich Islands, and the upper part of Oregon, etc., and returned to New York during the year 1842. This expedition lasted four years, having been commenced in 1838. For the interesting discoveries made by the explorer the learned Geographical Society of London presented him with a gold medal, as a memento of their appreciation of his labors. Captain WILKES has published several works on geographical research, the one on Western America being very valuable as a volume for reference, the statistics, maps, and drawings being of the highest order. Captain WILKES has by his present action added another triumph to his list of glories.

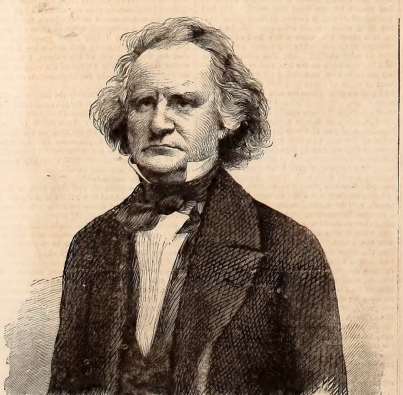
The San Jacinto arrived at New York with the rebel prisoners on 18th inst., but was ordered forthwith to Boston: Mason and Slidell are to be confined in Fort Warren with the other prisoners of war.

The event has created no little commotion, especially in British circles; for the first time in history the English are complaining of an "outrage on their flag." It seems, however, that the arrest of the rebel Commissioners was fully justified in international law, and that Commodore WILKES would even have been justified in taking the Trent, and bringing her into the harbor of New York as a prize, for carrying rebel officers and dispatches.

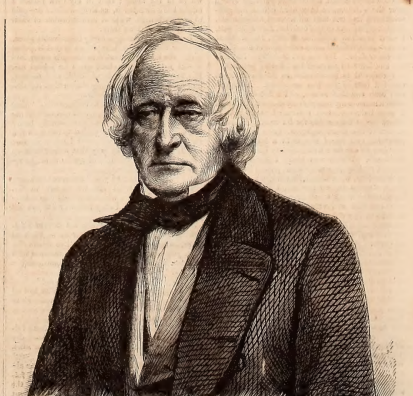
COMMODORE WILKES, U.S.N.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]



THE REBEL COMMISSIONERS BROUGHT ON BOARD THE UNITED STATES SLOOP OF WAR "SAN JACINTO" AS PRISONERS.



THE CAPTURED REBEL COMMISSIONER MASON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]



THE CAPTURED REBEL COMMISSIONER SLIDELL.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE PICKET-GUARD.

"All quiet along the Potomac," they say,
"Except, now and then, a stray picket
Is shot as he walks on his beat to and fro,
By a rifleman hid in the thicket.
'Tis nothing—a private or two, now and then,
Will not count in the news of the battle;
Not an officer lost—only one of the men
Moaning out, all alone, the death-rattle."

* * * * *

All quiet along the Potomac to-night,
Where the soldiers lie peacefully dreaming;
Their tents, in the rays of the clear autumn moon
Or the light of the watch-fire, are gleaming.
A tremulous sigh, as the gentle night-wind
Through the forest-leaves softly is creeping;
While stars up above, with their glittering eyes,
Keep guard—for the army is sleeping.

There's only the sound of the lone sentry's tread
As he tramps from the rock to the fountain,
And thinks of the two in the low trundle-bed
Far away in the cot on the mountain.
His musket falls slack—his face, dark and grim,
Grows gentler with memories tender,
As he mutters a prayer for the children asleep—
For their mother—may Heaven defend her!

The moon seems to shine just as brightly as then,
That night when the love yet unspoken
Leaped up to his lips—when low-murmured vows
Were pledged to be ever unbroken.
Then drooped his eyelids so softly over his eyes
He dashes off tears that are welling,
And gathers his gun closer up to its place,
As if to keep down the heart-swelling.

He passes the fountain, the blasted pine-tree,
The footpath is beginning to show;
Yet onward he goes, through the broad belt of light,
Toward the shade of the forest so dreary.
Hark! was it the night-wind that rustled the leaves?
Was it moonlight so wondrously flashing?
It looked like a rifle— "Ha! Mary, good-by!"
And the life-blood is ebbing and plashing.

All quiet along the Potomac to-night,
No sound save the rush of the river;
While soft falls the dew on the face of the dead—
The picket's off duty forever!

E. B.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

A STRANGE STORY.

By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON.

[Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."]

CHAPTER XL.

The dead man's manuscript was gone. But how? A phantom might delude my eye, a human left hand, exerted at a distance, might override if she tales of mesmerism be true, deprive me of movement and of consciousness; but neither phantom nor mesmeric Will could surely remove from the table before me the material substance of the book that had vanished! Was I to seek explanation in the arts of sorcery ascribed to Louis Gravie in the narrative—I would not pursue that conjecture. Against it my reason rose up half defiantly, half disdainfully. Some one must have entered the room—some one have removed the manuscript. I looked round. The windows were closed, the curtains partially drawn over the shutters, as they were before my consciousness had left me: all seemed undisturbed. Snatching up one of the candles, fast dying out, I went into the adjoining library, the desolate state-rooms, into the entrance-hall and examined the outer door. Barred and locked! The door-robber had left no vestige of his stealthy presence.

I resolved to go at once to Strahan's room and tell him the loss sustained. A thought had been confided to me, and I felt as if there were a slur on my honor every moment in which I kept information concealed from him to whom I was responsible for its trust. I hastily ascended the great staircase, grim with faded portraits, and found myself in a long corridor by chambers, went blundering on, when, to the right, down a narrow passage, I recognized the signs of my host's whereabout—signs familiarly commonplace and vulgar, signs by which the inmate of any chamber in lodging-house or inn makes himself known—a chair before a doorway, clothes negligently thrown on it, beside it a pair of shoes. And so ludicrous did such testimony of common everyday life, of the habits which Strahan would necessarily have contracted in his desultory unluxurious bachelor's existence—so ludicrous, I say, did these homely details seem to me, so grotesquely at variance with the wonders of which I had been reading, with the wonders yet more incredible of which I myself had been witness and victim, that as I turned down the passage I heard my own unconscious half-hysterical laugh ring out, and startled by the sound of that laugh as if it came from some one else, I paused, my hand on the door, and asked myself: "Do I dream? Am I awake? And if awake, what am I to say to the commonplace mortal I am about to rouse? Speak to him of a phantom! Speak to him of some weird spell over this strong frame! Speak to him of a mystic trance in which has been stolen what he confided to me, without my knowledge! What will he say? What should I have said a week since to any man who told such a tale to me?" I did not wait to resolve these questions. I entered the room. There was Strahan sound asleep on his bed. I shook him roughly. He started up, rubbed his eyes—"You, Allen—you! What do mean?—what's the matter?"

"Strahan, I have been robbed!—robbed of the manuscript you lent me. I could not rest till I had told you."

"Robbed, robbed! Are you serious?"

By this time Strahan had thrown off the bedclothes, and sat upright, staring at me.

And then those ridiculous details which had suggested while I was standing at his door repeated themselves with double force. Tell this man, this unimaginative, hard-headed, raw-boned, sandy-haired North-countryman—tell this man a story which the most credulous school-girl would have rejected as a fable! Impossible.

"I fell asleep," said I, coloring and stammering, for the slightest deviation from truth was painful to me, "and—and—when I woke the manuscript was gone. Some one must have entered and committed the theft."

"Some one entered the house at this hour of the night, and then only steal a manuscript which could be of no use to him! Absurd! If thieves have come in it must be for other objects—for plate, for money. I will dress; we will see!"

Strahan hurried on his clothes, muttering to himself, and avoiding my eye. He was embarrassed. He did not like to say to my old friend what was on his mind, but I saw at once that he suspected I had resolved to deprive him of the manuscript, and invented a wild tale in order to conceal my own dishonesty.

Nevertheless, he proceeded to search the house. I followed him, passive, and provided with my own thoughts, and longing for solitude in my own chamber. We found no one, no trace of any one, nothing to excite suspicion. There were but two female servants sleeping in the house—the old housekeeper and a country girl who assisted her. It was idle to even suspect either of these persons, but in the course of our search we opened the doors of their rooms. We saw that they were both in bed, both seemingly asleep: it seemed idle to wake and question them. When the formality of our futile investigation was completed, Strahan returned to the door of my bedroom, and for the first time fixing his eyes on me steadily, said;

"Alfred Erwick, I would have given half the fortune I have come into rather than this had happened. The manuscript, as you know, was bequeathed to me as a sacred trust by a benefactor whose slightest wish it is my duty to observe religiously. If it contained aught valuable to a man of your knowledge and profession—why, you must have free access to it. Let me hope, Allen, that the book will reappear to-morrow."

He said no more, drew himself away from the hand I involuntarily extended, and walked quickly back toward his own room.

Alone once more, I sank on a seat, buried my face in my hands, and strove in vain to collect into some definite shape my own tumultuous and wondering thoughts. Was it likely—was it even credit to the marvelous narrative I had read? Were there, indeed, such powers given to man? such influences hidden in the recesses of our Nature? I could not believe it; I must have some morbid affection of the brain; I must be under a hallucination. Yet there remained to me the phantom, yes—the trance, yes. But still, how came the book gone? That, at least, was not hallucination.

I left my room the next morning with a vague hope that I should find the manuscript somewhere in the study. That in my own trance I might have secreted it, as sleep-walkers are said to secrete things, without remembrance of their act in their waking state.

I searched minutely in every conceivable place. Strahan found me still employed in that hopeless task. He had summoned all his own men, and it was past eleven o'clock when he joined me. His manner was now hard, cold, and distant, and his suspicion and ire shown that my distress gave way to resentment.

"Is it possible," I cried, indignantly, "that you who have known me so well can suspect me of an act so base, and so gratuitously base? Purloin, conceal a book confided to me, with full power to copy it! Strahan, in my own trance I may be conscious in any way that might seem to me serviceable to science, or useful to me in my own calling!"

"I have not accused you," answered Strahan, sullenly. "But what are we to say to Mr. Jeeves and others who know that this manuscript existed? Will they believe what you tell me?"

"Mr. Jeeves," I said, "can not suspect a fellow-townsman, whose character is as high as mine, of untruth and theft. And to whom else have you communicated this manuscript, and in a manner and a request of so extraordinary a nature?"

"To young Margrave; I told you so!"

"True, true. We need not go further to find the thief. Margrave has been in this house more than once. He knows the position of the rooms. You have named the robber!"

"Tut! what on earth could a gay young fellow like Margrave want with a work of such profound and abstruse nature as I presume my poor kinsman's memoir must be?"

I was about to answer, when the door was abruptly opened, and the servant girl entered, followed by two men, in whom I recognized the superintendent of the police and the same subordinate who had found me by Sir Philip's corpse.

The superintendent came up to me with a grave face, and whispered in my ear. I did not at first comprehend him. "Come with you," I said, "and to Mr. Vigors the magistrate? I thought my deposition was clear."

The superintendent shook his head. "I have the authority here, Dr. Fenwick."

"Well, I will come, of course. Has any thing new transpired?"

The superintendent turned to the servant girl, who was standing with gaping mouth and staring eyes. "Show us Dr. Fenwick's room. You had better put up, Sir, whatever things you have brought here. I will go up stairs with you," he whispered again, "Dr. Fenwick, I am in the discharge of my duty."

Something in the man's manner was more sinister and menacing than I felt at ease about. That some and strange calamity had befallen me. I turned toward Strahan. He was at the threshold, speaking in a low tone to the intimate policeman, and there was an expression of amazement and horror in his countenance. As I came toward him he darted away without a word.

I went up the stairs, entered my bedroom, the superintendent close behind me. As I took up mechanically the few things I had brought with me, the hand of the police-officer drew them from me with an abruptness that appeared insolent, and although I felt at ease about the sum in coat which I had worn the evening before, then opened the drawers in the room, and even pried into the bed.

"What do you mean?" I asked, haughtily.

"Excuse me, Sir. Duty. You are—"

"Well, I am your prisoner?"

"My prisoner; here is the warrant."

"Warrant! on what charge?"

"The murder of Sir Philip Derval."

"I—I! Murder!" I could say no more.

I must hurry over this awful passage in my marvelous narrative. I must endeavor to dwell as little as possible on the details, and indeed I have so sought to chase them from my recollection, that they only come back to me in vague fragments, like the broken, incoherent remains of a horrible dream.

All that I need state as to follows: Early on the very morning in which I had been arrested, a man, a stranger in the town, had privately sought Mr. Vigors, and deposed that, on the night of the murder, he was walking home after from a sudden storm under shelter of the eaves and buttresses of a wall adjoining an old archway; that he had heard men talking there in the archway; had heard one say to the other, "You still bear me a grudge." The other had replied, "I can forgive you one condition." That the then lost much of the conversation that ensued, which was in a lower voice; but he gathered enough to know that the condition demanded by the one was the murder and robber of a casket by the other. That from what he gathered of the meaning the casket; that, finally, this man said in a loud key, "Then it is all over, and on record," ing the answer, which the witness did not overhear, exclaimed threateningly, "It is you who will repent it!" That a man stepped forth from the arch into the street. The rain had then ceased, but by a broad flash of lightning the witness saw distinctly the face of the man who was speaking, the shelter of the arch; a man of tall stature, powerful frame, erect carriage. A little time afterward the witness saw a similar and older man come forth from the arch, whom he could only examine by the flickering ray of the gas-lamp near the street. This man, walking cowed, for whom he fully believed to be the person he afterward discovered to be Sir Philip Derval.

He said that the man first only arrived a few hours before in the town, a stranger to L——, and indeed to England; having come from the United States of America, where he had passed his life from childhood. He had journeyed on foot to L——, in the hope of finding there some distant relations. He had put up at a small inn, after which he had strolled through the town, when the storm had driven him to seek shelter. That he had then failed to find his way back to the inn, and after wandering about in vain, and seeing no one at that late hour of night from whom he could ask the way, he had crept under a portico and slept for two or three hours. Waking toward the dawn, he had then got his way and again reached the inn, where he saw in a narrow street before him two men, one of whom he recognized as the taller of the two. That the conversation he had listened under the arch, the other he did not recognize at the moment. The taller man seemed angry and agitated, and he heard him say, "It is the casket; I will have it." There then seemed a struggle between these two persons, when the taller one struck down the shorter, knelt on his breast, and he caught distinctly the gleam of some steel instrument. That he was so frightened that he had turned from the place, and that though he cried out he believed his voice was not heard. He then saw the taller man rise, the other remain in the prostrate position, less, and a minute or so afterward beheld policemen coming to the place, on which he, the witness, walked away. He did not know that murder had been committed; it might be only an assault; it was no business of his, he was a stranger. Such was the best out to interfere, the policemen having cognizance of the affair. He found out his inn; for the next few days he was, however, detained in L—— in search of his relations, who had left the town many years ago to fix their residence in one of the neighboring villages.

He was, however, disappointed; none of these relations now survived. He had returned to L——, heard of the murder, was in doubt what to do, might get himself into trouble if, a mere stranger, he gave an unsupported testimony. But on the day before the evidence was volunteered, as he was lounging in the street, he had seen a gentleman pass by on horseback, in whom he immediately recognized the man who, in his belief, was the murderer of Sir Philip Derval. He inquired of a by-stander the name of the gentleman; the answer was Dr. Fenwick. That the rest of the day he felt much disturbed in his mind, not liking to volunteer such a charge against a man of apparent respectability and station; but that his conscience would not let him sleep that night, and he had resolved at morning to go to the magistrate and make a deposition of it.

This story was in itself so improbable that probably any other magistrate but Mr. Vigors would have dismissed it as contempt. But Mr. Vigors, naturally a very bitterly prejudiced against me, and not sorry, perhaps, to subject me to the humiliation of so horrible a charge, immediately issued his warrant to search my house. I was absent to Derval Court; the house was searched. In the bureau in my favorite study, which was left unlocked, the steel casket was discovered, and a large case-knife, on the blade of which the stains of blood were still perceptible. On this discovery I was apprehended, and on these evidences, and on the deposition of this vagrant stranger, I was not indeed committed to take my trial for murder, but was placed in confinement, all bail for my appearance refused, and the examination adjourned to give time for further investigation and inquiries. I had requested the professional aid of Mr. Jeeves. At the surprise and dismay Mr. Jeeves begged me to excuse him. He said he was pre-engaged by Mr. Strahan to detect and prosecute the murderer of Sir F. Derval, and could not assist one accused of that crime. He gathered from the little he said that Strahan had already begun to him information and told him of the missing manuscript—that Strahan had ceased to be my friend. I engaged another solicitor, a young man of talent, and who professed personal esteem for me. Mr. Jeeves (such was the lawyer's name) believed in my innocence; but he owned that the appearances were grave, he implored me to be perfectly frank with him. Had I held conversation with Sir Philip under the arbor as described by the witness? Had I used such or similar words? Had the deceased said, "I had a grudge against him?" Had I demanded the casket? Had I threatened Sir Philip that he would repent? And of what? His refusal?

I felt myself grow pale as I answered, "Yes, I thought such or similar expressions had occurred in my conversation with the deceased."

"What was the reason of the grudge? What was the nature of this casket, that I should so desire its possession?"

These I answered, terribly embarrassed. What could I say to a keen, sensible, worldly man of law? Tell him of the powder and the fume, of the scene in the museum, of Sir Philip's tale, of the implied identity of the youthful Margrave with the aged Gryle, of the elixir of life, and the secret of age? Tell such a romance as I, the noted adversary of all pretended mysticism? I—I—a skeptical practitioner of medicine! Had such manuscript of Sir Philip's been available—a substantial record of marvelous events by a man of repute for intellect and learning—I might, perhaps, have ventured to attack the solicitor of L—— with my revelations. But the sole proof that all which the solicitor urged me to confess was a monstrous fiction—a vision of the noted adversary of all pretended mysticism!

thing of this Margrave in the East—Margrave might dread exposure, revelations—of what I know not; but, strange as it may seem to you, it is my conviction that this young man, apparently so gay and so thoughtless, is the real criminal, and in some way that I can not conjecture has employed this lying vagabond in the fabrication of a charge against myself. Reflect: of Mr. Margrave's antecedents we know nothing; of them nothing was known even by the young gentleman who first introduced him to the society of this town. If you would serve and save me, it is to that quarter that you will direct your vigilant and unrelaxing researches."

I had scarcely so said when I repented my candor; for I observed in the face of Mr. Stanton a sudden revulsion of feeling, an utter incredulity of the statement I had thus hazarded, and for the first time a doubt of my own guilt. The fascination exercised by Margrave was universal; nor was I to be murdered at; for, besides the charm of his joyous presence, he seemed so singularly free from even the errors common enough in the young. So gay and boon a companion, yet a shunner of wine; so dazzling in aspect, so more than beautiful, so courted, so idolized by women, yet no sale of seduction, of profligacy, attached to his name! As to his antecedents, he had so frankly owned himself a natural son, a scholar, a traveler, an idler; his expenses, though lavish, were so unostentatious, so regularly defrayed. He was so wholly the reverse of the character assigned to criminals, that it seemed as absurd to bring a charge of homicide against a butterfly or a goldfinch as against this amiable pleasant and delightful favorite of humanity and nature.

However, Mr. Stanton said little or nothing, and shortly after I left me, with a cry expression of hope that my innocence would be cleared in spite of evidence that he was bound to say was of the most serious character.

I was exhausted. I fell into a profound sleep early that night; it might be a little after twelve when I woke, and woke as fully, as completely as much exposed to life and consciousness as it was then my habit to be at the break of day. And so waking, I saw on the wall opposite my bed the same luminous phantom I had seen in the wizard's study at Derval Court. I have read in Scandinavian legends of an apparition called the Draug, or shining corpse. It is supposed, in the northern superstition, sometimes to haunt sepulchres, sometimes to foretell doom. It was the spectre of a human body seen in a phosphoric light. And so exactly did this phantom correspond to the description of such an apparition in Scandinavian fable that I know not how to give it a better name than that of Sein-Lucea—the shining corpse.

There it was before me, corpse-like, yet not dead; there, as in the haunted study of the wizard Forman!—the form and the face of Margrave. Constitutionally, my nerves are strong, and my temper hardy, and now I was resolved to battle against any impression which my senses might receive from my own deluding fancies. Things that witnessed for the first time daunts, witnessed for the second time lose their terror. I rose from my bed with a bold aspect, I approached the phantom with a firm step; but when within two paces of it, and my hand outstretched to touch it, my arm became fixed in air, my feet locked to the ground. I did not experience fear; I felt that my heart beat regularly, but an invincible something opposed itself to me. I stood as if turned to stone, and then from the lips of this phantom there came a voice, but a voice which seemed heard from a great distance—very low, muffled, and yet distinct; I could not even be sure that my ear heard it, or whether the sound was not conveyed to me by an inner sense.

"I, and I alone, can save and deliver you," said the voice. "I will do so, and ask but one condition in return—a condition simple and easy."

"Fiend or spectre, or mere delusion of my own brain," cried I, "there can be no compact between thee and me. I despise thy malice; I reject thy services; I accept no condition to escape from the one or to obtain the other."

"You may give a different answer when I ask again."

The Sein-Lucea slowly waned, and fading first into a wan shadow, then vanished. I rejoiced at the reply I had given. Two days elapsed before Mr. Stanton again came to me; in the interval the Sein-Lucea did not reappear. I had mustered all my courage, all my common sense, noted down all the weak points of the false evidence against me, and felt calm and supported by the strength of my innocence.

The first few words of the solicitor dashed all my courage to the ground. For I was anxious to hear news of Lilian, anxious to have some message from her that might cheer and strengthen me, and my first question was this:

"Mr. Stanton, you are aware that I am engaged in marriage to Miss Ashleigh. Your family are not unacquainted with her. What says, what thinks she of this monstrous charge against her betrothed?"

"I was for two hours at Mrs. Ashleigh's house last evening," replied the lawyer; "she was naturally anxious to see me as employed in your defense. Who do you think was there? Who, eager to defend you, to express his persuasion of your innocence, to declare his conviction that the real criminal would be soon discovered—who but that same Mr. Margrave, whom, pardon me my frankness, you so rashly and groundlessly suspected."

"Heavens! Do you say that he is received in that house? that he—he is familiarly admitted to her presence?"

"My good Sir, why these unjust prepossessions against a true friend? It was as your friend that, as soon as the charge against you amazed and shocked the town of L——, Mr. Margrave called on Mrs. Ashleigh—presented to her by Miss Brabazon—and was so cheering and hopeful that—"

"Enough!" I exclaimed—"enough!"

I paced the room in a state of excitement and rage, which the lawyer in vain endeavored to calm, until at length I halted abruptly. "Well—and you saw Miss Ashleigh? What message does she send to me—her betrothed?"

Mr. Stanton looked confused. "Message! Consider, Sir, what Ashleigh's situation—the delicacy—and—and—"

"I understand! no message, no word, from a young Lady so respectable to a Man accused of murder."

Mr. Stanton was silent for some moments, and then said, gently, "I have changed this subject; let us think of what more immediately presses. I see you have been making some notes; may I look at them—"

I composed myself and sat down. "This accuser—have inquiries really been made as to his manner, and his statement of the grounds of his charge? He comes, he says, from America—in what ship? At what port did he land? Is there any evidence to corroborate his story of the relations he tried to discover—of the inn at which he first put up, and to which he could not find his way?"

"Your suggestions are sensible, Dr. Fenwick. I have forestalled them. It is true that the man lodged at a mean house in Gravel Lane; true that he made inquiries about some relations of the name of Wallis, who formerly resided at L——, and afterwards removed to a village ten miles distant—two brothers—tradesmen of small means but respectable character. He at first refused to quit the house he had taken, in which my ship he sailed. I suspect that he has now told a falsehood as to these matters. I have sent my clerk to ascertain the truth—for it is there he said that he was put on shore—ye shall see—he then makes a beautiful in close custody. I hear that his manner is strange and excitable; but that he preserves silence as to his motive. It is generally believed that he is a bad character, perhaps a returned convict, and that this is the true reason why he has not yet been put on trial—silence, and has been since so reluctant to account for himself. But even if his testimony should be impugned, what then? Still we should have to account for the fact that the casket and the case-knife were found in your bureau. For, touching that point, I am sorry to say that I myself could in your absence have entered your study and placed the articles in your bureau, it is clear that this evidence, as it is, could not have possessed that knowledge."

"Of course not—Mr. Margrave did possess it."

"Mr. Margrave again—oh, Sir!"

I arose and moved away, with an impatient gesture. "Mr. Stanton, I repeat

THE LAST MEN AT BEAUFORT, S. C.

WHITE MAN.

BLACK MAN.

"The day after the Fight the Seneca and two other Gunboats, under the command of Lieutenant AMMON, proceeded up to Beaufort and found but ONE WHITE MAN in the TOWN, and HE WAS DRUNK."—Report of the Expedition.

"The Negroes were seen in great numbers, and, as the boats passed, came down to the shore WITH BUNDLES IN THEIR HANDS, AS IF EXPECTING TO BE TAKEN OFF."—Report of the Expedition.

POLICEMAN WILKES, noticing by the last Number of Harper's Weekly, that the well-known Rogues, MASON and SEIDELL, were about to Pawn some of their late Employer's Property at Messrs. Ball, Crapaud & Co.'s Shop, kept a bright look-out for'ard, and nabbed them in the nick of time.

THE LIGHT WONDER.

MARY. "Did you never, Julia,
See it work before?
Try it once, you'll surely
Use it evermore;
Such a little treasure
Never before was seen,
Oh! 'tis such a pleasure
Sewing by machine!"

JULIA. "Isn't it delicious?
How the needle flies!
I can notice the movement
Follow with my eyes!
How it goes, like lightning,
Flashing through that seam!
Mary, dear, I almost
Fancy it a dream."

MARY. "Oh! the toil it saves me,
Merry little thing!
Jumping, with its click, click,
While I sit and sing;
Lightly as a fleetfoot
On it goes apace,
Through the toughest leather
For the finest lace."

JULIA. "My! how very clever
Such inventions are!
Working just like human Beings, I declare;
Tell me, Mary, dearest,
Where I ought to go,
For Papa must really
Get me one, you know."

MARY. "Let it be like mine, then,
Julia, take advice;
None that I have seen yet
Are one half so nice;
Some won't keep in order—
Needles snap in two—
Causing bothertation,
Spite of all you do.

"Nobody but FEEKLE
Ever sells in this town.
Can produce another
Equal to my own;
I will choose one, Julia,
With you, any day,
When we pass EVE HUNDRED THIRTY-EIGHT BROADWAY."

PREPARE! PREPARE!

Gen. McClellan and Gen. Burnside.
Put it down. Put it down.

208 Broadway. 208
208 Broadway. 208

The place to buy Jewelry cheap. Enclose stamp for full particulars.

W. A. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

WORTH $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

Splendid List!!

Of Articles to be Sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $100.00 each
100 " Watches..... 60.00 each
200 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 35.00 each
500 Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches..... 15.00 each
3000 Vest and Neck Chains..... 5.00 to 10.00 each
3000 Gold Bead Bracelets..... 5.00 to 10.00 each
3000 " " " 5.00 to 10.00 each
3000 Cameo Brooches..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Cameo Ear Drops..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Ear Drops..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
5000 Gents' Breast Pins..... 2.50 to 6.00 each
3000 Watch Keys..... 2.00 to 6.00 each
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides..... 2.00 to 6.00 each
5000 Sets of Studs..... 2.00 to 6.00 each
5000 Sleeve Buttons..... 2.00 to 6.00 each
7000 Plain Rings..... 2.00 to 6.00 each
7000 Stone Set Rings..... 2.50 to 6.00 each
7000 Lockets..... 2.00 to 10.00 each
10000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 5.00 to 10.00 each
10000 Gold Pens, 14 Carats and Ward, 4.00 to 6.00 each with Silver Mounted Holders.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, will be placed in envelopes and sealed. These envelopes will be sent by mail, or delivered to callers, without regard to choice. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1, eleven for $2, thirty for $5, sixty-five for $10, and one hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

W. FORSYTH & CO.

286 Broadway, corner of Fulton Street, New York.

N.B. We wish it distinctly understood that all articles of jewelry not giving perfect satisfaction can be returned and the money will be refunded.

$100. Agents willfully make it selling (Dodin's) Patent Iron Folder and Tuck Gauge, adapted for Machine or Hand Sewing. Also other articles of ready sale. Address JOSEPH DODIN, 23 Dunne Street, N. Y.

Snow's Pure Confectionery,

200 Kinds, 629 Broadway, N. Y. Wholesale and Retail. Dealers enclose stamp for catalogue and prices.

CHOICE FURS. No. 49 Broadway. Opening at Retail of an entirely new stock of Sable, Mink and other choice FURS, in the most desirable styles, much below usual prices. S. COE,
Practical Furrier.

WARD'S

Perfect Fitting Shirts,

MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN.

Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, drawings of different styles of Shirts, sent free everywhere.

S. W. H. WARD from London,
No. 397 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

BEADLE'S MILITARY HAND-BOOK.

Embracing the Official Articles of War—U. S. Army Regulations—A Dictionary of Military Terms—Pay List—Tactics—Equipments—Courtesies, &c. Price 25 Cents. For sale by all Book and News Dealers and Army Sutlers.

AGENTS WANTED—To sell something entirely new and original—none others like them—the Union Prize Stationery and Receipt Packages. Each package contains a beautiful and correct engraving of GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, 6x10.
75 Valuable Receipts.
6 White Flag Envelopes, in colors.
6 Ladies' White Flag Envelopes, in colors.
6 Buff Envelopes.
6 sheets Commercial Note Paper.
6 Sheets Fine Ladies' Note Paper.
6 Sheets Ladies' Billet Paper.
1 Accommodation Penholder.
1 Fine Steel Pen.
1 Fine Pencil.
1 Sheet Blotting Paper.
1 Gift of Valuable Jewelry.
Retail price for the whole, twenty-five cents. Agents wanted in every city, town, and village. Call on or address, enclosing stamp,
RICKARDS & CO.,
102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Fine Shirts & Collars

On hand and made to order in any style, by

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York.

$ Agents Wanted.—Something New.

Articles of REAL MERIT wanted in every family: "Patent Heney" or "Table Manna.—Sample by mail 25c.—Recipe, with Family Right to make it, $1. "Clark's Patent Indelible Pencil," for marking linen; "Patent Match Safe," for vest pocket; "Downie's Patent Hemmer and Shield;" "Coffee Strainer and Economizer;" "Egyptian Cement," for family use; "Patent Work-Holder." Satisfaction given or money refunded. Address (with stamp) HICK & CO., 83 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Devlin & Co.

We are this week in receipt of large importations of choice

WINTER OVERCOATINGS,

FRENCH CASSIMERES,

NEW STYLES VESTINGS,

WINTER UNDERWEAR.

And have also added largely to our superior stock of ready made

WINTER CLOTHING,

All of which we are selling at exceedingly low prices.

DEVLIN & CO.,

Corner of Broadway and Warren and Grand Streets.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS.—SHATTUCK'S PATENT, 332 Broadway, New York. Send for a Circular.

Winter Gloves, Undershirts, &c.

Our large stock at very low prices, all qualities and sizes, Wholesale or Retail.

IRA PEREGO & SONS,
No. 61 Nassau Street, or No. 176 Broadway.

STEINWAY & SONS'

PATENT OVERSTRUNG GRANDS, AND SQUARE PIANOS

Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured, and will be sold to suit the times. Each Instrument warranted for five years. Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y. Send for Circular.

CENTRAL-PARK SKATE EMPORIUM.

Skates 25 cents to 25 dollars. Everything in the skating line (except ponds) to suit all ages, sexes, tastes, and purses. CONOVER & MARLER, 374 Broadway, N. Y.
Out-of-town orders attended to carefully and promptly.

Two Gems Engraved on Steel.

1st. "CHIEFTAINS OF OUR ARMY, 1861." Nine Portraits on one Plate, viz.: Scott, McClellan, Dix, Butler, Fremont, Banks, Anderson, Lyon, and Wool.

2d. "OFFICERS OF OUR NAVY, 1861." Nine Portraits on one Plate, viz.: Dupont, Drain, Ward, Bringham, Paulding, Rogers, Gowen, Porter, and Breese.

On Proof Paper, 11x15 inches. Price 25 cents each. Sent free on receipt of price. Agents send stamp for Catalogue of Portraits. Orders solicited.

Engraved and Published by J. C. BUTTRE,
48 Franklin Street, New York.

Chapped Hands, Face, Lips, &c.

Certain cure and preventive. HIGGMAN & CO.'S CAMPHORICE WITH GLYCERINE will keep the hands soft in the coldest weather. Sold by druggists generally. Price 25 cents; sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.
HIGGMAN & CO., Cosmetics and Druggists, N. Y.

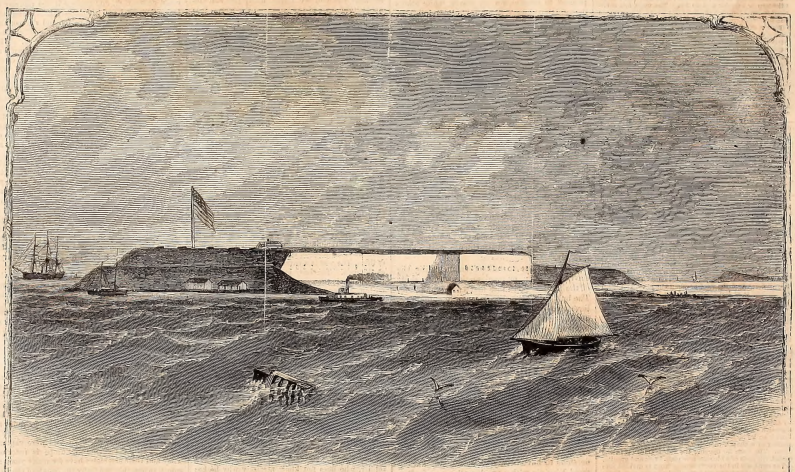
Ladies are invited to call and examine the splendid stock of dun furs and children's fancy hats now open at THIRY'S, 397 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 258.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.



View of Fort Warren Boston harbor.

Interior of the Fort.

FORT WARREN, BOSTON.

We devote the preceding page to illustrations of FORT WARREN in Boston harbor, the state prison where Mason, Slidell, and other rebels are now confined. The following description is from the Boston Journal:

George's Island, upon which Fort Warren is located, is situated about two miles west of Boston Light, fronting the main entrance to the harbor. It contains about forty-five acres, and is protected by a sea wall extending half way round the island to the most exposed point. The construction of the fort was commenced in 1833, under the direction of Colonel Sylvanus Thayer, of the United States Corps of Engineers. The work was continued until 1858, when operations were suspended by the failure of Congress to make the necessary appropriations. The fort is constructed of granite obtained principally from Quincy and Cape Ann. The sum of $1,600,000 has been expended by the Government upon the work, and it is regarded as the best built and cheapest work of its size in the United States. The sum of $275,000 is required to complete the fort, and that $500,000 to property sunk in. It is rated the most formidable work of defence in the United States, the intended armament being 320 guns, while Forts Monroe and Adams mount respectively about 200 guns. When fully armed and the fort will require a force of between five and seven hundred men.

The general plan of the fortification is a figure of five sides or fronts, with bastions, curtains, flanks, and ditch. The top of the parapet is 70 feet above low-water mark; while the height of the parade wall is 25 feet, and that of the scarp or exterior wall 30 feet. The main fort is entirely surrounded by a ditch 50 feet wide. The average length of each front is about 620 feet, making the entire circuit of the fortification 3156 feet. The area of the parade ground is about two acres. The space between the inner and outer walls is about 50 feet, and with the exception of the bastions of the fort is levelled and divided into casemates or quarters. The terre-plein, upon which is to be mounted the barbette guns, is 12 feet wide, and extends entirely around the top of the fort. The parade and terre-plein, or circles upon which the guns are to be worked, have been set on the most commanding fronts, but in the present time only one gun, and that a Columbiad, in the casemates, is mounted. Measure have, however, been taken to supply the fort with a battery of rifled cannon.

The main entry front, commanding the main channel, mounts 35 barbette guns, and beneath them in the casemate, protected by a bank for mounting 30 Columbiads in five flank guns, the latter designed to throw grapeshot for the defence of the ditches. In the rear of the main entrance being made to scale the ramparts, the ladders of the assailants could be thrown, the bait is raised. Over the entering the barbette are obliged to pass between "Dog Light" and the wall, which will build a mile of fire from the battery, in addition to which there is an outwork against the southerly flank, commanding not only the south channel, but ranging in the main entrance, upon which can be mounted a large number of seventeen-inch mortars.

The northeasterly front, commanding the Narrows, mounts 38 barbettes on the terre-plein, and a tier of casemate, protected by a bank for mounting 30 Columbiads in five flank guns, the latter designed to throw grapeshot for the defence of the ditches. In the rear of the main entrance being made to scale the ramparts, the ladders of the assailants could be thrown, the bait is raised. Over the entering the barbette are obliged to pass between "Dog Light" and the wall, which will build a mile of fire from the battery, in addition to which there is an outwork against the southerly flank, commanding not only the south channel, but ranging in the main entrance, upon which can be mounted a large number of seventeen-inch mortars.

The northeasterly front, commanding the Narrows, mounts 38 barbettes on the terre-plein, and a tier of casemate, which extends the entire length of the front. The bastion at the northeasterly front, also commanding the Narrows, will consist of 35 barbette guns, and several flank guns for defending the ditches and main entrance to the port. In advance of this front is an outwork in front of the main entrance, called a flank-zone or lunette of the shape. This is surrounded with loop-holes, and provided with fire-places, and is intended to be used either as a prison or for the defence of the field or plain entering. The fifth front is not in use, and a space in the casemate has been erected to a chapel, capable of accommodating 500 soldiers. The stone for flagging the floor is piled up in the chapel, the walls of which are now plain brick and mortar.

The casemate in the northeasterly front is divided into five spacious apartments for barracks for troops, each 100 by 17 feet, and provided with two fire-places, well lighted and ventilated. The capacity of this front is a portion, even in time of assault, is designed to be connected with the water face by double doors, over which the troops will be pulled, may retreat within the fort and close the heavy postern gates. These are apartments in the rear of each casemate in the sea front which, if necessary may be used for barracks. There are three circular staircases and four straight flights of stone stairs leading from the parade ground to the terre-plein. Magazines are located in the extreme end of each face and curtain, in the rear of each gun.

There are two wells of excellent water in the fort, which have never failed. The landing on the west side of the fort has a pier-head of three hundred feet. Much attempt has been made to ornament the grounds surrounding the fort by planting from 600 to 1000 shade trees. They are, however, quite young, and as yet do not afford much shade.

☞ EUROPEAN DEALERS will be supplied with HARPER'S WEEKLY by John Adams Knight, Publisher of the London Advertiser, 100 Fleet St., London, England, where Subscriptions and Advertisements will be received, and single copies of HARPER'S MONTHLY and WEEKLY furnished.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1861.

THE REBELS IN FLIGHT.

MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS and his fellow-rebels have fled from Richmond to Nashville. At the time Bull Run was fought we were told that Richmond was impregnable. It seems now that it is not quite safe enough; and as M'Clellan obstinately refuses to go into winter-quarters, the king of the rebels has taken flight with all his court. This is the second "flitting" of the "Confederate Government" since the war began. It will not probably be the last.

Nashville, we take it, is at least as accessible to our forces as Richmond. It possesses some remarkable advantages in regard to mountain defenses, but hardly more than the capital of Virginia. It is accessible on two sides, from Kentucky on the north, where Bull must have 40,000 men on the Nashville and Louisville Railroad, and from Memphis on the west, where we hope that Halleck and Foote will soon make a call with 80,000 or 100,000, and some big guns. It is a good deal further from the seaboard cities on the Atlantic than Richmond, which will be a comforting reflection for the Georgians and Carolinians, who will have to go there to protect Jeff Davis's Court while our naval expeditions are rapping at the doors of their homes.

It is not necessary, in order to end this war, that we should seize the rebel capital. In the course of a few weeks it is hoped that we shall hold every good sea-port on the Atlantic, and the line of the Mississippi from Cairo to the delta. This achieved, we can wait. Thus entrenched, it is a mere question of weeks how long the insurrection can endure atrophy.

THE SLAVERY QUESTION

SEVERAL of the newspapers are worrying themselves about the slavery question, some of them insisting that our generals shall forthwith proceed to emancipate the slaves, while others demand that slavery, alone of Southern interests, shall be shielded from damage during the war. Surely this discussion is irrelevant and idle at this time. Events alone can shape the course of the war, including its bearing on the institution of slavery. It is out of the power of the President or of his generals to determine the nature and extent of the changes which the war must produce in Southern society. Southern institutions, and Southern interests. We began the war with protests against the employment of slaves, and our generals uniformly returned fugitives to their masters. This was the only unobjectionable announcement of a change of policy; but no United States general, with the single exception of General Halleck who stands precisely where M'Clellan, Heintzelman, and the others stood three months ago), now tolerates slavehunting in his camp. Military necessity has compelled them all to welcome the information brought in by fugitive slaves, and labor wrought by black as well as white hands. Surely after such a beginning the enemies of slavery can afford to let time and Providence work undisturbedly.

It is nonsense to talk of emancipating the slaves by decree, or proclamation of any thing of the kind. You might as well emancipate your wives. The bulk of the Southern people thoroughly believe that our Government and our army are abolitionists. Any such proclamation would not surprise them or add to their dangers. They are acting as though it had been already promulgated. They would laugh at a paper decree of freedom as they would laugh at an more effect than Frémont's Brutum fulmen, or the paper blockades of old. In effect, wherever our armies penetrate emancipation becomes a fact, from the simplest circumstance, in the case where rebel bayonets rule slavery thrives despite all we may say or publish to the contrary.

The changes already wrought by events in the policy of our generals with regard to Slavery are instructive. General M'Clellan is understood to have been a Douglas man, and entered Virginia with the strongest prejudices in favor of Southern institutions. Even Beauregard, a proper concern for his devotion produced a wonderful change in his views. Others of the rebels with open arms at his camp, and their information has proved most useful. General Heintzelman is wise enough to know that a slave may bring information which may save the whole army. Virginian slave-owners complain bitterly of his growing tendency toward abolitionism. General Halleck is destined to go through the same improving process. When he finds himself on the march, within ten miles of the enemy, and it is a matter of life and death for him to know the enemy's position and numbers, he will reconsider the order which now excludes fugitive slaves from his camp for fear they should run back into slavery. Necessity is a most successful schoolmaster.

☞ MR. DU CHAILLE and his GORILLAS still occupy the attention of the English literary and scientific journals, though Darwin, Murchison, Horton, Owen, and Malone no longer participate in the fight. Retributive justice seems to have overtaken Mr. Du Chaillu's most bitter opponent, The Gray-cut Original. Museum having significant its appreciation of the value of Mr. Du Chaillu's contributions to Natural History by purchasing the subject of the controversy—the Gorillas, or infamous, gorillas—and placing them in the charge of Dr. Gray, who is curator of the Natural History department.

It seems too bad, however, that after Mr. Du Chaillu has so triumphantly vindicated the truth of his statements, and gained fresh Transatlantic laurels for American authorship by completely silencing his adversaries' batteries, he should be assailed by one of his own countrymen. An American correspondent informs the London Critic that Mr. Du Chaillu "is not the author of the volume of African Explorations, but it is the work of a New York literary rowdy, named NORDHOFF, commonly known as the Baron," and this information is commended to the serious attention of Dr. Gray and the London Morning Advertiser. The statement was immediately pronounced, by a correspondent of the London Morning Star, not only an unmitigated falsehood in regard to Mr. Du Chaillu, but also a despicable slander against one of our contributors. Condemned New York journalists, Mr. NORDHOFF—to whom, as a contemporary says, the term rowdy is about as applicable as to Mr. Bryant or Mr. Greeley. The English journalists, with their present rancorous disposition toward every thing American, will gladly avail themselves of the tradyfun of this scurrilous American correspondent. A Mr. OSGOOD (of the house of TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston) is said to be the correspondent of the London Critic.

THE LOUNGER.

A NEW CAREER.

DOUBTLESS, in the reports of the Thanksgiving Sermons you will see a great many just and pleasant observations of the kind. Of the war. It is the natural theme of the times. But especially upon Thanksgiving-day the preacher might turn his audience to consider what occasions of thankfulness the war offered. And these, too, he would find to be many and profound.

Think of the sudden access to so many young men. War is always terrible, and the military career is not always ennobling. But a war of sacred principle such as war on that to which Philip Sidney or that in which Joseph Warren fell —are wars which develop the finest traits and exalt the finest souls. Even as Raphael in Naples, a few years ago, was certainly engaged in no very lofty business, however brave he may have shown himself to be in it, so the young is be enlisted by many just men whether that war was not unjust.

The soldier lacked the inspiration of a noble cause. But the duty of the soldier in war on that to which Philip Sidney or that in which Joseph Warren fell —are wars which develop the finest traits and exalt the finest souls. Even as Raphael in Naples, a few years ago, was certainly engaged in no very lofty business, however brave he may have shown himself to be in it, so the young is be enlisted by many just men whether that war was not unjust.

barbarism of the rebellious section, and of the ferocity with which they wage the war. War is in itself so terrible that it may be said, a little ferocity more or less makes no difference. But even war has certain rules. Quarter upon surrender, for instance, and respect to a flag of truce.

At Gaynadotte there was the same kind of treachery shown as in the plot of the mine at Port Royal. We are dealing with men who have little of the honor of a civilized people. They show the temper and method of savages, and we should bear it constantly in mind to avoid all the traps we can. Civil wars are peculiarly fierce, and ours is not an exception to the rule. The tone and temper of General Sherman's proclamation were at singular variance with the noise in the fort and the known sentiment of South Carolina. It showed that the Government is animated by no hate, no insane and stupid fury, like that of the rebels; but that it means to be respected by all citizens, and that those who are armed against it will feel its power. The proclamation was too long, but it ended well.

The mine at Port Royal and the massacre at Guyandotte should leave no man in doubt that every hope that can be dealt this nation, and in every savage way, will not be spared by the rebels. They are frenzied and desperate, and why should we think they are to be soothed? They are not to be pacified, they are to be subjugated. They are to be forced by such means as the Wabash used, and such powder only, to lay down their arms. They are not to be entreated, they are to be compelled. And as Secretary Cameron says, every weapon that the Government can honorably use, and it may honorably use any, short of treachery—will be leveled against the rebellion.

This treacherous conception of fire and sword will not harm the nation, it will help it. A civil war is a terrible tonic. But a peace which is rottenness of cowardice and a decay of manhood is death. If we are slow to understand this, we are sure. The rebels themselves have taught us step by step, and we learn. Disbonor itself, treachery of every kind, and at the cost of precious lives, have shown us more and more distinctly the character and fury of our foe. They have strained every nerve to harm us. But they have not yet felt the full weight of our hand. That they will feel it in the ground-breaking beneath them, no one who studies the course of events and the progress of opinion can doubt.

Meanwhile let every honest man reflect upon the methods of the rebellion, and ask himself whether he feels a call to be peculiarly charitable to such an enemy.

THE WISDOM OF ACTION AND INACTION.

WHEN, early in the Revolution, Major Barton crossed Narragansett Bay at night and captured General Prescott upon Rhode Island, the general satisfaction among the patriots was not only that a prisoner of high degree had been secured, but that the circumstances of his capture showed that heroic audacity and ability which were the sure prophecies of ultimate success.

We have all been looking for similar enterprises in this war. We have been expecting to see the American shrewdness, and skill, and rapidity of movement vindicate themselves anew. To take responsibilities daringly, yet wisely, is to command success. And Napoleon Wilkes showed it in stopping the Trent, "putting the Sun Jacinto into position," and walking Messrs. Slidell and Mason over the side into the custody of the United States.

It is precisely what Major Barton would have done had he been in command. It is precisely what Napoleon Bonaparte and Andrew Jackson would have done. It was the wise promptitude which does the necessary deed and leaves the explanation and justification to follow.

In Saint-Beuve's "Causeries de Lundi" there is a remarkable letter of Napoleon's, and one of the most characteristic he ever wrote. He was discontented with the inertness of Augereau, who was organizing an army at Lyons. The date is February 21, 1814.

"——What! Six hours after receiving the first troops from Spain you are not in the field! Six hours of rest is quite enough for them. I conquered at Nangis with the brigade of dragoons coming from Spain, who the Bayonne had not drawn rein. Do you say that the six battalions from Nimes want clothes and equipage, and are unaccustomed? Augereau, what miserable excuses! I have destroyed 80,000 enemies with battalions of conscripts, scarcely clothed, and without cartridge-boxes. The National Guards are pitiful? I have here 4000 from Angers and Bretagne, in gaiters and shoes, and knapsacks; but with good weapons: and I have made them toil. There is no money, do you say? But where do you expect to get money, but from the pockets of the enemy? You have no money! Seize them. Or have you magazines? Eh, but this is too ridiculous! I order you to put yourself in the field twelve hours after you receive this letter. If you are still the Augereau of Castiglione, keep your command. If your sixty years are too much for you, relinquish it to the oldest of your general officers. The country is menaced and in danger. It can be saved only by daring and alacrity, and not by vain delays. You must have a nucleus of 6000 men in your troops? I have not so many, yet I have destroyed three armies, captured 40,000 prisoners, taken two hundred pieces of artillery, and thrice saved the capital. The enemy are in full flight upon Troyes? Do relieve them. Are no longer so of late. Resume the method and the spirit of '93. When Frenchmen see your plume waving in the van, and you, first of all, exposed to the enemy's fire, you will do with them whatever you will."

So prompt, so bold, was Napoleon. Yet he knew when to wait as well as to move. At Austerlitz Soult and the other generals begged him to advance. "Stop," replied Napoleon; "never move when your enemy is committing a fault."

We have wisely waited. And who does not feel that under M'Clellan we shall move as wisely?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

DOMESTIC COOKERY.

To make a Savage Roll.—Carry your sausage carefully to the top of the nearest hill, and trundle it carefully down.

To make a Trifle.—Buy Fun for a penny, and sell it at its true value.

Jam Tart.—Place your tart in the hinge of the door, and close briskly.

Open Tart.—Insert your knife carefully, and lift off the upper crust.

To Collar Beef.—Watch your opportunity, snatch up briskly, and carry home under your coat.

Pickled Pork.—Pull up a cabbage by the bush, and plant upside down.

Hardware.—Place your pastry in a fierce oven, and forget all about it.

Tempting Dumplings.—Pop into water, and snatch out again.

Heavy Drops.—Place your honey in a collender, and watch the effect from beneath.

[Advertisement.]

UNMANAGEABLE BOYS.—An Unmanageable Boy wishes to meet with a few more boys of tastes and habits similar to his own to object similar to his own, in order to make up a pleasure party for a visit to the tutor of the persuasive powers who has lately been advertising.

N.B. Each unmanageable boy must bring his own peashooter, India-rubber bands, slings, catapults, sticks, popguns, and the latest inventions.

Address—"Tommy," care of Nemo, Smash Hall, U.C.

ADVICE GRATIS.—How to hear your tooth being extracted without crying out. Hold your jaw.

A GRAND DRESS REHEARSAL.

It is a pretty dress rehearsal when a young lady takes a visitor up to her bedroom, and begins showing her all the wonderful new dresses she has had or been buying. She should try them all on, one after the other, before the looking-glass, and press her dear friend, in the most persuasive manner, to give her opinion upon each. The performance is all the more effective when the visitor happens to be in an inferior position of society, so that the pieces which are intended for the admiring sources are as nicely arranged as to be above the reach of her pocket. However, the best thing for preparation for a Grand Dress Rehearsal is when a young lady is going to a Queen's Drawing-Room. Too many young friends can not be invited to witness the éclat of so delightful a performance, taking care of course to avoid any interference from overcrowding, and even upon so rare an occasion servants have been known to be kindly admitted to witness the grand finale.

THE SONG OF THE YOUNGER SON.

I would gladly marry,
Could I but find
A girl of tastes and habit
Incorrespondent with mine!
One who for more pin-money
Will not whine,
And will even love her husband
Better than her father.

Who will share his fortune,
Nor complain of his close fist,
And without a pair of panics
Will manage to exist?
Who in London after August
To be seen won't be afraid,
And can flesh off her toilet
Without a lady's-maid.

Who'll not think a mile of walking
A cure for fifth or fun,
And even on emergency
Will travel by a 'bus,
Who'll mend a shirt or stocking,
And a jar or pot-pie bake,
And will not want a doctor
If her baby cries colic.

A wife who'll not look sulky
If entre blondes she be denied
With her milliner and tailor,
And fifty shops beside.
Who'll not be in bed at breakfast,
Nor of cruelty complain
If she have to dine without Champagne.

To fancy hats and flower-shows
Who will not be a fan,
Nor will deem a quiet evening
With her husband "dreadful slow."
Who can live without French novels,
And without an opera box,
Nor will want three parties nightly,
And twice a week a ball.

Who can go out on a visit
Nor want six new gowns a day,
And won't turn her nose up
At a stingeny bouquet.
Who'll walk out with her husband
If he can't afford a horse,
Nor will down on a bonnet
A fit ground for a divorce.

Who will be content with Margate,
When there's no Court,
Nor will think her Henry vulgar
If he can't dress for tea.
Find me such a charmer,
With habits wealth and poor good,
And then ask me if I marry?
Why, I should like to, I would!

ONE OF THE WORST ASPECTS OF THE WAR.—Since the great scarcity of cotton the Parisian milliners have been changing frills, and flounces, and such-like, to eighty-two per cent. extra for padding. If the scarcity should still continue, it will be frightful to contemplate upon the shoulders and thousands of Parisian ladies that will be left by the want of it during the coming winter.

LAST LINE FROM THE FRENCH KICKS.—There is from one Brighton, and the other from Boulogne.

An ingenious friend of ours says he has discovered the secret of Nessor's shirt. He says it was a shirt with 32 buttons all in a row. It fastens gorgeously in front, he says him, and the effect was that every time he put it on the absence of the buttons behind set the garments into such a burning rage that ultimately it was the death of him!

NO POPERY!

[A Joke made on Guy Fawkes' Day.]

Pam says that he will not allow the Roman Catholic population of Canada that he has sent out, as Governor-General, a Bishop. He says that he had excuse to better than none. Really, the joke's as objectionable as the opportunity is good for saying a good deal, as will be found out one of these days.

Rousseau used to say: "To write a good love-letter you ought to begin without knowing what you mean to say, and to finish without knowing what you have written."

Dobbs says he has one of the most obedient boys in the world. He tells him to do as he pleases, and he does it without murmuring.

Love partakes so much of modesty, confidence, and fidelity, that it awakens these virtues in the bosoms of those who were previously strangers to them.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

BOMBARDMENT OF PENSACOLA.

We learn through rebel sources that the steamers Wyoming and Colorado and the gunboat Sen Pickens have opened a heavy fire on the rebel General Bragg's forces and the Pensacola Navy-yard, and the town of Warrington has been totally destroyed by the hot shot poured upon it from Fort Pickens. General Bragg, in dispatches which he has widely circulated all over the South, describes the affair as a rebel victory, and reports that the United States steamers had to haul off, being badly damaged by the fire of the rebel batteries. It is admitted that the destruction done by the shells from the fort and ships was very considerable, and that the Navy-yard was set on fire three times by the hot shot from Fort Pickens. General Bragg boasts that the walls of the fort were battered in several places, a fort which, from the caliber of the guns he had to bring to bear upon it, and the immense strength of the fort itself, is highly improbable.

THE REBELS SHIFTING QUARTERS.

The important event of the day is the sudden flight of the rebel Government and Congress from Richmond to Nashville, Tennessee. The rebel Congress assembled at the former place on the 18th, and elected the Stomger of the Davis there on 19th. It appears from the Richmond Enquirer that a resolution is pending to remove the rebel government to a more secure locality in the interior of Tennessee.

THE REBEL ARMY AT MANASSAS.

A deserter reports the rebel force about Centreville, where headquarters are established, as numbering 65,000 men, and as many more all along the Potomac lines. Centreville, he states, is well defended, but has no siege-guns. At Manassas, however, there are some heavy guns. He describes the troops as being in good spirits, pretty well fed, clothed, and armed, and under the impression that the war is one of independence, and ridiculing the idea of subjugation. This impression they receive from their officers and chaplains.

TWO VIRGINIAN COUNTIES IN THE UNION.

The War Department received information last week that the Union forces in Accomac and Northampton counties, Virginia, have taken nine guns belonging to the rebels. It is further stated that the people there express themselves as being tired of rebel rule, and anxious to resume trade with the northern States. Gen. Wool's troops have been told to take into consideration the future disposition of the two counties. The Government has fully responded to the spirit of General Dix's proclamation, and Mr. Chase has ordered the restoration of the light-house at Cape Charles. The postal connection of both counties will be at once renewed, the Postmaster-General having sent a special agent there for that purpose.

NORTH CAROLINA RE-ENTERING THE UNION.

The Provisional State government for North Carolina, the establishment of which has been contemplated for months, was formally instituted on the 19th inst. by a Convention of delegates and loyal citizens representing forty-five counties of the State. Ordinances were passed acknowledging the Constitution of the United States; appointing Martin Nash Taylor provisional Governor of North Carolina; pronouncing the secession act illegal and of no force or effect, and empowering the new Governor to order special elections for representatives to the Federal Congress.

A NEW BLOCKADING FLEET.

Seventeen old whale ships have been purchased by the Government at New Bedford, Massachusetts, and loaded with what the soldiers of the Massachusetts Sixth regiment call "Baltimore rotiron" (stone and brickbats, and taken South to be sunk at the entrance of certain harbors. The following are their names: Archer, Alexander, Archer, Awanon, Canada, Courier, Era, Henrietta, Garland, Co. Richmond, Rebecca Simms, Kensington, South Dresden, Herald, Potomac, Marie Theresa, Leviathan, Hope, Corinthian, Sarah Sheafe, Montreal. They also have a propeller at New London for the same purpose: ship Fortune, bark Fortune, ship Coeur, bark Trenton, ship Manor, ship Meteor, ship Robin Hood, ship Phanee. The vessels of this fleet have been fitted for the service in a hasty manner.

It is understood that they are going to Savannah and Charleston.

AFFAIRS IN MISSOURI.

General Halleck has given orders to exclude fugitives slaves from the camps, as they have been detected giving military information to the rebels. General Price's rebel army is moving toward the centre of the State, and General Hurlbut of Illinois is said to be about to enter Missouri for the purpose of ravaging the southern counties. It is supposed that General Price will not be struck, even if the doubtless force him into an engagement. Intelligence has reached Jefferson City, Missouri, by a letter from Rolla, that the rebels had burned down the town of Warsaw to prevent its being made winter-quarters for the Union troops. A large quantity of Government stores were destroyed in the conflagration.

OUR ARMY.

It has been ascertained that the volunteer forces of the Union army now amount to six hundred thousand men.

JEFF DAVIS'S MESSAGE.

Jeff Davis's Message to the rebel Legislature is contained in the Richmond papers of 20th. He finds cause for congratulation in what he calls the success of the Confederate arms, and declares that the men, military supplies, and financial condition, the Confederate States are much stronger now than when the struggle commenced. He alleges as a reason for the invasion of Kentucky, that the National forces were about to occupy Tennessee, and not to retreat. He declares that the Union can never be reconstructed, as the causes which originally induced a separation have been strengthened; characterizes the nature of the hostilities on the part of the United States as barbarous, and declares that the National soldiers are incendiaries and robbers. He pronounces very favorable financial condition of the rebel States in a very hasty and imperfect manner, and is disposed to speculate in imperfect data and fictions. He sees in the capture of Messrs. Mason and Slidell from a British vessel a cause for war between the United States and Great Britain—declaring that "we have been forced to submit to the insolence of the Yankee in the streets of London. The blockade he pronounces a failure. Finally, he declares that any hope that the rest of the rebellion will be attended at the proper time. He seems, however, to be forgotten by the rebels that Port Royal, Hatteras, Port Royal, and the recent Union demonstrations in Eastern Tennessee are going to have enough to occupy attention strictly.

A NEW MOVEMENT AT THE SOUTH.

On the 4th a flag of truce came down from Norfolk, with dispatches to General Wool, informing him that no more ships of trade will be received at Hampton Roads. It is inferred that the major portion if not all the rebel troops stationed at Sewall's Point, Pinner's Point, and Craney Island are to be withdrawn and sent post-haste to South Carolina, to reinforce out our troops before any reinforcements can reach them.

AFFAIRS AT HILTON HEAD.

Information has been received that Hilton Head relative to the progress made by the Union troops is fast increasing. Every thing that had been ordered by the consignal progress, a dock built, storehouses erected, stores on hand, a hospital established, and other work accomplished, of a nature vast and surprising when it is taken into consideration that the troops have been in the place ten days. A large quantity of sea-island cotton is on its way to New York, and by the middle of this port last week, brought a quantity of the staple with her.

PANIC AT THE SOUTH.

The panic caused throughout the whole board rebel States by the success of the national fleet at Port Royal appears to be much greater than the rebel papers care to acknowledge. They print enough, however, to give us a tolerably fair idea in reference to it. For instance, a dispatch from Charleston, dated November 11, which we find in a Richmond paper, says that the failure of the shore batteries to demolish at least one of the attacking vessels, has sadly shaken the popular confidence in the efficiency of the rebel guns, and so alarmed are many of the "terrified souls that infest all the Southern cities," that the effect may already be seen in "the burdening of freight-trains which leave almost hourly for the interior." Savannah is especially pointed at as a city where the panic has been general, while heightened efforts are being now made.

MASON AND SLIDELL IN FORT WARREN.

The Sun Jacinto reached Boston on 28th, and landed Messrs. Mason and Slidell, and their secretaries, Eustis and M'Farland, at Fort Warren.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

LORD PALMERSTON ON OUR TROUBLES.

At the Lord Mayor's dinner in London on Lord Mayor's day, November 9, the chief magistrate of that city presented the "Foreign Embassadors," coupling the name with the name of Mr. Adams, the American Minister. That gentleman, in his reply, stated that his mission was to promote and perpetuate the friendly relations of the two countries. Lord Palmerston, in proposing the embassadors' health, said, "Ever since the Government has had the honor to be, for a time, threaten to interfere with the supply of cotton, the temporary evil with the prosperity of permanent good. England would find in various portions of the globe a sure and ample supply, which would render her more independent. He stated that the country witnessed with affliction the lamentable difference among her American cousins; but added, it was not for her to pass judgment in their dispute. He expressed a hope of the speedy restoration of harmony and peace.

THE EXPEDITION TO MEXICO.

The allied expedition to Mexico is fairly on the move. The British war-ships Conqueror, Snapdragon, and Diamond sailed on the 13th instant for the 19th, with a well-disciplined force of marines and some heavy Armstrong guns on board. Napoleon had ordered his contingent to leave from whatever ports the vessels designated were stationed, while Spain was burning with impatience for the moment of action.

SPAIN.

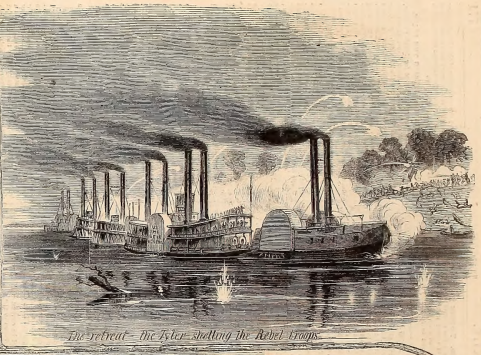
THE MEETING OF THE CORTES.

The Session of Cortes has been opened in Madrid. Queen Isabella, in her speech, refers in the most handsome terms to the recent successes of her diplomats and troops both in Cochin-China and San Domingo, and is quite hopeful of fair prospects in Mexico.

OUR MODEST FERNANDO.—(An Engraving on Wood.)

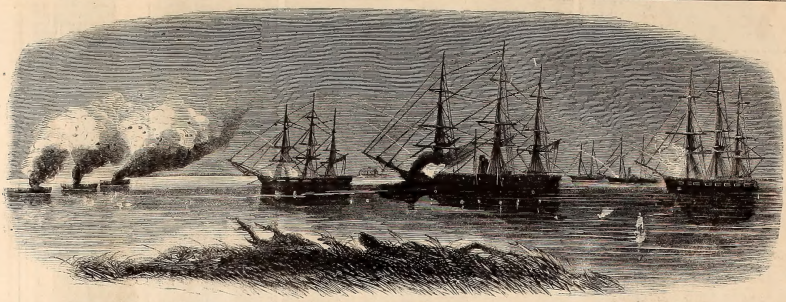
"I did intend to let BROTHER BEN have this, as it's getting a little threadbare, and to try one of my new ones. But one must sacrifice something for one's country in these times."

The Mississippi River—Seven miles S. Belmont



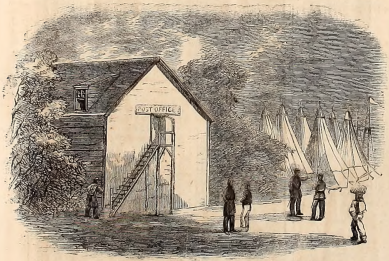
The Retreat—The Tyler Shelling the Rebel Troops.

THE BATTLE OF BELMONT—CHARGE OF COLONEL DOUGHERTY, TWENTY-SECOND ILLINOIS REGIMENT, UPON THE REBEL BATTERIES.—SKETCHED BY MR. BILL TRAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 779.]



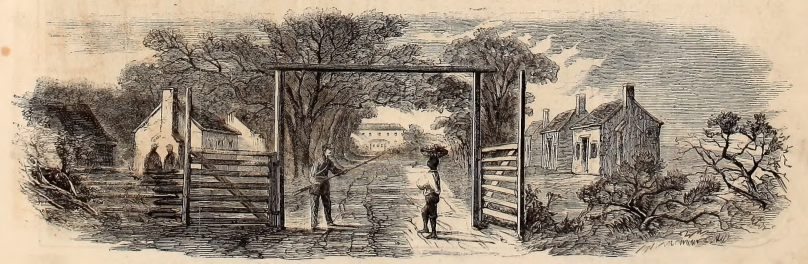
THE BATTLE AT THE SOUTHWEST PASS—THE RAM "MANASSAS" ATTACKING THE "RICHMOND."—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF THE "RICHMOND."—[SEE PAGE 779.]

THE BATTLE AT THE SOUTHWEST PASS—RETREAT OF THE REBEL FLOTILLA.—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF THE "RICHMOND."—[SEE PAGE 779.]



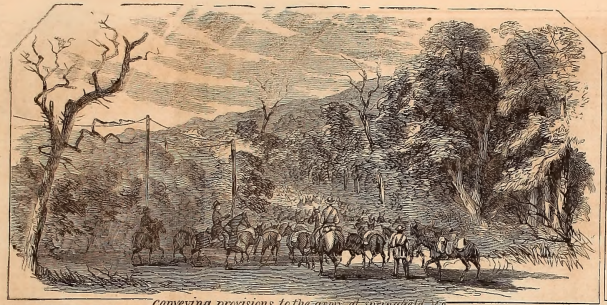
THE POST-OFFICE AT HILTON HEAD, SOUTH CAROLINA.

LANDING STORES AT HILTON HEAD, SOUTH CAROLINA.

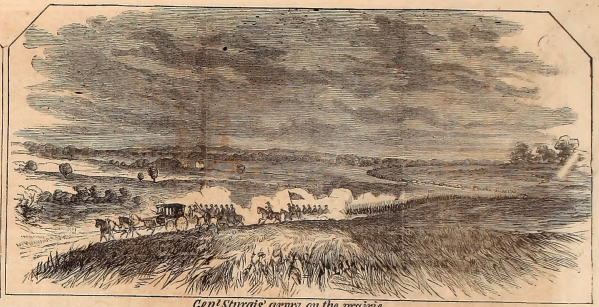


OUR PICKET AT GENERAL DRAYTON'S MANSION, HILTON HEAD, SOUTH CAROLINA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 779.]

VIEWS OF THE SOUTH-WEST PASS OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.—[SEE PAGE 779.]

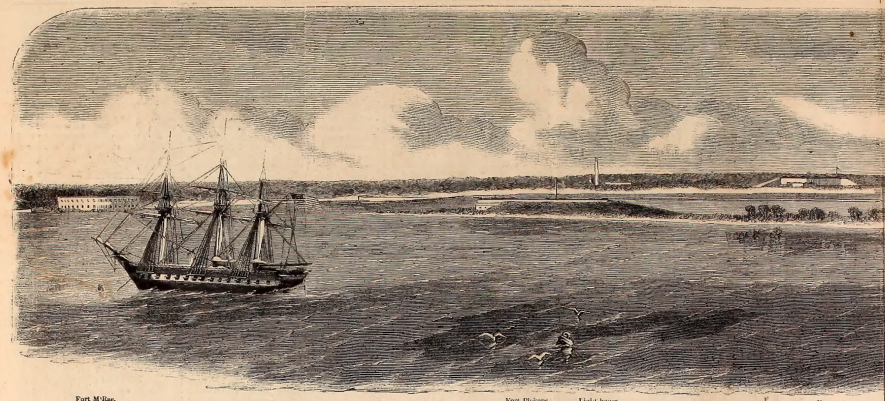


Conveying provisions to the army at Springfield, Mo.



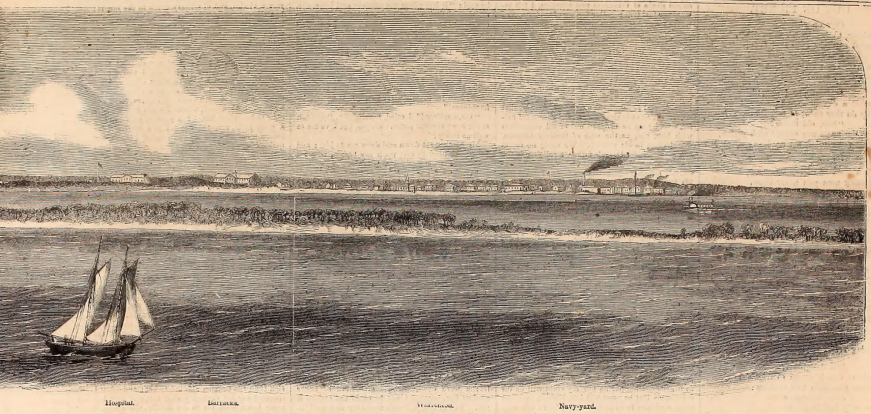
Gen! Sturgis' army on the prairie.

Camp Nevin, Kentucky, General M'Cook's Head-quarters.—Sketched by Mr. H. Mosler.—[See Page 779.]

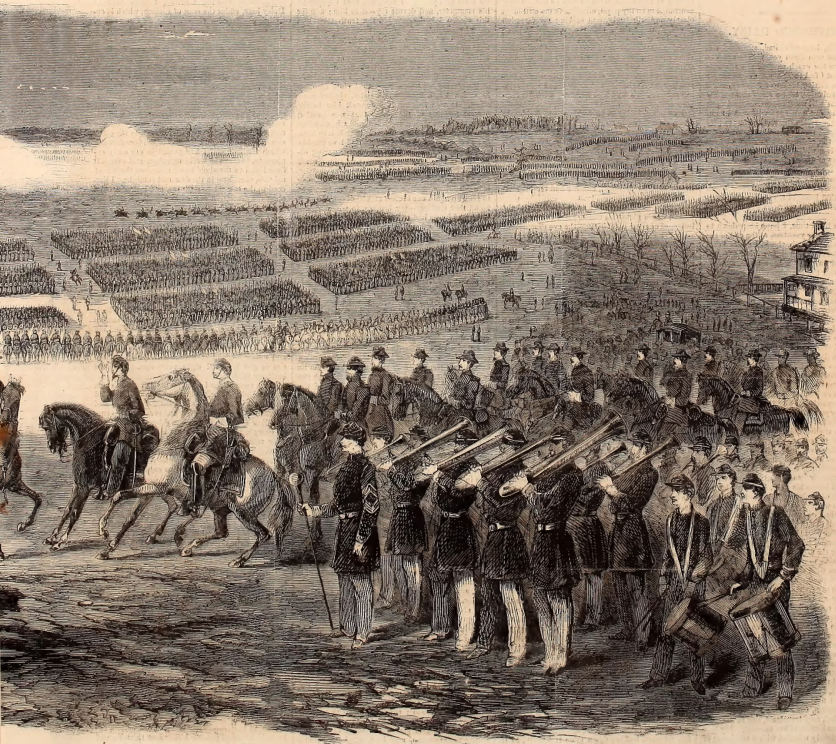


VIEW OF THE HARBOR OF PENSACOLA—SANTA ROSA ISLAND AND PORT PICKENS IN THE FORE

THE GREAT REVIEW AT BAILEY'S CROSS ROADS, VIRGINIA, ON NOVEMBER



GROUND, REBEL BATTERIES AND NAVY-YARD IN THE DISTANCE.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]



20, 1861.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST FROM THE TOP OF A BARN.—[SEE PAGE 779.]

OUT ON PICKET.

Out on picket,
Cronching, hiding 'neath the thicket,
Scared at every twig that falls;
Oh, confound me!
I can hear them all around me—
Hear those awful Minié balls.

"Ping! ping! ping!"
Oh, what a deadly song they sing!
Why do they shoot at me, I wonder?
"Say, old fellow!
Yon whose pants are striped with yellow,
D'you want to kill me dead as thunder?

"Louisiana,
That's a kind of off-hand manner,
Shooting men you never knew.
Now, just stop that,
Else you see I'll take a pop at
All such looking men as you."

Past me rushes
Another ball into the bushes.
"Look out for a leaden pebble!"
So exclaiming
This to him while I was aiming—
"Crack!" and dying lay the rebel!

So on picket,
Peeping from behind the thicket,
All day long we kept up shooting:
How exciting,
After once you've used to fighting,
Taking rebels off their footing!

Its delightful!
Though at first it seems so frightful
Killing people in this manner:
Just remember,
It was only last December
That they slew us YON OUR BANNER!

CLEVELAND, OHIO, Nov., 1861.

THE GATHERED DAISY.

My native hills, long unvisited, surround me, though I have not yet been yet, for the sun was gone down before the coach reached the entrance of the valley. But I feel them about me, no longer a mere dream, a fitting vision of memory, but a reality of God's universe, whose steep and narrow paths my own feet will tread to-morrow, and upon whose live ropes my nerves will rest in unwearied confidence. Twice I have been out to peer into the thick night, until my eyes might be detected painfully by the stars, dark profiles, without light or perspective, which cross the clouded horizon in single lines of unchanging, threatening, utter blackness. No faint gleam along the whole boundary; no trace of the heavenly forgotten day: only those obscure, sullen curves. They crush down the hope that brought me hither with Margaret. They extort from me sighs and irrepressible tears.

Again, for the third time, I have been down to the gnarled and gloomy yew-tree, at the end of the garden walk, facing Elmeth, the hill where I was born. As I loitered there vainly gazing upward, the clouds rather broke for a little while, and the moon came up over the sharply defined outline of the great mountain beyond; she poured a stream of luster over the valley and upon the peak of Elmeth; and at that moment a bright red light under it marked the very spot of the old homestead. My pulse quickened, my eyes quickening light, but rapidly the heavy clouds gathered again, and rolling down the slopes of Wodehill, engulfed Elmeth and its red home light in impenetrable darkness. Once more the invisible landscape lay before my straining eyes an awful and mysterious blank; like a winding sheet spread smoothly over the dead limbs and features of one beloved.

We were both artists, my brother and I, and we loved our art sincerely. Only there was this difference: Godfrey possessed true genius, I had only the gift of appreciating it. We worked side by side in the same room, under the same light, with the same pencils and colors. I was always ready for work, and painted uniformly; but he, with long intervals of total abstraction, and with throes of agony and self-distrust, wrought out his conceptions. It was enough for me to glance once at his face, as he stood before his easy, to learn whether it was a moment of exultation in conscious power, which lacked no word or sign of mine to add to its strength, or a moment of conflict with the doubting demon of depreciation, which must needs be exorcised by a few sharp words of work-a-day sense, or appeased by a cheerful sylvan of praise. Therefore, recognizing the difference between us, I stood humbly on one side, to watch his inspired progress, or to uphold him in his stately hands in his hours of reaction and depression.

I worked with my commoner powers in sketches of local scenery, and studies of heads in crayon, which obtained some celebrity in the exhibitions of the country town where I pursued my vocation. Nor was there in my temperament, as there was in Godfrey's, any painful sensitiveness to prevent me becoming a teacher of our art. I could earn my living and his, while he studied in the Royal Academy and advanced in the favor of the great artist who was his patron. Soon his genius, his success, his fame, would repay my toils a hundred-fold.

For my pupil, Margaret Wilson, whom I called Daisy, I formed no common attachment. There was a subtle charm, even to me a woman, in her childlike, dimpled, rosy loveliness, and in the helpless, clinging tenderness of her manner. My love for her was curiously mingled with a sentiment of protection and pity; and when she sat at my feet, as she liked to do, fondling my hands and gazing up at me with liquid hazel eyes softened into the softest shade of reverence and affection, I felt toward her just that peculiar feeling of tender regard which we express in the word loving-kindness.

Of course Godfrey and Daisy loved one another. He came direct from the solo study of woman as revealed to him by the bold models of his life-schools, to the daily companionship of an innocent, childish girl, who treated him with coy and timid deference. I considered Daisy, my fair, fresh, simple-hearted Daisy, worthy even of my nobly-gifted brother, built with a wisdom and a wide celebrity; and I almost felt a pang of jealousy, that whereas I, as only the sister of the successful artist, would be cropped out of all conversation with him, she, as the wife of Godfrey Lincoln, would share in his renown. We made no secret of the matter. Sir Daisy's father, a solicitor in the town, had a high appreciation of our art, and was already satisfied of Godfrey's eminent talents and his honorable and manly character. Daisy had been no concealment from the first, and Mr. Wilson knew that when Godfrey left London he occupied my studio alone, where Daisy spent her leisure hours. So as I was particularly his favorite, they deputed me to communicate to him the deep true love that existed between them. He listened uninterruptedly to the end, a placid smile playing blandly about his mouth, and with many acquiescing gestures as I unfolded to him Godfrey's praise, and hopefully of his brilliant future. Then he responded with a calm wisdom which recommended itself to my own mind, and talked of Daisy's youth and my brother's need of greater artistic advantages before he was encumbered with a wife and family. "We must not ruin our artist," he said; "let Godfrey go upon the Continent for two years or so—I will lend him the means, and you, my good, industrious Emma, shall be his security—and let his genius develop into the maturity I anticipate by the study of the great masters. Then with a positive engagement, though neither he nor my child will be inconstant. But he must win her, Emma; he must paint a picture to be talked about." In this way it was settled.

Godfrey went abroad to work for the consummation of our hopes, mine as well as his. I continued to be my pupil, clinging to me still more closely and winningly, and seeking my direction in every thing; she would soon be necessary to me. I left her to lean to her own understanding and decision. And because I knew that Godfrey's character possessed one of the noblest elements of man's nature, and he chose to have those he loved dependent upon him, I did not greatly care to correct her gentle timidity. I left her to look upward to lay my brother's wife into harmony with his temperament.

I expected Daisy to be feeble where feebleness was a charm, and to be strong where strength was necessary. We were separated; for I was anxious to return Mr. Wilson's loan to Godfrey, that when my noble home he might begin his career without being hampered with debt; and when Mr. Wilson procured me a lucrative engagement for six months, I accepted it gladly. It was a professional residence which, by this time, another had taught himself to shame.

Coming home when it was ended, I found the pliant, docile girl, who would yield to any strong influence exerted upon her, on the eve of marriage with her country friend, and the Indian army, whose regiment was to sail immediately. He had a free, open, vehement, soldierly bearing, and was impassioned in his expressions of admiration; while her father gently but firmly pushed the matter on, until, as Daisy told me, weeping in my arms, she would not help herself. She faithful people, it is true, but it was too late; if I had never left her she would have had power to be constant. The child's character was not developed, and such supple tendrils will wind round the support nearest to them. After all, there is more sensuousness, more intensity of light, in these weak natures than in those that love more passionately. Once assured of the truth of a man's love, I could live a lifetime of unwearied faith in him. But Daisy needed to feel, day by day, that she was being cared for; and when Godfrey was no long absent, and John Wilson was not there, Daisy, after vehemently protested, she sacrificed her first love, though not without a grievous suffering.

I did not dare to tell Godfrey of the falsehood, lest he should remain abroad, far away from me, who loved him so truly, and who could console him with living consolation. So, though Daisy was married, and had left England before the time of Godfrey's return, he came home in ignorance, bringing with him the picture which was to be the work here. He had been always of a reserved and reticent disposition, and we had often worked side by side for days with but few words passing between us. But now, in the joy of coming home, he was voluble and excited, making my very heart ache by his expressions of delight. The picture was awaiting me, containing his picture was carried up into my studio, and he stood before it, impatient to disclose to me the work, yet hesitating with the nervous air of thamefacedness. How was I to tell him of Daisy's perfidy?

"Emma," he said, "I wish Daisy could be the first to see it, even before you, to whom I owe every thing—my perseverance and success, even my future darling wife. Don't think me an ungrateful scoundrel."

"I never shall, Godfrey," I answered; "but listen. Before you left, Daisy was not your own mind upon becoming a true and noble artist, elevating the people by the teaching symbols and representations of our art, and you were willing to endure toil and difficulty, yes, and sorrow, so that your own soul might attain a pure excellence. What say you, brother, if you must relinquish Daisy or your art—which should it be?"

He leaned in deep thought against the case for a few minutes, looking down upon it fixedly, as if he saw through its panels the work of his own hands and brain. Then a deeper color flushed under his sun-burned skin. "This is dear to me," he said: "it has given me anxiety and hope, dissatisfaction and content, and has played with every emotion of my nature except my love. There only Daisy's touch rests, and I find that there are hidden depths that have been concealed even from myself. I feel a living, throbbing heart, and an immortal spirit knitted to mine forever. Let art go rather than that I should stand alone again, divorced from this complement of myself. We shall honor marriage, Emma. We shall give truth for truth, love for love, life for life. It is an infinite happiness!"

"Oh, Godfrey!" I cried, mournfully, "you can never have another sister. Do you not love me as well as Daisy?"

My brother sat down and drew me to him; and I laid his head upon my bosom, where I could not see the working of his face.

"Godfrey," I said, "do you not remember all these years that we have grown up together? Daisy could never know you as I do, because your life has been mine as well—all your pursuits and pleasures and sorrows. She is very weak, brother; there is no dependence to be placed upon her. We have built upon the sand."

He loosened his head and moved restlessly, as if to free himself from my hands, which lay upon his head; but I pressed it closer down, lest I should see his face.

"My darling brother, my dearest, best Godfrey, she counted herself unworthy of you. She is married, and gives me news of your picture."

Then I stopped and listened, but there was a voiceless hush in that room; and the common empty sound that streamed in from without jarred and clashed upon my ears, while the beating temples under my fingers palpitated with fierce and feverish rapidity.

"O God!" he groaned at last, "it is impossible!"

Then I told him all, speaking in a whisper, as if she were dead, without one word of anger against her, because I felt he could not endure it yet. But of Daisy's falsehood and unworthiness I spoke with poignant bitterness, for he had acted cruelly in feeling Godfrey's love and hope for these two years. He said, for all, I would be his comforter, and devote myself to him; and for this reason I had concealed the truth from him until he could bear it like a man.

While I was speaking, he to whom I had betrothed myself only three days before, and whom I had almost forgotten in the sight of Godfrey's misery, entered my mind with the assured step of one who had the freedom of it; and I instinctively at his coming withdrew from that close embrace in which we, brother and sister, clasped each other. It was as though I forsook him in the fiercest moment of the storm that was beating down his hopes and his life, and slipped away into a safe and sunny refuge inaccessible to him. James Saville told him of our mutual love frankly and joyously, and Godfrey, bowed, gazing directly into our faces with features set like a mask of iron.

Till then I did not know the cruelty and jealousy of man's nature. The next morning, when I thought to take up again our broken thread of confidence, I found that Godfrey, my brother, in whom all my plans and hopes had centred all my life long, until this latter and very different tie had been formed between James Saville and me, whom I loved no less because I loved another, nay, whom I loved more tenderly while this shadow of a separation was passing over us, had deserted me, had banished himself from his only remaining sanctuary of affection. Godfrey was gone, leaving a few poignant words of reproach and faithful parting, with willfully deceiving him by the concealment of Daisy's infidelity and my own betrothal.

Every effort to find out my dear brother was fruitless; and after the lapse of some months I was married to James Saville, being alone with no one of my blood to give me away. Godfrey, he, or rather my picture, had been sent to the Paris exhibition, and I, absorbed into the circle of his family. The autumn exhibitions were open in London, and to them he took his work. Before leaving eagerly through the catalogue of the British Institution, I found the name I wanted, Godfrey Lincoln, the exhibition of two pictures of his, and I started slightly; but the address appended to the name was that of a picture agent, and when I applied to him he could give me no information, only that he, or rather that his paintings were already sold at a.... price.

Afterward, for years, I frequented every gallery of pictures open to the public, studied, reading all reviews a record of his wanderings. Sometimes he was in Norway, among wild, tempest-scarred rocks and stormy seas; then in the Tyrol, in desert and volcanic Iceland; and again upon the painted sierras of Spain. No eye saw the story in them which made them palpitate to me; no fatherhood the deep melancholy of these stormy seas, and gloomy skies, and desolate mountains; no one detected, as I did, in each successive picture, the infinite touches in the transparent texture of a cloud, in the crest of a wave, in the ripple of an inland lake, or in the crystal of a mountain, the definite lines of a woman's face, which seemed to start from the artist's soul, and blend itself with every work of his imagination. He never looked, knew it or not, there was always in some passage of the landscapes a shadowy, undefined suggestion of Daisy's features, though he never dreamed to repay, by such portraits and privations for his sake in past years. Ah! This was not the compensation I looked forward to, when I labored side by side for him at my poor, little, insignificant, water-color sketches.

Daisy's father died poor, and was therefore soon forgotten in his town; and her memory was almost lost to every one but me, until the mutiny in India awoke a feeling of personal interest in our fair young townswoman, now recollected with something of anxiety by her former school-fellows and old admirers. Vague reports were circulated now and then; rumors of awful massacre in which she was a victim, and of solitary death in the jungle; but the mutiny raged on, and we had no definite intelligence of her, and my resentment falling before the terrible peril of her position in that continent of bloodshed, I thought and prayed for Daisy as if she had been my sister.

So many years passed that my children were making me forget the time when I was Emma Lincoln, though I talked to them often of their Uncle Godfrey, and called one of my boys by his name when I went, as was my custom, to an exhibition in Liverpool, where I could find again a clew to his recent life. His picture, well hung in the central light, arrested my eye in a moment; for before me I saw the peaked crag of Elmeth, our native hill, with the golden-green slopes of Wodehill behind, darkening under the livid hues of a gathering thunder-cloud, just as we had often watched it in our childhood, folding-tightly hand in hand, and kidding one another in frightened whispers not to be afraid. I gazed with my heart; and becoming a child again, wept childishly before my brother's picture of our birth-place.

I was yet standing there, with my veil drawn down to hide my tears, when a voice very low, and weak, and tremulous, addressed to me a question about the painting I seemed to scrutinize as closely. It was the shy and timid utterance I used to love in Daisy; and I saw that none other but Daisy herself, with sunken eyes where there dwelt a time-worn look of fear, and lips that trembled, and hands that grasped each other nervously, stood beside me, pressing—not to me, but the work of Godfrey, whom she had betrayed.

I took Daisy home to my lodgings, and heard her story; one that was but a repetition of the horrors I had read shudderingly, and which I had thought could never be. Enough that she was come back to England a widow, with but one child remaining of the three that had been born to her. She was poor, moreover, having no other provision than the pension allotted to her; and when I resumed my old authority over her, and bade her come home with me to my family, she resigned herself to my guidance with the implicit dependence of her girlhood.

Therefore, reading Godfrey, I have brought Daisy here, under the crag of Elmeth, which is engulfed in mist and clouds. She does not know, this fragile, broken-hearted, hopeless woman, that she is lying, dreaming dreams of the Indian perils, at the very foot of the hill where Godfrey has fixed his solitary home, and dwells apart, crushing down his best and highest nature. I know that, when the sun looks over the brow of Wodenhill, a new life dawns for both.

It was an October morning when Daisy and I quitted the quiet village street, carpeted with almost untrodden leaves, and went up, step by step cart-road leading over the table-land to the other mountain village. I led Daisy to the door through the lonely farm; I had passed it in early exchange, to face the world together; and across it from limbs to threshold hung unbroken threads of cobwebs, sparkling in the dew and sunlight. I listened to the breathless stillness, and looked around upon the desolation of the homestead, till my hope nearly died away.

"Oh, Daisy!" I cried, "you do not know this place. It is where we were born, Godfrey and I. Those are our own fields and meadows where we were children. When we came down yonder hill, and I remembered the days before we left home to live in your native village, which was the first that might have been, and all that ought to have been, my spirit would have fainted but for the hope that Jesus Christ has died for me." Then I led Daisy, and the clergyman, to whom I wrote when we found his picture of Elmeth, says he has been living here for a little while. I took the picture my brother to me. It was you who deprived me of him. You must go to him with me. Forget your miserable feelings, which were unconsecrated and unblessed, and seek him as if you were the simple girl he loved eight years ago. Give me back my brother!"

For a moment, as I spoke, a flush of youth came back to Daisy's face, and a gleam of light kindled upon it from the past; but as she turned away, and lifted up her eyes to the fair and peaceful hills surrounding us, their dark irides dilated with terror, as though I, the friend she had once painted on their retina, I should find a far different vision there. Then the heavy lids closed over them, the head was suddenly inclined downward, and Daisy's lips moved in a whisper. She seemed to utter a sort of prayer.

I saw, however that I was insensible to every sorrow that did not come home to me, and touch me my own self; therefore Daisy had caused me to pass through years of suffering, until Thou hast pierced even to my soul. Come a little nearer to me, O my brother, that I may speak to you. Enough, now that my eyes are to see, and my ears are to hear, this trouble which I alone have wrought!

On the other side of the house, which faced a sudden dip in the outline of the hill, overlooking the valley, was another window I had seen the first night the evening before, there was a second entrance, through which Daisy and I found unobstructed access into the large kitchen. I observed in a glance that with the impulse of habit the chief pieces of furniture were arranged in their accustomed places; but the whole room was covered with cobwebs, half-finished pictures that were hung against the walls, and a bundle of pencils lying upon the deal table with a careless assurance of Godfrey's residence, though the kitchen was untenanted. I could not tarry there, so near to the completion of my hopes, and leading Daisy quickly through, I ascended to the room where we, as children, had made our first essays at painting upon the white-washed walls. We heard the movements of some one within, deliberate footsteps passing hither and thither; and Daisy laid her hand upon the latch, and in a moment stood face to face with Godfrey.

The window in the southward gable was shroudeded to the topmost panes, and the sun, low-lying at that season, thought it was now noontide, did not rise above the lintel, and shone in a stream of condensed brightness upon Daisy, as she stood just within the door, beside the easel where Godfrey was painting. The rest of the room was in comparative obscurity; but my eyes, educated to a rapid observation of effect in light and shade, discovered the glimmering forms of white plaster casts, and burnished bronze models, and draped lay-figures scattered about, with elaborated pictures, not of still, inanimate landscapes, but of vivid human life and interest. I saw them without looking, for my attention was riveted upon my brother. On his face, whose likeness I had so often painted that I knew every line, I was reading something more than the infallible, authentic register of these past years; the broad forehead furrowed with austere gloom; the dark, deep-set eyes fixed upon a grave of concentrated intensity that never wavered into softness; the lips locked into morose reticence and disdain. He did not glance at me then, and for a minute or two we all stood motionless and speechless.

"You have been avenged," said Daisy, her eyes dropping before Godfrey's gaze; and she spoke in a calm, passionless tone of suffering, as if she was resuming an interrupted confession which had been often overheard and learned with much labor. "You have been avenged sorely. I did not know myself, nor did you know me, or you would never have laid upon me the trial of a long separation. If I was not assured every day of love, it died out of my consciousness, and I turned elsewhere. Even my father I used to think little of when he was not present. The long weeks and months, and the distance of many miles between us, blotted out the reality of our relationship. It was only when I saw that I could feel; and when I never met your eyes looking on me, nor heard your voice calling me, nor felt your hand guiding mine, I forgot you. And my cousin was there, always with me from morning till night, meeting me every where with some demonstration of his passionate love; and my father urged me, and Emma was gone away as well as you, so that I had no one to help me to be true to you. Then, to my great misery, I found that if you had understood me, you would not have trusted me so myself; at your side, and leaning upon you, I could have been true to you at last, as I was left. I did love you as I could love, and you have been avenged. Since I was false to you, I have been made to feel the misery of a wide-open eyes that could not close to shut it out; and now that I am here before you, never having seen you since that sad day when you left me to be away for two long years, and I could die for very sorrow at your feet, I meet neither love nor pardon, but a cruel disdain that—"

"No, no, not hatred, Daisy!" I exclaimed, advancing to her side, and encountering Godfrey's momentary glance.

"Yes, hatred!" she continued, looking up wistfully into his dark face: "your heart does not move towards me at this instant. If you had loved me less you could not hate me now. I come to you from visions of murder and massacre, from burning homes and the wail of dying men, and the sufferings of women perishing by hunger, and thirst, and awful terror; from the cruel death of my husband and the unburied bodies of my child-ren, seen, seen until the misery is burned into my memory, and I can not forget it even in my sleep. I come to you bracketed, with only a wretched remnant of life, in the hope of restoring you to yourself and to Emma, who has been constant to you with the faithfulness of a true woman. Yet you are like a rock to me. I measure your first love by the implacable hatred which no one ever felt before for me; and it torments me, Godfrey, it does me; give me one morsel of consolation before I die!"

Margaret Wilson," he said, "you have spoken truly of your nature. You are a woman—the creature of the moment—swayed by any passion. Just now you imagine you could die at my feet in a paroxysm of repentance and misery, but before you could descend into yonder valley you would be ready for another emotion as vehement and unreasoning. I can not tell for what you have followed me. If you can not bear to see any but fair scenes, why did you come up here to look upon the solitude of Hell? Which is your husband now? Who did you hope for? What effect is this wild appeal to have upon me? Your tribulation has no charm for me; there is no place in my heart for the acknowledge of your misery. I would not have had you crushed, poor battered creature, any more than I would have strength to cast such a butterfly upon the moors. If this be all you came for, to expend the futile passion of an hour, you may return home. I am not old you want. I have money for you, money that will satisfy you, for I am no longer a poor and unknown artist."

"I tell her at once, Godfrey," I cried, indignantly.

"Nay, Emma," he answered, the words of mine can wound me no more. Life has passed alive through the brightest hopes, and the deepest despairs, and the cruelest doubts she speaks of! What, shall a woman, a delicate, tender-hearted woman, come from the murder of her husband and the death of her only children, to be killed at last by the reproaches of a discarded lover? Why did you come to rob me of the peace I had attained painfully from the blighted harvests of hope and love? Of women I have known only you two, and the models of the life-school; I have had little temptation to seek society. Here at least, away from you, I can think of you as I would have you to be. These are my visions of womanhood, Margaret."

He drew aside the curtain, and let the sunlight in upon his pictures, upon groups of happy children, with a mother whose face was Daisy's as it might have been, developing from head-lovely girlhood into a maturity of womanly and matronly beauty. Godfrey had ceased to look at her; but I, comparing the sweet and joyous features with her face as life had painted it, saw the hollow lines, and grave, mournful eyes in a new light, and with a sudden apprehension.

But I saw in a recess of the attic, which was still in deep shadow from a curtain falling over it, some strange object half visible, that made me think of the case in which Godfrey had brought home that first painting of his, and I moved toward it. Then for an instant he placed himself before Daisy, so as to intercept her view, but he had not back again with a half-smile of contempt.

"A boyish whim," he said, "executed in the first madness of disappointment. I am thoroughly ashamed of it. Don't look at it, Margaret."

A coffin, in which was painted his own face as he had been eight years ago, only with closed eyes, and with the coldness and livid hues of death. In his sister, felt a sudden chill and shivering, as though I had pressed my lips upon a marble forehead, and the whim had manifested my warm life-current; while Daisy, coming swiftly to my side at my start of fear, bent down and read the inscription on the lid: "Abraham Lincoln. Died August 28, 1850." It was the date of her own marriage; and muttering the words to herself, she fell helpless into my arms.

"Ah, Godfrey! There is no efficacy now in that tide of tenderness sweeping back from the past, now ebb of hatred. Gather up your strength, arms, and wrap her to your breast, but she shall be conscious of no shelter or refuge there. Pierce her with deeper wounds, overwhelm her with self-accusation, call aloud upon her by your own old fond name of Daisy: there is no echo, no entrance to her tortured heart. She is dead to you. No blessed heaven for you with one more sight of forgiving love, and to sound one more note of harmony in your existence. Your work is done. She is dead and dumb and dead to you forever now!

So I thought, not daring to interfere with Godfrey's distracted grief, but with a sickening weakness; but she was not to leave us thus, hunted by hatred as well as terror into the mysterious life hereafter. We had not lost her. Her eyes were where our mother died, bidding Godfrey and me to cleave to one another, and she lingered there long enough to rest a little while in the arms of the world—dwelling in an ante-chamber of repose and consolation—to recover some strength, before she went forth, and our mother, with her, to meet God. And with her, and her little child, whom we sent for to the mother's dying-place among the autumnal hills, Godfrey found peace. Daisy came back to his heart, for her sake promising to quit his retreat, and dwell near to me, where she, the little Daisy, could feel herself a mediator between us by-and-by.

I sat with the child upon my lap, looking out upon the moonlit hills, and the fir-copplice, hearing the bells of the cattle, and their lowing at night, and the dimly-seen village, lying in the valley like a fledgeling in the shelter of a nest, and I was thinking sadly how far away it was now from what path across the wide wilderness of life our little ones might have to tread. I did not care to turn my face toward the room, for even by the faint rays of movement, interrupt the communion, often silent for many minutes, which Godfrey and Daisy had together at last. Yet I knew how different to the love-like conversations of former days!

"You will be happy," said Daisy.

"I shall be happier," he answered.

We buried Daisy beside our mother, and Godfrey's grave-stone is next to hers. I keep up the old homestead; the hedges are planted again on their ancient boundaries; the garden is inclosed and cultivated as before, and the orchard-wood, and its threshold trodden by many footsteps, during every month of the summer time, when Godfrey and I come down from the mountains. We paint and paint among the hills. Sometimes, when I have tried to discover what thoughts are hidden under Godfrey's grave-face—for he is always still to be reserved and reticent now—I fancy he is thinking what I do—that if Daisy had come back to us, and with him a happy and unembittered life, as children, even though he was altogether separated from and independent of her, we might have healed her broken spirit, and that she had placed and even life of peace upon this troubled earth.

THE BATTLE OF BELMONT.

WE devote page 772 to illustrations of the BATTLE OF BELMONT, which took place on 7th inst., the day of the bombardment of the rebel batteries at Hilton Head. The following account of the battle we condense from the Chicago Times:

On the night of 6th a strong force of Federals, comprising the Twenty-seventh, Illinois, Twenty-second, and Thirty-first Illinois, Seventh Iowa, Taylor's Battery, Dollins's Cavalry, and the Gatlin Battery, under Generals Grant, Scott, Chancellor, Meredith, and Keystone Stone—the gun-boat Tyler and Lexington following. The troops were landed on Island Ten, three miles above Belmont, Kentucky, at the battle ground, and upon the camp of the enemy. General McClernand was in command of the Gatlin troops, and General Dollins from Bird's Point, and General Grant of the entire force. For over a half a half mile the troops marched, through the woods, the ground was hotly contested, but the enemy were driven back. Colonel Logan's regiment, the right, broke the centre, and Logan the left. Colonel Dodge's regiment captured the United States flag from the rebel camp. Colonel Dougherty's Twenty-second regiment captured the enemy's artillery horses, but Logan's regiment suffered most from their fire. The Twenty-second was Thirtieth marched in front of the batteries, and the Twenty-second to out-flank them. The Thirtieth then charged into the embankments, encountering desperate distance. Being reinforced by Logan's Thirty-first, the rebels were routed with great loss, and sixty prisoners taken. The enemy's camp was fired and totally destroyed. The barracks and the Kentucky flag-staff, with troops in possession of their Missouri camp, opened fire upon them. Simultaneously Harris with Twenty-F ive Thirteen, which had been sent by Colonel Foulke as scouters, here reported that the enemy were crossing from Kentucky, threatening our rear. The order was given to return to the boats, when our troops were confronted by several thousand men, who had been sent from Columbus. Another terrible engagement ensued. The major portion of our troops reached the boats, but every regiment suffered severely.

The large picture on page 772 represents Colonel Dougherty leading the Twenty-second Illinois Regiment into the rebel camp and capturing the rebel battery. One of the vignettes above represents the gun-boat Tyler shelling a party of rebels who attempted to interfere with the embarkation of our troops after the battle. A few rounds of grape and shell very quickly dispersed them, and the fleet departed in safety. These two pictures are from sketches by our attentive correspondent, Mr. Bill D. Travis, of the Twenty-second Illinois Regiment.

The picture of Cairo, Mississippi River, showing the site of Columbus and Cairo, is from another source. It and the map accompanying will render the account of the fight perfectly intelligible. Belmont is a miserable little village, consisting of a very few houses.

THE FIGHT AT THE SOUTH-WEST PASS.

On page 773 we publish a couple of illustrations of the conflict between our blockading squadron and Commodore Tatnall's rebel flotilla, which took place on 12th October; and on page 774 three views of the SOUTH-WEST PASS, where the fight took place. The former are from sketches by an officer on board the Richmond, who writes as follows:

UNITED STATES STEAM CORVETTE "RICHMOND,"
OFF PASS A LOUTRE, OCT. 18, 1861.

AT 8.45 on the morning of the 12th the look-out discovered a small, low, dark, stealthily approaching object, emitting a volume of black smoke, totally hiding from our view the steam-tug that was towing her. In a moment every one was at his station, guns trained, and the Captain on the look-out before we could slip cable and prepare our ship to receive the blow the intruder evidently intended to give us on the bow, increasing as to look quite freely. Every eye was brought into requisition to discover what it was that, by the darkness we could form but a poor idea of her shape or build. As she came on, the order was given not to fire a signal to her compromises she had succeeded. She then passed along our starboard broadside, like a thing of life. She then left us, only to return with three large flat-boats, crowded with men, and towed by a powerful steamer, leaving the whole channel. Immediately in the rear were several steamers and a large bark, filled with other spectators or New Orleans pirates, followed. The scene was truly grand. Surrounded by a wall of fire, ship making water, expecting every moment to receive into our ranks the boats at a low what to do. Our Captain concluded to retreat with the fleet, and the order was given to that same effect, ordering them to lead the van. The boys sailing craft, and the fleet of four retreat. We then reached the Gulf in safety, followed by the rebel fleet. Pride steamer, Calhoun, Ivy, and Oregon, and the armed pilot; Princesse close at hand, but unfortunately grounded, giving us time to fire the enemy, thereby rendering her useless. We also grounded, but luckily in such a way that we could bear our broadside to bear. The rebel fleet still advanced. We made all preparations to give them a warm reception. They opened the ball by a well-directed shot from the audacious little Ivy. We had the pleasure of seeing the first flying think and all directed at our ship—they no doubt supposing we were in a helpless condition. The Oregon and Ivy now opened a full an easy prey, she being within pistol-shot. I am pleased to inform you that the Richmond acquitted herself—a very unnecessary action, as the enemy never could have taken her or any of the gallant Richmond vessels long together. We finally drove them up the river, after exchanging some thirty broadsides of powder. Not a life was lost, although the rebels reported our loss to be some three or four hundred. We remained some two hours and thirty minutes. Several of our shot took effect, but to what extent I know not.

The United States gun-boat M'Clellan came to our assistance the same morning, and rendered considerable service and skill of her worthy Captain (Gray) we were once more afloat. We are now in need of suitable vessels. What we want are gun-boat of light draught, capable of crossing the bar, and able to manœuvre in any part of the Gulf.

Of the three views of the Southwest Pass, the first was taken off the bar looking up the Pass. The low shore to the left is Pass a Loutre Island, and left of the Pass; detached masses of the delta are seen in different places upon the surface of the water. Looking from the mouth of the Pass, we say that, at times, large masses will rise from the bottom to the surface, when vegetation will instantly commence to grow. In a few days it will be seen in a northerly direction, six miles distant on the right. To the left is the Tower Light-house, distant about three miles.

The second view is a sketch of the West Bank of the Pass, taken nearly opposite the Light-house, overlooking the mouth of the river. Land which extends up the Pass for a distance of about forty miles. From two to three miles above the Light-house on the left bank of the river.

The third view was taken off the Town, and shows nearly every building in the place. Several attempts have been made to sketch this scene, and artist believes that the view we publish is the first which has proved successful. Pilot-Town is an old and dilapidated place, with no-wired inhabitants, chiefly pilots and their families, fishermen, and oystermen. The Observatories which are seen in the sketch are used by pilots in watching for vessels outside. In an easterly direction, twelve miles off, may be seen the Light-house at the extreme end of the Mississippi Delta. The ship, in the distance, to the right, lies off the South Pass.

GENERAL BUTLER'S NEW EXPEDITION.

We publish on page 780 an illustration of the EMBARKATION OF THE TWENTY-SIXTH MASSACHUSETTS AND NINTH CONNECTICUT REGIMENTS, at HOWARD STREET, PROVIDENCE," which is to sail shortly for a Southern point, to land an expedition to be commanded by General Butler. A correspondent of the Herald thus described the arrival of the Constitution at Boston:

The expected steamer Constitution arrived at half past 6 o'clock this morning, and rounded up to the head of Long Wharf an immense concourse of people gazed in admiration at her perfect model and beauty of her lines. She reached this port last night, but anchored off the lower light until morning.

She made the trip from New York in twenty-nine hours and ten minutes, and as thoroughly did she work her engines were never stopped from the moment she started until she anchored at Boston. This, in a new ship, is almost unprecedented. She is the largest ship ever built on this continent, and the largest wooden steamer in the world; but she hardly rolled at all, although it blew a perfect gale during the whole of her passage.

It is stated that her capacities will be severely tested in carrying three thousand soldiers, but I am assured by Mr. Culver, who was the assistant superintendent in building her, that she will carry that number with ease and comfort. She is of 3600 tons burden.

CAMP NEVIN, KENTUCKY.

On page 775 we publish a view of CAMP NEVIN, Kentucky, from a sketch by Lieut. H. Mosler. This is the camp where General M'Cook commands, and it is, we believe, the nearest camp to the rebel General Bowling Green. The artillery shown in the foreground is Cotter's six gun battery, which served under M'Clellan in Western Virginia.

OUR ARMY ON HILTON HEAD.

OUR special artist, with General Sherman's army, sends us three sketches, which we reproduce on page 778, and writes as follows concerning them:

HEAD-QUARTERS GENERAL HUNTER'S BRIGADE,
HILTON HEAD.

OUR PICKET AT GENERAL DRAYTON'S MANSION.

A few moments walk through a corn and cotton field, and along a road bordered on one side by a sweet-potato patch, and on the other by a genuine jungle, tangled and impenetrable, leads us from our head-quarters to the mansion occupied by General Drayton. The approach to the old homestead is by a long, straight, level avenue, well-shaded by stately live-oaks, and rising from the unroved in appearance by a double series of negro huts. These are still occupied by a few Hunter-working negro bands. The General's whilom residence stands at the top of a gently sloping hill, and is thickly hemmed in by orange, cedar, pine, oak, and other trees, through whose clustering branches one now and then sees Port Royal.

LANDING-PLACE AND THE HEAD-QUARTERS.

The Hilton Head beach affords no natural advantages for landing vessels, and the task time for has been attended with great difficulty. The former steamer regiment have constructed a temporary pier, where the sutlers' stores, provisions, and ammunition are sent to land from the different steamers, can come alongside without grounding. They have also built a strong wharf capable of containing nearly all the goods there for brought here. In the sketch which we give the corrals of Company B are also to be observed the hospital of the new military depot—marked by its red roof. The sloop presents a busy come from daylight till sunset.

POST-OFFICE.

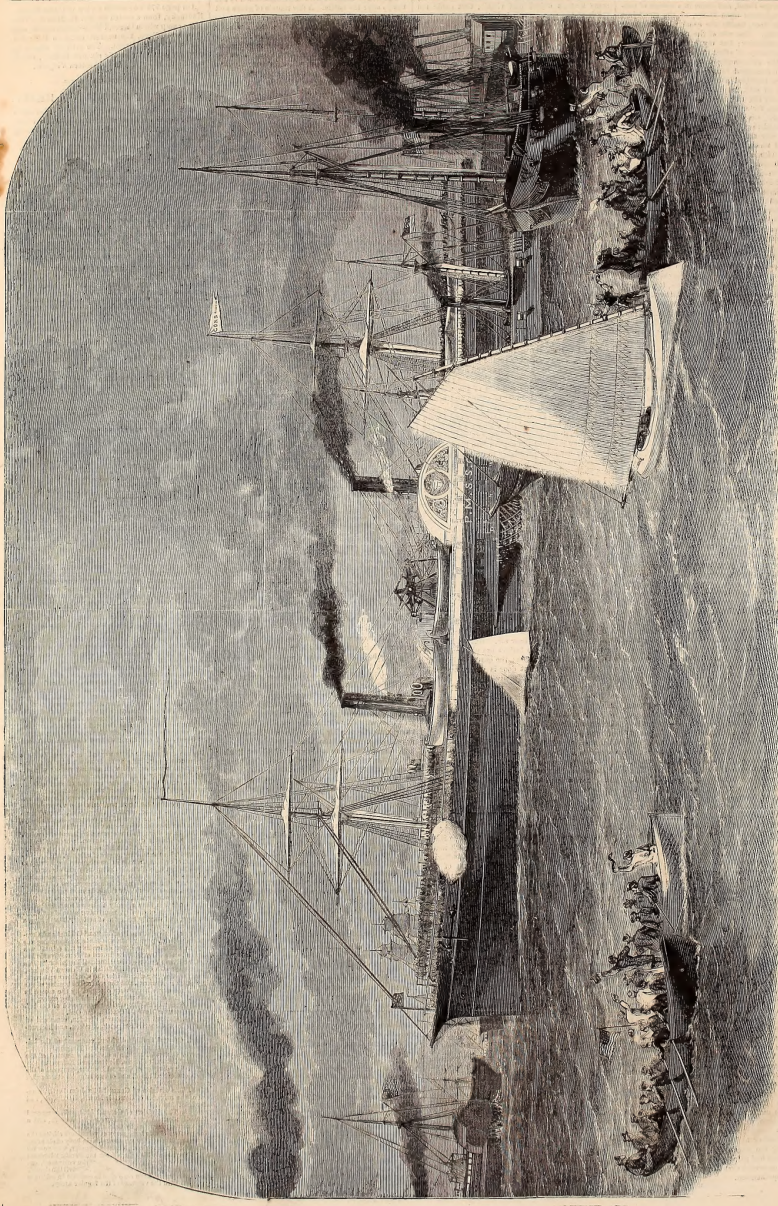
The new Port Royal Post-office is located in rear of General Sherman's head-quarters, and is tolerably water-proof in many places. Directly a collection was belonging to Squire Pope, it has now become the resort of letters of all descriptions, and had attraction alike for the General of Brigade and the man-of-war's Jack-of-the-Dust. On the day that the Post-office opened we were on board the flag-ship; but the army and navy, it was found, belonged to an every seven days and wives that the Admiral was not enemy enough to contain their ever-coming letters without discarding the latter, so the ways were ordered ashore, and lodged in the building which our artist represents in the accompanying sketch.

LITERARY REVIEW.

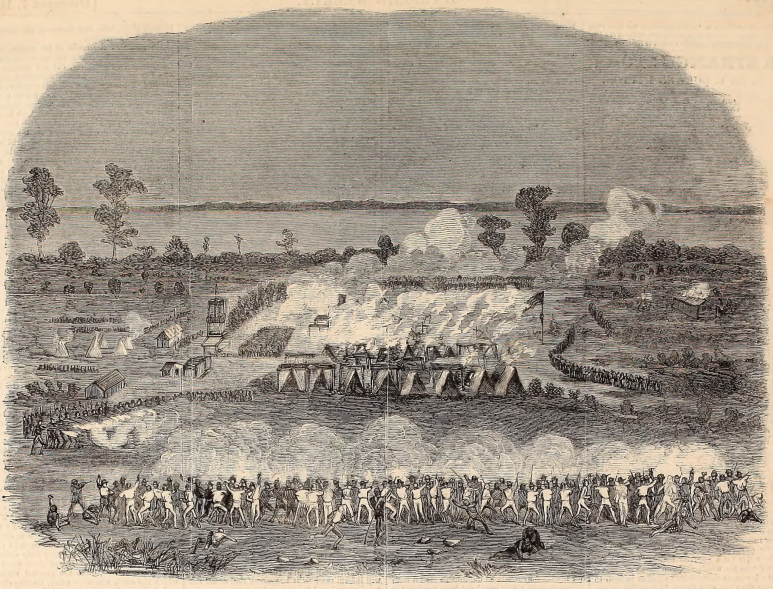
THE 20th November General M'Clellan reviewed 70,000 men near Bailey's Cross Roads, and our attentive artist sketched the scene. We reproduce his picture on pages 776 and 777, and subjoin the following account of the Review, which we condense from the Herald:

In the upper and lower divisions, General M'Call's and General Franklin's, from which a more large eligible or ten [illegible] to be made, the troops were set at from five to seven o'clock in the morning, and on the march long before daylight. All of the seven divisions on the Virginia side of the Potomac were represented in the review, but enough were left in each to supply double the usual picket force, and to constitute, also, a reserve in addition strong enough to repel any attack in force the enemy might make.

As early as nine o'clock the head of the column of General M'Call's division, the head-quarters of which are nearest to Bailey's, began to arrive at the grounds from the Washington road. Soon after General M'Call's advance-guard appeared on the road, entering the grounds from the Leesboro road, General Fitz John Porter was at the head of General Franklin's column, approaching from the Leesboro



THE STEAMSHIP "CONSTITUTION" LEAVING BOSTON WITH TROOPS ON GENERAL BUTLER'S SOUTHERN EXPEDITION.—[SEE PAGE 779.]



THE BATTLE OF SANTA ROSA, OCTOBER 9, 1861.—THE ATTACK UPON WILSON'S CAMP.—[SKETCHED BY MR. CHARLES F. ALLGOWER.]

THE BATTLE AT SANTA ROSA.

We herewith publish, from sketches by Mr. Charles F. Allgower, Sixth New York Volunteers, two illustrations of the battle of 9th October on Santa Rosa Island. We have heretofore described the affair very fully, and will only now add that the rebels, under General Anderson, crossed over by night and surprised Colonel Wilson's camp; that Wilson's men, after a short retreat, rallied, and drove back the enemy; and that the rout of the assailants was completed by the appearance on the scene of some companies of regulars, who chased them to their boats, and peppered them well as they were embarking. Since then the rebels have made another attempt to disturb our forces on Santa Rosa Island. They landed about a mile and a half from Wilson's camp, but were discovered by one of the men-of-war, and shelled off with considerable loss and in great confusion.

THE BATTLE OF SANTA ROSA.—THE REBELS DRIVEN BY THE REGULARS TO THEIR BOATS.—[SKETCHED BY MR. CHARLES F. ALLGOWER.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

A STRANGE STORY.

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XLI.

THE lawyer came the next day, and almost with a smile on his lips. He brought me a few lines in pencil from Mrs. Ashleigh; they were kindly expressed, bade me be of good cheer; "she never for a moment believed" my guilt; Lilian bore up wonderfully under so terrible a trial; it was a considerable comfort to both to receive the visits of a friend so attached to me, and so confident of a triumphant refutation of the hideous charge under which I now suffered, as Mr. Margrave!

The lawyer had seen Margrave again—seen him in his house. Margrave seemed almost domiciled there!

I remained sullen and taciturn during this visit. I longed again for the night. Night came. I heard the distant clock strike twelve, when again the icy wind passed through my hair, and against the wall stood the Luminous Shadow.

"Have you considered?" whispered the voice, still as from afar. "I repeat it—I alone can save you."

"Is it among the conditions which you ask in return that I shall resign to you the woman I love?"

"No."

"Is it one of the conditions that I should commit some crime—a crime perhaps heinous as that of which I am accused?"

"No."

"With such reservations I accept the conditions you may name, provided I, in my turn, may demand one condition from yourself."

"Name it."

"I ask you to quit this town. I ask you, meanwhile, to cease your visits to the house that holds the woman betrothed to me."

"I will cease those visits. And before many days are over I will quit this town."

"Now, then, say what you ask from me. I am prepared to concede it. And not from fear for myself, but because I fear for the pure and innocent being who is under the spell of your deadly fascination. This is your power over me. You command me through my love for another. Speak!"

"My conditions are simple. You will pledge yourself to desist from all charge or insinuation against myself, of what nature soever. You will not, when you meet me in the flesh, refer to what you have known of my likeness in the shadow. You will be invited to the house at which I may be also a guest. You will come; you will meet and converse with me as guest speaks with guest in the house of a host."

"Is that all?"

"It is all."

"Then I pledge you my faith; keep your own."

"Fear not; sleep secure in the certainty that you will soon be released from these walls."

The Scin-Laeca waned and faded. Darkness settled back, and a deep profound and calm fell over me.

The next day Mr. Stanton again visited me. He had received that morning a note from Mr. Margrave, stating that he had left L—— to pursue in person an investigation which he had already commenced through another, affecting the man who had given evidence against me, and that if his hope should prove well-founded, he trusted to establish my innocence and convict the real murderer of Sir Philip Derval. In the research he thus volunteered he had asked for and obtained the assistance of the policeman Waby, who, grateful to me for saving the life of his sister, had expressed a strong desire to be employed in my service. Meanwhile my most cruel assailant was my old college friend, Richard Strahan. For Jeeves had spread abroad Strahan's charge of purloining the memoir which had been intrusted to me; and that accusation had done me great injury in public opinion, because it seemed to give probability to the only motive which ingenuity could ascribe to the fool deed imputed to me. That motive had been first suggested by Mr. Vigors. Cases are on record of men whose life had been previously blameless, who have committed a crime, which seemed to belie their nature, in the monomania of some intense desire. In Spain, a scholar reputed of austere morals murdered and robbed a traveler for money in order to purchase books—written, too, by Fathers of his Church! He was intent on solving some problem of theological casuistry. In France, an antiquarian, esteemed not more for his learning than for amiable and gentle qualities, murdered his most intimate friend for the possession of a medal, without which his own collection was incomplete. These, and similar anecdotes, tending to prove the effect of a morbid enthusiasm in producing moral insanity, were whispered about by Dr. Lloyd's sinister patients, and were received with the most credence because of the unfamiliar and overrefining speculation on motive and act which gratified the vanity of the shallow.

I was known to be fond of scientific, especially of chemical experiments; to be eager in testing the truth of any novelty that, with charming, catching hold of the magistrate's fantastic hypothesis, went about repeating anecdotes of the absorbing passion for analysis and discovery which had characterized me in youth as a medical student, and to which, indeed, I owed the precocious reputation I had acquired.

Sir Philip Derval, according not only to report, but according to the direct testimony of his servant, had acquired in his travels many secrets in natural science, especially as connected with the healing art—his servant had deposed to the remarkable cures he had effected by the medicinals stored in the stolen casket—doubtless Sir Philip, in boasting of these medicinals in the course of conversation, had excited my curiosity, influenced my imagination, and, meeting him suddenly afterward in a lone spot, a passionate impulse had made a brain turned into madness by curiosity and covetous desire. All these suppositions, reduced into system, were corroborated by Margrave's skill as lawyer. I had made away with the manuscript supposed to contain the explanations of the medical agencies employed by Sir Philip. Without such a chapter my theft by a tale so improbable that a man of my reputed talent could not have hazarded it if in his senses, was absurd. But that chapter had thus been spread around me by hostile prepossessions and ignorant gossip: how could the arts of Margrave scatter those clouds to the winds? I knew not, but I felt confidence in his promise and his power. Still, so great had been my alarm for Lilian, that the hope of clearing my own innocence was almost lost in my joy that Margrave at least was no longer in her presence, and that I had received his pledge to quit the town in which she lived.

Thus hours rolled on hours, till, I think, on the third day from that night in which the compact had been made with the Scin-Laeca, my door was hastily thrown open, a confused crowd presented itself at the threshold—the governor of the prison, the police superintendent, Mr. Stanton, and other familiar faces shut out from me since my imprisonment. I knew at the first glance that I was no longer an object beyond the pale of human friendship. And proudly, sternly, as I had supported myself hitherto in solitude and scorn, when I felt warm hands clasping mine, heard joyous voices proffering congratulations, saw in the eyes of all that my innocence had been cleared, the storm tumult of emotion was too strong for me—the room reeled on my sight—I fainted. I pass as quickly as I can over the confusion that crowded on me when I recovered, and that were publicly given in evidence in Court next morning. I had owed all to Margrave. It seems that he had contrived to my favor the very supposition that had been bruited abroad to my prejudice. "For," said he, "it is conjectured that Fenwick committed the crime of which he is accused on the impulse of a disordered reason. That conjecture is based upon the probability that a madman alone could have committed a crime without adequate motive. But it seems quite clear that the accused is not mad; and there seems equally to suspect that the accuser is. Grounding this assumption on the current reports of the witness's manner and bearing since he had been placed under official surveillance." Margrave had commissioned the policeman, Waby, to make inquiries in the villages to which the accuser asserted he had gone in quest of his relations, and Waby had there found persons who remembered to have heard that the two brothers named Walls lived less by the gains of the petty shop which they kept than by the proceeds of some property consigned to them as the nearest of kin to a lunatic who had once been tried for his life. Margrave had then examined the advertisements in the daily newspapers—the advertising, warning the public against a dangerous maniac who had effected his escape from an asylum in the west of England, caught his attention; to that asylum he had repaired.

There he learned that the patient advertised was one whose propensity was homicide, consigned for life to the asylum on account of a murder, for which he had been tried. The description of this person exactly tallied with that of the pretended American. The keeper, bearing all particulars from Margrave, professed a strong persuasion that the witness was his missing patient, and had himself committed the crime of which he had accused another. If so, the keeper, undertook to coax from him the full confession of all the circumstances. Like other madmen, and not least those whose propensity is to crime, he was exceedingly cunning, treacherous, secret, and habituated to trick and stratagem. More subtle than even the acute, in possession of all their faculties, whether to achieve his purpose or to conceal it, and fabricate appearances against another. But while in ordinary conversation he seemed rational enough to those who were not accustomed to study him, he had one hallucination which, when humored, led him always, not only to betray himself, but to glory in any crime proposed or committed. He was under the belief that he had made a bargain with Satán, who, in return for implicit obedience, would bear him harmless through all the consequences of such submission, and finally raise him to great power and authority. It is not uncommon with criminal madmen to suppose they are under the influence of the Evil One, or possessed by a Demon. Murderers have assigned as the only reason they themselves could give for their crime that "the devil got into them," and urged the deed. But in all madness the most ordinary attribute is superweening self-esteem. The maniac who has been crowned from a garret sticks straws in his hair and calls them a crown. To imagine themselves heroes and emperors, or special favorites of Heaven, is no unfrequent delusion of the insane. So much does inordinate self-esteem characterize mental aberration, that in the course of my own practice I have detected in the presence of that proud infirmity the certain symptom of insanity, especially moral insanity, long before the mania had made the disease manifest even to the most familiar kindred.

This morbid self-esteem was accordingly a part of the dreadful illusion by which the man I am now speaking of was possessed. He was proud to be the protected agent of the Fallen Angel. And if that self-esteem were artfully appealed to, he would exult superbly in the evil he held himself ordered to perform, as if a special prerogative, an official rank and privilege; then he would be led on to boast gleefully of thoughts which the most cynical of criminals, in whom intelligence was not ruined, would shrink from owning. Then he would reveal himself in all his deformity with as complacent and frank a self-glorying in some vain good than displays in parading his amiable sentiments and his beneficent deeds.

"If," said the keeper, "this be the patient who has escaped from me, and if his propensity to homicide has been in some way directed toward the person who has been murdered, I shall not be with him a moment of an hour before he will inform me how it happened, and detail the arts he employed in shifting his crime upon another—all will be told with as simple and fiendful a muiteness as a child puts into his tale of some schoolboy exploit which he fancies will raise him in your estimation."

Margrave brought this keeper back to L—— took him to the mayor, who was one of my warmest supporters; the mayor had sufficient influence to dictate and arrange the rest. The keeper was introduced to the room in which the pretended American was lodged. At his own desire a select number of witnesses were admitted with him—Margrave excused himself: he said candidly that he was too intimate a friend of mine to be an impartial listener to aught that concerned me so nearly.

The keeper of the asylum proved right alike in his suspicions and in his promises. The lying witness was his missing patient; the man recognized his keeper with but little apparent terror, rather with an air of consciousness, and in a very few minutes was led to tell his own tale, with a gloating complacency both at the agency by which he deemed himself exalted, and at the dextrous cunning with which he had acquitted himself of the task, that increased the horror of his dreadful narrative.

He spoke of the mode of his escape, which was extremely ingenious, but of which the details, long in themselves, did not interest me, and I understood them too imperfectly to repeat. He had encountered a sea-faring traveler on the road, whom he had knocked down with a stone and robbed of his glazed hat and pea-jacket, as well as of a small sum in coin, which last enabled him to pay his fare in a railway that conveyed him eighty miles away from the asylum. Some trifling remnant of this money still in his pocket, he then traveled on foot along the high road till he came to a town about twenty miles distant from L——; there he had staid a day or two, and there he said "that the Devil had told him to buy a case-knife, which he did." "He knew by that order that the Devil meant him to do something great." "His Master," as he called the fiend, then directed him the road he should take. He came to L——, put up, as he had correctly stated before, at a small inn, wandered at night about the town, was surprised by the sudden storm, took shelter under the convent arch, overheard somewhat more of my conversation with Sir Philip than he had previously deposed—heard enough to excite his curiosity as to the casket? "While he listened, his Master told him that he must get possession of that casket." Sir Philip had quitted the archway almost immediately after I had done so, and he would then have attacked him if he had not caught sight of a policeman going his rounds. He had followed Sir Philip to a house (Mr. Jeeves's). "His Master told him to wait and watch." He did so. When Sir Philip came forth, toward the dawn, he followed him, saw him enter a narrow street, came up to him, seized him by the arm, demanded all he had about him. Sir Philip tried to shake him off—struck at him. What follows, I spare the reader. The deed was done. He robbed the dead man both of the casket and of a purse that he found in the pockets; had scarcely done so when he heard footsteps. He had just time to get behind the portico of a detached house at angles with the street when I came up. He witnessed from his hiding-place the brief conference between myself and the policeman, and when they moved on, bearing the body, stole unobserved away. He was going back toward the inn when it occurred to him that it would be safer if the casket and purse were not about his person; that he asked his Master to direct him how to dispose of them; that his Master guided him to an open yard (a stone-mason's), at a very little distance from the inn; that in this yard there stood an old wych-elm tree, having from time to time only two sovereigns and some silver, and then heaping loose mould over the hiding-place. That he then repaired to his inn, and left it late in the morning, on the pretense of seeking for his relatives—persons, indeed, who really had been related to him, but of whose death years ago he was aware. He returned to L—— a few days afterward, and, in the dead of the night, went to take up the casket and the money. He found the purse with its contents undisturbed, but the lid of the casket was unclosed. From the large glance he had taken of it before burying it, it had seemed to him firmly locked—that he was alarmed lest some one had been to the spot. But his Master whispered to him not to mind, told him that he might now take the casket, and would be guided what to do with it; that he did so, and, opening the lid, found the casket empty. Then he took the rest of the money out of the purse, but that he did not take the purse itself, for it had a crest and initials on it, which might lead to discovery of what had been done; that he therefore left it in the hollow, among the roots, heaping the w...st over it as before; that, in the course of the day, he heard the people at the inn talk of the murder, and that his own first impulse was to get out of the town immediately, but that his Master made him too wise for that, and bade him stay; that passing through the streets, he saw me come out of the sash-window door, go to a stable-yard on the other side of the house, mount on horseback and ride away; that he observed the sash-door was left partially open; that he walked by it, and saw the room empty; there was only a dead wall opposite, the place was solitary, unobserved; that his Master directed him to lift up the sash gently, enter the room, and deposit the knife and the casket in a large walnut-tree bureau which stood unlocked near the window. All that followed—his visit to Mr. Vigors, his association against myself, his whole tale—was, he said, dictated by his Master, who was highly pleased with him, and promised to bring him safely through. And here he turned round with a hideous smile, as if for approbation of his notable cleverness and respect for his high employ.

"SHE TURNED AWAY HER FACE, AND RESIGNED HER HAND TO ME IN SILENCE."

Mr. Aceves had the curiosity to request the keeper to inquire how, in what form, or in what manner, the Fiend appeared to the narrator, or conveyed his infernal dictates. The man at first refused to say; but it was gradually drawn from him that the Demon had no certain and invariable form; sometimes it appeared to him in the form of a rat; sometimes even of a leaf, or a fragment of wood, or a rusty nail; but that his Master's voice was the same to him distinct, whatever shape he appeared in; only, he said, with an air of great importance, his Master this time had graciously condescended, ever since he left the asylum, to communicate with him in a much more pleasing and imposing aspect than he had ever done before—in the form of a beautiful youth, or, rather, like a bright rose-colored shadow, in which the features of a young man were visible, and that he had heard the voice more distinctly than usual, though in a milder tone, and seeming to come to him from a great distance.

After these revelations the man became suddenly disturbed. He shook from limb to limb, he sweated profusely with terror; he cried out that he had betrayed the secret of his Master, who had warned him not to describe his appearance and the communications, or he would give his servant up to the tormentors. Then the maniac's terror gave way to fury; his more direful propensities broke forth; declared; he sprang into the midst of his frightened listeners, seized Mr. Vigors by the throat, and would have strangled him for the prompt rush of the keeper and his satellites. Foaming at the mouth, and horribly raving, he was then manacled, a straitwaistcoat secured him, and the group so left him in charge of his captors. Inquiries were immediately set on foot as to such circumstantial evidence as each corroborative the details he had so minutely set forth. The purse, recognized as Sir Philip's by the valet of the deceased, was found concealed under the wych-elm. A policeman dispatched express to the town in which he declared the knife to have been purchased, beyond the ward that a cutler in the place remembered perfectly to have sold such a knife to a sea...faring man, and identified the instrument when it was shown to him. From the chair of a door near in the wall opposite my sash-window a maid-servant, watching for her sweet-heart (a journeyman carpenter, who habitually passed that way on going home to dine), had, though unobserved by the murderer, seen him come out of my window at a time that corresponded with the dates of his own story, though she had thought nothing of it at the moment. He might be a patient, or have called on business; she did not know that I was from home. The only point of importance not cleared up was that which related to the opening of the casket—the appearance of the contents; the lock had been unquestionably forced. No one, however, could suppose that some third person had discovered the hiding-place and forced open the casket to abstract its contents and then rebury it. The only probable conclusion was, that the man himself had forced it open, and dooming the contents of no value had thrown them away before he had hidden the casket in my purse, and, in the chaos of his reason, had forgotten what he had so done. Who could expect that every link in a madman's tale would be found strong and perfect? Enough, if, upon the whole, the narrative was attached to this solitary doubt. Crowds accompanied me to my door when I was set free, in open court, acquitted—it was a triumphal procession. The popularity I had always previously enjoyed, superseded for a moment by so horrible a charge, came back to me ten-fold, as with the reaction of generous repentance for a momentary doubt. One man shared the public favor—the young man whose acuteness had delivered me from the peril, and cleared the truth from so awful a mystery; but Margrove was excused from congratulation and compliment; he had gone on a visit to Strahan, at Derval Court.

Alone, at last, in the welcome sanctuary of my own home, what were my thoughts? Prominent among them all was that assertion of the madman, which had made no shudder upon me repeated to me: he had been guided to the murder and to all the subsequent proceedings by the luminous spirit of the beautiful youth—the Scin-Laca to which I had pledged myself. If Sir Philip Derval could be believed, Margrave was possessed of powers, derived from fragmentary recollections of a knowledge acquired in a former state of being, which would render his transgressions intelligence infinitely dire, and frustrate the endeavors of a reason, unassisted by similar powers, to thwart his designs or bring the law against his crimes. Had he then the arts that could thus influence the minds of others to serve his fell purposes, and achieve securely his own evil ends through agencies that could not be traced home to himself?

But for what conceivable purpose had I been subjected as a victim to influences as much beyond my control as the Fate or Demoniac Necessity of a Greek Myth? Amidst the legends of the classic world some august sufferer is oppressed by Powers more than mortal; but with an ethical glooming vindication of his chastisement: he pays the penalty of crime committed by his ancestors or himself, or he has braved, by arrogating equality with the gods, the mysterious calamity that the gods alone can inflict. But I, no descendant of Pelops, no Œdipus Bestride of a wisdom that interprets the dark enigmas of the Sphinx, while ignorant even of his own birth —what had I done to be singled out from the herd of easy men, to be the victim from the Shadowland of ghosts and sorcerers? It would be ludicrously absurd to suppose that Dr. Lloyd's dying imprecation could have had a repleted effect upon my destiny; to believe that the pretenses of mesmerism were specially favored by Providence, and that to question their assumptions was an offense of profanation to be punished by exposure to preternatural agencies. There was not the least congruity between cause and effect which fable could in excuse for its inventions. Of all men living, I, unimaginative disciple of austere science, should be the last to become the prey to the witchcraft which even imagination reluctantly allows to the magic of poets, and science casts aside into the mouldy lumber-room of exploded superstition.

Rousing my mind from enigmas impossible to solve, it was with intense and yet with most melancholy anxiety that I dwelt on the last in the age of Lilian, rejoicing, though with a thrill of awe, that the promise so mysteriously conveyed by her sense had not been in excuse for deception. —Margrave had left the town; Lilian was no longer subjected to his evil fascination. But an instinct told me that the influence which he had exercised on effect adverse to all hope of happiness for me. Lilian's love for myself was gone. Impossible otherwise than she—in whose nature I had always admired that generous devotion which is more or less inseparable from the romance of young love—could have sorrowed for one mon word of consolation in the hour of my agony and trial: that she who, till the last evening he was here, had met me with looks in the sweetness of a nature femininely submissive to my slightest wish, should have disregarded my solemn injunction to see him no more, not to acquaintance, nay, to familiar intimacy; and at the very time when to disobey my injunctions was to indicate the most cold and wilful contempt to the degradation imposed upon my honor! No, her heart must be wholly gone from me; it must have been given to the union between us had become impossible. My love for her remained unshattered; the more tender, perhaps, that of compassion was superadded. But my pride was shocked, my heart was wounded. My love was not mean and servile. Enough for me to think that we should at least sacred from Margrave. Her life associated with his! —contemplation horrible and ghastly!—from that fate she was saved. Later, she would recover the effect of an influence happily so brief. She might form some new attachment—some new tie. And then my withdrawn love be restored—and her love was withdrawn from me. I had but to release her, with my own lips, from our engagements—she would welcome that release. Gloomy but firm in these thoughts and these resolutions I sought Mrs. Ashleigh's house.

CHAPTER XLII.

It was twilight when I entered, unannounced (as had been my wont in our familiar intercourse), the well-remembered room. I expected to find mother and child. But Lilian was there alone, seated by the open window, her hands crossed and drooping on her knee, her eye fixed upon the darkening summer skies, in which the evening star had just stolen forth, bright and solitary. She sate beside a vase of half-moon that was dimly visible, but gave as yet no light.

Let me arrest the reception he would expect to meet from his betrothed, coming into her presence after he had passed triumphant through a perilous ordeal. Let me fance, to conceive what ice from my blood, what anguish weighed down my heart, when Lilian, turning toward me, not, spake not—looked at me incredulously as if at some indifferent stranger—and—and—but no matter! I can not bear to recall it even now, at the distance of many years! I sat down beside her, and took her hand without pressing it; it rested languidly, passively in mine. At the moment; I dropped it then with a bitter sigh.

"Lilian," I said, quietly, "you love me no longer. It is not so?"

She raised her eyes to mine, looked at me wistfully, and pressed her hand on her forehead, then said, in a low, plaintive tone, "Did I ever love you? What do you mean?"

"Lilian, Lilian, rouse yourself; are you not, while you speak, under some spell, some influence which you can not describe nor account for?"

She paused a moment before she answered, calmly, "No! Again I ask what do you mean?"

"What do I mean? Do you forget that we are betrothed? Do you forget how often and how recently our vows of affection and constancy have been exchanged?"

"No, I do not forget; but I must have deceived you and myself—"

"It is true, then, that you love me no more?"

"I suppose so."

"But oh! Lilian, is it that your heart is only closed to me? or is it—oh, answer truthfully—is it given to another?—to him—to him—against whom I warned you, whom I implored you not to receive. Tell me at least that your love is not gone to Margrave—"

"To him—love to him! Oh no—no—"

"What, then, is your feeling toward him?"

Lilian's head drooped; pale-colored as that dim light. "I know not," she said, almost in a whisper; "but it is—partly awe—partly—"

"What?"

"Abhorrence!" she said, almost fiercely, and rose in her feet with a will, defying start.

"If that be so," I said, gently, "you would not grieve were you never again to see him—"

"But I shall see him again," she interrupted, in a tone of terror and sadness, and sank back once more into her chair.

"I think not," said I, "and I hope not. And now hear me and heed me, Lilian. It is enough for me, no matter what your feelings toward another, to hear from yourself that the affection you once professed for me is gone. I release you from your troth. If folks ask why we two henceforth separate the lives we had agreed to join, you may say, if you please, that you could not give your hand to a man who had known the taint of a felon's prison, even on a false charge. For the rest, leave to you an ungenerous reason, we will leave it to your mother to find a better. Farewell! For your own sake I can not feel hopelessness or sorrow to hear that you do not love the man against whom I warn you still more solemnly than before! Will you not give me your hand in parting—and have I not spoken your own wish?"

She turned away her face, and resigned her hand to me in silence. Silently I held it in mine, and my emotions nearly stifled me. One symptom of regret, of reluctance on her part, and I should have fallen at her feet, and cried, "But not let us break a tie which our vows should have made indissoluble; heed not my offers—wrong from a brother's fear. You can not have ceased to love me!" But no such symptoms of relenting showed itself in her, and with a groan I left the room.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GENTLE DORA!—DARLING MAGGIE! Mrs. Mary J. Holmes's Popular Stories.

DORA DEANE

AND

MAGGIE MILLER.

In one neat 12mo Volume. 474 pages. Price $1.

Mrs. Holmes endeavors to touch the heart, to take what is pure and excellent about it and to put to the reader in contrast with what is vile and deceptive. And in this she succeeds. The Results, we are sure, will thank her heartily for these books, and preserve them with religious strictness, for they are emphatically the well as instructive.

Also ready, uniform in style with the above, New Editions of

LENA RIVERS. 416 pages, 12mo. $1
MARIAN GRAY. 12mo. ILLSDALE. 330 pages, 12mo. 1
MEADOW BROOK; or, ROSA LEE. 380 pages, 12mo. 1
EDITH MAYNARD AND EDWARDO 1
Sent free of postage on receipt of price.

C. M. SAXTON, Publisher,
No. 25 Park Row, New York.

ELLIOT'S POCKET

REVOLVER.

A MOST POWERFUL ARM, WHICH CAN BE carried constantly about the person without inconvenience or danger. Length of barrel 3 inches, exactly more than that of the barrels. It is the most compact, safe, and powerful Pocket Revolver ever made. It weighs only eight ounces, charged with cartridges, which can be purchased in any city or large village. All parts are rifled, gun twist and sighted. Will penetrate one inch of pine at one hundred and fifty yards.

Retail price, Plated, with 100 cartridges, $10 00
" " Nickel, " " 9 50
Trade supplied. T. W. MOORE, 426 Bway, N. Y.

A SPLENDID CHANCE FOR AGENTS and Others.—DEMOREST'S Elegant Quarterly Mirror of Fashions. Send for Circular, 473 Broadway. MRS. DEMOREST. No. 10 Banna Street, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED

FOR MRS. HANKINS' elegant FAMILY NEWSPAPER. The Cheapest FASHION PICTORIAL and most Perfect FAMILY PAPER in the World. Sample Copies sent gratis. Agents also wanted for a CURIOUS new BOOK about LADIES who are in the City. Address

M. Gaunt, 49 Walker Street, New York.

Friends of Soldiers!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, and all other places, should be sent, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 59 Broadway. Soldiers charged low rates.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS SOLUTION Patent, 618 Broadway, New York City. Send for a Circular.

COOLE T'S Cabinet Printing Office for small Printers and Amateurs, the best thing out. Send for Circulars. J. G. COOLEY & CO., 1 Spruce Street, N. Y.

Commercial Agents wanted. Large commission, honorable business. Circular sent. A.W. Harrison, Philadelphia.

IMPORTANT Information sent free to weak and debilitated Females. Address Dr. C. M. BROWN, N. Y.

The Magazine for the Times!

Peterson's Magazine.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD

FOR LADIES!

This popular monthly Magazine will be greatly improved for '62. Its vast contents

ONE THOUSAND PAGES OF READING!
FOURTEEN SPLENDID STEEL PLATES!
TWELVE COLORED FASHION PLATES!
TWELVE COLORED BERLIN-WORK PATTERNS!
EIGHT HUNDRED WOOD-CUTS!
TWENTY-FOUR PIECES OF MUSIC!

All this will be given for only TWO DOLLARS a year, or a dollar less than Magazines of the class of "Peterson's." He

Thrilling Tales and Novelettes

Are the best published anywhere. All the most popular writers are engaged to write exclusively for "Peterson." In 1862, in addition to its usual quantity of shorter stories, FOUR ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT NOVELETTES will be given.

The Jacobite's Daughter, a Tale of the '45.
By Mrs. ANN S. STEPHENS.

Amy Winthrop's Engagement, a Tale.
By CLARA LANGLEY.

The Murrays of Murray House. A Tale of '76.
By CHARLES J. PETERSON.

Getting into Society, a Tale of To-Day.
By ELLEN LEE ROBERTS.

These, and other writers, contribute exclusively to "Peterson." Monthly and Virtue are always inculcated.

FASHIONS AHEAD OF ALL OTHERS.

"Each number, in addition to the colored plate, gives Bonnets, Cloaks, and Dresses, engraved on wood. Also, a Pattern, from which a Dress, Mantilla, or Child's Dress can be cut out, without the aid of a mantua-maker. Also, several pages of Household and other Receipts.

☞ It is the Best Lady's Magazine in the World.
TRY IT FOR ONE YEAR!

TERMS—ALWAYS IN ADVANCE.

One Copy, One Year	$2 00
Three Copies, for One Year	5 00
Five Copies, for One Year	7 50
Eight Copies, for One Year	10 00

PREMIUMS FOR GETTING UP CLUBS.

Three, Five, or Eight copies make a Club. To every person getting up a Club of Three, Five, Eight, or Twelve copies, an extra copy of the Magazine for 1862 will be given.

Address, post-paid,

CHARLES J. PETERSON,
No. 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

☞ Specimen sent gratis, to those wishing to get up Clubs, on receipt of a Postage Stamp.

!!!For Beautiful White Teeth!!!
Use Thurston's Tooth Powder.
FOR HARD AND SOFT GUMS,
Use Thurston's Tooth Powder.
Price 25 cents.
F. C. WELLS & CO., 115 Franklin Street, N. Y.

The Current and Back Numbers of Harper's Weekly can be had of J. F. HUNT, Wholesale and Retail News Agent, Masonic Hall, Fifth St., Pittsburgh.

"A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agents F. C. WELLS & CO., 115 Franklin St., New York. Sold by druggists everywhere.

A 25 Cent Sewing Machine!

And 5 other curious inventions. Agents wanted every where. Descriptive Circulars sent free. Address

SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

$150 PER MONTH made by enterprising agents selling DOWNER'S HEMMER and SHIELD for family sewing. Pronounced the best and makes a beautiful hem. Sample sent on receipt of 25 cents. Address H. DOWNER, No. 447 Broadway.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance, which can not fail—free for 25 cents. Address "Bride," Box 45 C., Publishing Office, 2304, Philadelphia.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT TO HIRE AGENTS in every County at $75 per month and expenses, to sell a new and cheap Sewing Machine. Address (with stamp) S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

A T GIMBREDE'S Stationery Depot and Card Engraving Establishment, 583 Broadway, a Box of Initial Note Paper and Envelopes, 24 varieties, forwarded free of charge on receipt of Three Dollars.

583 Broadway, Gimbrede's Wedding Cards. Unsurpassed for Beauty and Finish.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 50
Two Copies for One Year	4 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

THE FAMOUS JACKASS "New York City" PREPARING FOR ANOTHER TWO YEARS' JOURNEY.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Devlin & Co.

We are now in receipt of large importations of choice

WINTER OVERCOATINGS,

FRENCH CASSIMERES,

NEW STYLES VESTINGS,

WINTER UNDERWEAR.

And have also added largely to our superior stock of ready made

WINTER CLOTHING,

All of which we are selling at exceedingly low prices.

DEVLIN & CO.,

Corner of Broadway and Warren and Grand Streets.

SENT BY EXPRESS

EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices, Made to Measure at $18 per doz. OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS,

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,

With Best Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as can be sold in retail stores at $2 50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

30 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 14½ c. per yd.	$4 35
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard	3 50
Making and cutting	6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and strings, 50c	1 50
Profit	2 65
Total	$18 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

387 Broadway, up stairs.

Between Walker and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

NEW BAYONET EXERCISE.

A NEW MANUAL OF THE BAYONET, for the Army and Militia of the United States: By Col. J. C. Kenton, U. S. Army. With thirty beautifully engraved plates. Cloth, $1 75.

This Manual was prepared for the use of the Corps of Cadets, and has been introduced at the Military Academy with satisfactory results. It contains practical lessons in Fencing, and prescribes the defense against Cavalry, and the manner of combating a contest with a Swordsman.

SWORD-PLAY.

THE MILITIAMAN'S MANUAL AND SWORD-PLAY WITHOUT A MASTER: Improved and Broad-Sword Exercises copiously explained and illustrated: Small Arm Light Infantry Drill of the United States Army: Infantry Manual of Percussion Muskets: Company Drill of the United States Cavalry. By Capt. M. W. Berriman, engaged for the last thirty years in the practical instruction of military Students. Second edition. 1 vol. 12mo. Red Cloth, $1.

Sent free by mail on receipt of price.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

192 BROADWAY, N. Y.

The Most Brilliant and Successful Novel of the Year is

CECIL DREEME.

By Theodore Winthrop.

1 vol. 12mo. Price $1 00.

The Author of this New Novel is that gallant Major Winthrop who died so nobly at Great Bethel. His Novel, CECIL DREEME, has been compared by eminent critics to the best works of HAWTHORNE and BALZAC. Its success has been extraordinary, FIVE EDITIONS being sold in two weeks.

☞ Sent post-paid, to any address on receipt of ONE DOLLAR by the Publishers,

TICKNOR & FIELDS,

135 Washington St., BOSTON.

EXCELSIOR

BURR-STONE FARM-MILL.

FOR FARMERS, MILLERS, and OTHERS. Also ANTI-FRICTION HORSE POWERS. These Mills and Horse Powers have taken FIRST PREMIUMS at Western State Fairs this Year, and are superior to all others. Agents wanted in every county. Rights for sale. Send stamp for illustrated circulars to

BENNET BROTHERS, 42 Greene St., New York.

Chapped Hands, Face, Lips, &c.

Certain cure and preventive. HEGEMAN & CO.'S CAMPHOR ICE WITH GLYCERINE will keep the hands soft in the coldest weather. 25ct. by druggists generally. Price 25 cents; sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.

HEGEMAN & CO., Chemists and Druggists, N. Y.

Commencement of Volume XXIV.

Harper's New Monthly Magazine

For December, 1861.

Its unparalleled circulation from month to month, and a constant demand for back Numbers and complete Sets, evince that HARPER'S MAGAZINE meets the wants of the great body of American readers. No change will therefore be made in its general character. The Magazine contains at least twice the amount of matter of the leading English Monthlies. It is therefore enabled to present the best productions of European Novelists and Essayists, besides furnishing a larger amount of original matter than is given in any other Magazine of the day. Each Number contains an amount of reading equal to that in an ordinary octavo volume, with abundant Pictorial Illustrations of every subject in which the Artist can aid the Writer. More than Seven Thousand Illustrations have already appeared in the Magazine.

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Any Volume, comprising Six Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rates. Twenty-two Volumes, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to November, 1861, are now ready.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have just published:

THE ORAVANGO RIVER: A Narrative of Travel, Exploration, and Adventure. By CHARLES JOHN ANDERSSON, Author of "Lake Ngami." With Steel Portrait of the Author, numerous Wood-cuts, and a Map (not contained in the English Edition), showing the Explored Regions of Western Africa. 8vo, Muslin, $2 00; Half-calf, $3 00.

IDA PFEIFFER'S LAST TRAVELS AND AUTOBIOGRAPHY. The Last Travels of Ida Pfeiffer: inclusive of a Visit to Madagascar. With an Autobiographical Memoir of the Author. Translated by Mr. Ingram. Second Portrait. 12mo, Muslin, 81 25. (Uniform with Ida Pfeiffer's "Second Journey Round the World.")

THE SILVER CORD. A Novel. By SHIRLEY BROOKS. Illustrated. (Uniform with Wilkie Collins's "Woman in White.") 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Muslin, $1 00.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the Money.

Skates 25 cents to 25 dollars. Everything in the skating line promptly to suit all ages, sexes, tastes, and purses.

CONOVER & WALKER, 474 Broadway, N. Y.

Out of town orders attended to carefully and promptly.

"Something New for All."

GEN. GEO. B. M'CLELLAN and our New Union Prize Gift Packages are to be wondered at. Seventy-five cents worth of indispensable articles for 75 cents. Agents are making from $5 to $10 per day. Agents wanted, male and female, in every town throughout the States. Sample package, RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau street, New York.

A New Cartridge Revolver,

Carrying Six Balls (80 to the pound). Any one wanting a superior Pocket or Belt Arm will find this to be the best in the market. Price $12 00. Send for circular.

MURWIN & BRAY, Agents, 245 Broadway, N. Y.

Silk Under Garments.

ON

Hand and made to order by

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York City.

Winter Gloves, Undershirts, &c.

Our large stock at very low prices, all qualities and sizes,

Wholesale or Retail.

IDA PFEIFER'S BOOK.

No. 61 Nassau Street, or No. 637 Broadway.

The New M'Clellan Medal.

A splendid new Medal of Gen. M'Clellan. Send four 3 cent stamps, and receive one by return mail. Agents wanted. HENRY ORDWAY, 58 Nassau St., New York.

Agents, Merchants, Dealers Supplied.

$ Something New.

Circulars sent free of 6 newly patented Articles, wanted in every family. Are not humbugs, but of real worth and in perfect utility, and sell rapidly. We guarantee satisfaction. For terms enclose stamp to HICK & CO., Manufacturers' Agents, 93 Nassau Street, New York.

READ THIS.

WE CHALLENGE COMPARISON.

"UNION PRIZE STATIONERY and PORTRAIT PACKETS" contain more and better articles than any others. We put value in the goods, not in flaming advertisements. All we ask is GIVE US A TRIAL. Agents wanted everywhere. P. HASKINS & CO., 85 Beekman St., N. Y.

WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Marriage Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 162 Broadway. Samples by mail.

PROSPECTUS

of

The Atlantic Monthly

For 1862.

THE January number will commence the Ninth Volume of this Magazine. Its very large and still increasing circulation is a gratifying evidence of public approval, and no industry will be spared to render the forthcoming volumes equal to the requirements of times so pregnant with great events as those of to-day. The life of the Republic, the best interests of the nation, demand of literature a manly and generous action, and the conductors of this journal will continue their efforts in enlisting the best talent of the country to support with vigor and eloquence those opinions and principles which hereto the great public heart to stand firm on the side of Freedom and Right. An elevated national American spirit will always be found illustrated in these pages. The Atlantic Monthly will never waver other than the best literature, and it will be the constant aim of its conductors to render its variety greater and its attractions higher each months than the last.

Among the contributions already in hand for 1862, the following will commend themselves as sufficient inducements for every family to provide the forthcoming numbers for household reading.

PROFESSOR AGASSIZ will begin in the January number a series of articles on Natural History, and other kindred topics, to be continued from month to month throughout the year. The name of so distinguished a man of science in connection with this announcement is a sufficient guaranty of the great benefit to be derived from his monthly contributions.

A NEW ROMANCE, by NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, will appear in the pages of The Atlantic early in the year.

A NEW STORY, by the late THEODORE WINTHROP, author of "CECIL DREEME," will be commenced in the January number.

DR. GEORGE B. WINDSHIP, well-known for his remarkable experiments in Gymnastics, has written for The Atlantic "The Autobiography of a Strength Seeker," giving an account of his method of training for feats of strength, with advice on matters of Health.

The author of "Life in the Iron Mills," and "A Story of Every-Day," will contribute a series of Tales during the year.

Articles by Prof. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, on topics of national interest, will appear frequently.

HAVELOK THE DANE has been written a Story which will be printed in the February number.

The Staff of Writers, in Prose and Poetry, contributing regularly to the Atlantic Monthly, comprises, among its regular names, the following:

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, HENRY W. LONGFELLOW, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, C. C. HAZEWELL, T. W. HIGGINSON, Author of "Life in the Iron Mills" and "Story of To-Day," OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JOHN G. WHITTIER, E. P. WHIPPLE, BAYARD TAYLOR, CHARLES E. NORTON, GEORGE S. HILLARD, HENRY GILES, REV. WALTER MITCHELL, MR. H. B. STOWE, HARRIET MARTINEAU, CHARLES READE, "THE COUNTRY PARSON," ROSE TERRY, HARRIET E. BEECHER, REV. EDWARD T. S. LOWELL, J. T. TROWBRIDGE.

TERMS. Three Dollars per annum, or Twenty-five cents a number. Upon the receipt of the subscription price, the publishers will mail the work to any part of the United States, U. S. postage paid. Subscriptions may begin with either the first or any subsequent number. The pages of The Atlantic are stereotyped, and back numbers can be supplied. Specimen numbers furnished gratis.

CLUBBING ARRANGEMENTS. Subscribers to any three work besides The Copies for Ten Dollars: Five Copies for Ten Dollars; Eleven Copies for Twenty Dollars. Postage 36 cents a year.

DISCOUNTS FOR SUBSCRIBING. Lists of Premiums, &c., furnished on application to

TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers,

135 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

NOTICE TO THE PRESS.—All Newspapers which will publish the Prospectus of The Atlantic as above, and notice each number as it is issued, sending to the publishers a marked copies of the paper containing Prospectus and notices, will be entitled to an exchange. For rates of Clubbing with newspapers apply to the publishers.

Webster's Unabridged Dictionary.

☞ Pictorial Illustrations

OF MILITARY TERMS.

Webster's excels in these, and has pictorial representations.

BARBACAN, BASTION, BATTLEMENT, BAY-SHOT, BLOCKHOUSE, BOMB, CANNON, CARRONADE, CHASE-SHOT, CHEVAUX-DE-FRISE, CULVERIN, LANCE, MAGAZINE, MARTELLO TOWER, MORTAR, PORTCULLIS, RAVELIN, REDAN, STAR FORT, &c.

No other English Dictionary published in this country has a fourth part of them.

SO ALSO ITS

Definitions of Military Terms.

SOLD BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.

FINKLE & LYON

Sewing Machine Co.

538 Broadway, New York.

Descriptive Circulars with Samples of Work will be sent mail free.

Boston Office, 292 Washington Street.

Philadelphia Office, 910 Chestnut Street.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—The advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered for several years with a severe LUNG AFFECTION, and that dread disease, CONSUMPTION, is anxious to make known to his fellowsufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a SURE CURE for CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address

REV. EDWARD A. WILSON,

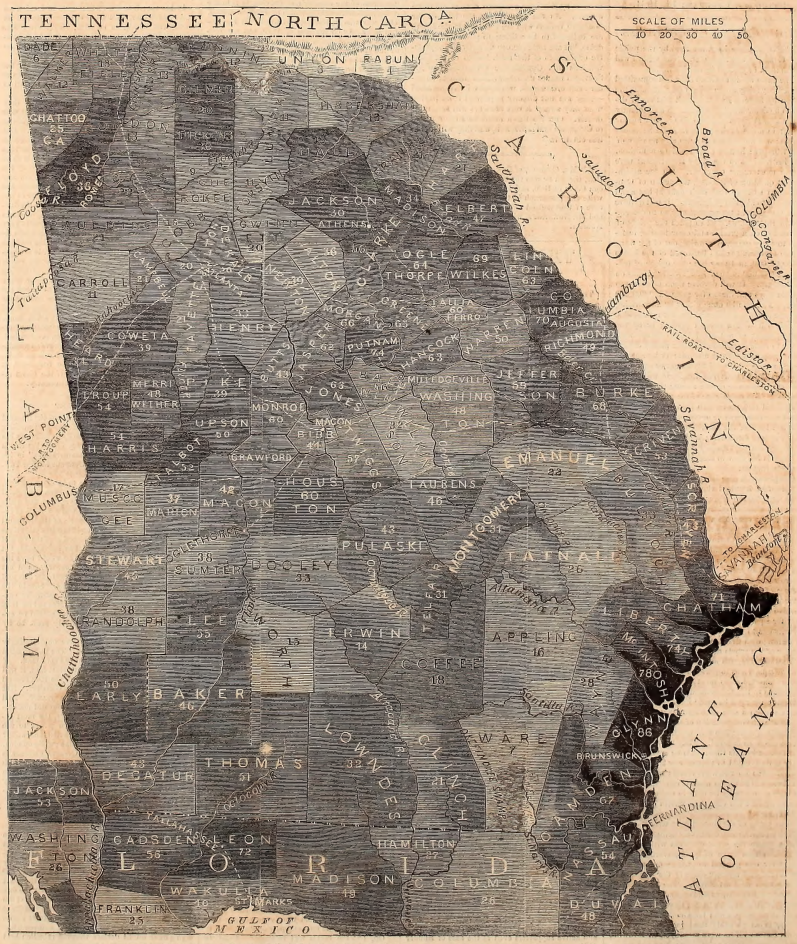
Williamsburgh, Kings County, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 259.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.



A CHART MAP OF GEORGIA, SHOWING THE PERCENTAGE OF SLAVES IN EACH COUNTY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

A CHART MAP OF GEORGIA.

We publish on the preceding page a CHART MAP OF GEORGIA, similar to the one we published of South Carolina in our Number of November 23. The tint, by its depth of shade, shows the comparative percentage of slaves to the total population in each county, that percentage being likewise stated in figures in the centre of the tint. Thus in Wilkes County only seven per cent of the total population are slaves, while in Chatham County the percentage is 71, or nearly three-quarters. It will be noticed that the largest slave communities are on the seashore and round the points to be occupied by our troops. Chatham County, in which Tybee is situate, contains 71 per cent. of slaves: Glynn County, where Brunswick is situate, 66 per cent.; Camden County, whose sea-port is Fernandina, Florida, 67 per cent. This map will be of use to the philosopher and student.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1861.

THE MEETING OF CONGRESS.

BEFORE these lines are read by the public Congress will have met. The session will be the most important in our history.

The extra session held in July last committed the country fairly to the policy of maintaining the Union by force. But it left all matters of detail to be determined afterward. The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to borrow money almost in any way he pleased. The Secretary of War was authorized to raise any number of men from five hundred thousand to a million. The instructions to the Navy Department were of the most vague character. On the all-important question of the Slavery, the action of Congress was so loose that each general has acted according to his own judgment. It will devolve upon Congress at the present session to determine all these points, and to place the policy of the nation on a precise and clear footing in regard to every exigency growing out of the war.

The Government has borrowed of the banks $150,000,000, and they have the option of taking $50,000,000 more of 7-30 Treasury Notes on 1st January. It will devolve upon Congress to provide ways and means for some $200,000,000 more. This can be done either by authorizing an issue of United States Notes, not redeemable in coin till after a certain period; or by the establishment of a United States Bank, with power to issue irredeemable paper money during the war up to a certain amount; or by authorizing an issue of United States Notes, or scrip, to the amount required. It will be the duty of Congress to choose among these various methods. The experience of the past few weeks has proved that no foreign demand for our national securities will be developed so long as the ultimate issue of the conflict remains uncertain in the eyes of foreigners; and that the voluntary absorption of United States Notes by the public at home is too slow to meet the requirements of the Government.

Congress will also have to fix a limit to the army. But a hundred thousand men ought to suffice to do the work which is to be done. Over this number of troops are already in the field, and it remains for Congress to organize them into an army, by abolishing State distinctions, and distinctions of uniform, drill, etc. This force is enlisted for three years or the war. It is to be hoped that the war will not last three years. But if it were ended tomorrow the country would not be safe without a force of 100,000 men in active service, and a reserve of the same number at home. It will devolve upon Congress to enact the laws necessary for such a reorganization of the volunteer force, as to give the President of the time being of dealing with the case in the event of the surrender of the rebels during the recess.

Fresh enactments are required to enable the Navy Department to perform its office usefully. More iron-clad ships must be built, and the instructions to the Department to provide vessels of light draft must be made imperative. At the extra session a vote of $1,000,000 was appropriated for the construction of several side-wheel steamers of about 500 tons each. Only one of these has been launched. This should all have been afloat by this time. To be safe, we must have a navy equal to that of any Power in the world. We do not want vessels to make war on Europe, but we do want a navy which shall in case of necessity be able to defend our own coasts against the combined navies of England and France.

The policy of the Government with regard to Slavery must be authoritatively defined. Events will regulate the great question without law. But it is subversive of good government and order for one general to pursue one policy at St. Louis, and another directly the opposite at Alexandria or Port Royal. The Confiscation Act needs amendment and extension in this regard, for it is obvious that a slave who stays on a rebel plantation and hoes corn for the rebel army, is as palpably used in supporting the rebel cause as if he were employed in throwing up intrenchments or standing sentry. Legislation is needed, too, for the case of slaves who escape from their masters and still decline to work for our generals. At Beaufort, General Sherman finds some difficulty in procuring negro labor, though seven or eight thousand adult negroes are believed to be loose on Hilton Head and the adjacent islands. The old vagrant Acts will furnish a sound precedent for the laws required by the emergency.

Two other points of importance will naturally engage the attention of Congress. The interchange of prisoners is one, and the collection of debts due by Southern men to Northern debtors is another. Mr. Lincoln has never been willing to recognize the rebels as belligerents by exchanging prisoners with the enemy, though he has not objected to his generals doing so, and from the first outbreak in Missouri to the present time prisoners have been regularly exchanged on the usual basis. It seems a pity no matter —this affecting to deny that we are at war; we presume that Congress will at once authorize an exchange. It is also probable that an act will be passed, empowering the courts—and in the rebel States to take cognizance of civil suits brought by Northern creditors against Southern debtors. As the case stands, the bulk of the Southern traders who are indebted to the North are believed to be willing to pay their honest debts, but are forbidden to do so by the oppress-

ED MR. OSGOOD, of Boston, writes us to say that, though he was the correspondent of the London Cruik in 1860, and is so now, yet he did not write the paragraph in the Cruik about the correspondence of that journal referring to MR. DU CHAILLU and MR. NORDHOFF, which was noticed in our last Number.

THE LOUNGER.

"COMPLIMENTARY FLUNKYISM."

THIS expressive term had the following origin:

A few years since, upon the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill, there was a celebration in Boston, and among the guests invited with special distinction was James M. Mason, then Senator from Virginia. James M. Mason was known to the country chiefly as the author of the famous "resolution first, as a man whose bearing in the Senate was a perpetual insult to every body who did not think the Union worth a farthing candle; as a slave-pen; and, second, as the author of the Fugitive Slave bill of 1850.

These were his credentials to national favor. As to the first, the personal manners of any man are the concern of his associates. All that can be said is, that if Mr. Mason's deportment in speaking to the society he frequented, then it was a very remarkable society. But the second matter was a public concern. Granting that the Fugitive Slave bill is constitutional, the particular bill of 1850, prepared by James M. Mason, was exhaustively characterized as they pleased them and enjoyed by famous speech of the 21st January, 1851: "So far from being constructed with any view to effect its object, that manner has been contrived to speak ply of luxuries to the rebel privateers would be cut off. The people who profess an airy ignorance and indifference in the war would be silenced and sobered by public opinion; and a victory of the rebellion upon the Potomac would be the liberation of the slaves. If they are our foes already, as the scornful rebels declare, they would be no more so then. If they wished to fight for their own degradation, they would have an opportunity.

The lesson of the ever-present hour is, that we are to keep a cheerful mind by looking always directly at the facts of the case.

The rebels are very ignorant, and their effort is for the destruction of all the safeguards of human rights; but they are as sincere as savages, as desperate, and as unforgiving. They are taught, and they believe, that this is a war of invasion by fire and sword against their rooted property and all their rights, especially their sacred system of slavery, waged by a pitiless, pusillanimous, Puritan mob of peddlers and thieves, who have always abused them, and taxed them, and made money out of them, and who now propose to take their property outright. Of course they are taught and believe that all that is precious and honorable in men requires resistance to the death. They are very ignorant, but very desperate and very able.

Now such rebels fight with their brains no less than with their guns. The brains may belong to a few, but they are well worked for the benefit of all. Take for an instance the fact that they had poisoned the public opinion of the whole world against us. When the storm struck us, we struggled up, looked around for a friend, and the nations stood regarding us with folded arms, and either a smile or more often their faces. It was an immense victory and advantage for the rebellion. It was a part of the same sagacity in crime that had already stolen all our navy and demolished or sent off our ships. It showed what every thing else has shown, the earnestness of the rebels.

The word, said the General M'Clellan says, will be "sharp." But a sharp war implies blows received as well as given. It implies resolution and bravery upon both sides. It implies that the difficulty is not to be snuffed out, but to be shelled out and shot down. It implies reverses and disasters all round.

All we can reasonably expect, then, is not that we shall beat in every battle, but that, upon the whole, we shall be gaining. The war is radical and thorough. We shall not have two of them in our day; and it will end in a permanent peace, not in a patch. We must indeed soon appear victors. It may soon be evident that the supremacy of the Government will be indisputably established. But the establishment will be a work of time. A peace of eighty years in a country does not end in a little war; and a great war is a tempest which heaves the ocean long after the sun has risen. Patience, forbearance, confidence, says General M'Clellan. Neither Bull Run nor Beaufort ended the war. The strong, like the steady wind, and the nimble hand, these alone bring final victory.

SIDE VIEWS.

WHILE Mr. Jefferson Davis is safe with well-bred disdain, "Do you call this a blockade, John Bull?" and while that unselfish gentleman says to us, "Good cousins, while you call a blockade a blockade, answer is plumped and splashed in sundry lately convenient harbors upon our rebellious coast. The Honorable Sydney Brooks, a marine magistrate from New Bedford, sails out of that city one gray November morning, and presently turns a screw, and he has made inland villages of sundry ports of entry.

His ships are provided with apparatus for pumping them out, and floating them at some convenient season. But when the sands of the rebellion run low, the sands of the Cooper and the Ashley and the Savannah will probably have buried the ancient whalers of New Bedford beyond help of pumps and bladders. Meanwhile the amiable discussion between the rebels and their foreign wishers may continue. What a blockade ought to be may remain an open question. What our blockade is is self-defined.

These acts, with the arrest of Mason and Slidell, and the great day of Port Royal, will show the world, which, in disbelief, that we are now awaking, if not awake. It will show also that the nation, while it subsumes a most causeless and wicked rebellion, proposes to leave a monument of the war and its own power, which shall yet injure no innocent person, and in no manner destroy the prosperity of the whole country. Charleston was the nursery of this insurrection. It will not be wasted with fire, nor flooded with water; but the arrogant idol will be changed into a country village. "State rights," its quiet rural streets will hereafter say, "I was a frog; I would be an ox; and I am a dried skin."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ALMANACK AND DIARY.

ASTRONOMICAL AND METEOROLLOGICAL NOTICES.

WIND—high.

N.B.—For economical reasons there will be no New Moon this month, as the old one, being in excellent repair, will still be retained upon the establishment.

RECIPES FOR DAYS.—Asparagus, vegetable marrow, and young peas may be looked for about this time: it is as big too long a time in the opinion your gardeners against spending for the Government purposes. If you have a choice of fruit will be down to the water side above Richmond, gather the carnations in the Crimea, which are invaluable. Probably to send, and return home in triumph.

FLOWER GARDEN.—Take up dead leaves, soil, stumps, sand, gravel, and any other rubbish into a heap, then turn over it considerable, if convenient) until you are tired or hurt yourself; the effect from your neighbors' windows will be novel and pretty.

RECIPE FOR A WARM AND GRATEFUL DRINK.—Extracted from the Works of Bishop Beveridge.—Take half an ounce of the best raisin pigs, the same of lemon, with one of the best Wallsend, one drachm and a half of finely-powdered chalk, simmer carefully on a gridiron, and drink suddenly at 11 P.M. The foregoing is at bedtime, the very last thing to be taken.

MEMORANDA FOR THE MONTH.—(From J. Robinson's Note-book).—Mem. To ask when tools are now hot after our ball. Mem. Last cab to come I must pay guinea unbroken. Mem. To get that too pounds ten from Jones.

MEM.—(From Jones's Note-book).—Avoid Robinson.

SMILES AND TEARS.—An unclubbable French proverb says, "Man, woman, or child was never yet judged by Time;" the English of this must be that "Self-Help" is by Smiles.

TESTIMONIAL TO THE DOUGHNUT (From the Note-book of B. Webster, Esq.).—"Highly accomplished couple, my very dear friends, enjoy your honeymoon."

QUERY BY SYDNEY JENNY.—Could a loom worked by steam ever become an heir-loom in a family?

MODERN CLASSICS.—Est vertias in vino?—Yy, no.

SPRING TIDE.—When the Cure sings at Weston's.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.—Civility from the Civil Service.

IT FOLLOWS, OF COURSE.—In one of the journals we find the announcement of a new story called "Love and Poverty." We think we can quite understand that, from the nature of the story, it would be impossible to write it without it. It will be a punishment to read it, which forms, as we have taught our children very pretty poetry indeed.

The author of the following can have a check for any amount upon calling at our office, provided he will not accept it for the following reason. Is such a joking or wit gone like a bank draft unpaid?—Because he is over dear!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

THE first regular session of the Thirty-seventh Congress commenced at noon on 2d inst. The galleries of both Houses were crowded to their utmost. The Senators and Thirty-seven Senators answered to their names at roll call, including Andrew Provost of Kentucky, Bayard of Delaware, and Right of Indiana. The usual committees were appointed to wait on the President and announce that the House of Representatives that the Senate was ready to proceed to business.

Senator Trumbull, of Illinois, gave notice that he would introduce a bill to confiscate the property of rebels, and give freedom to persons in slave States. Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, gave notice that he would introduce a joint resolution, tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain Wilkes, for his conduct in the case of Messrs. Mason and Slidell, was adopted. A resolution expelling John B. Thomas, the member from the Fifth District of Missouri, and now serving in the rebel army, was introduced. A message from the President to order that Messrs. Slidell and Mason be treated as prisoners of war, was communicated and Colonel Wood, prisoners in the hands of the rebels, for trade. A resolution was adopted, similar clearers from the spectators.

A message of War was requested to communicate what measures have been taken to ascertain who is responsible for the seizure of Messrs. Mason and Slidell. Massachusetts, offered a resolution declaring that in prosecuting the war Government has for its object the suppression of rebellion and the re-establishment of the Constitution and laws over the entire country, and declaring all power to interfere with State institutions, yet that the safety of the Government and the country are paramount and civil relations; that, therefore, the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy, and the officers in command under him, have the right to emancipate all persons who are held as slaves within the district in state of insurrection against the National Government; and that we recommend to the President that order of emancipation be issued whenever the same will avail to weaken the power of the rebels, to subdue or strengthen the military power of the loyal forces. A motion to lay the resolution on the table was lost by a vote of 28 to 10. Mr. Roscoe L. Conkling, of New York, proposed an amendment so as to make the resolution declare the nature of disloyal citizens. This was accepted by Mr. Elliot, and the subject was laid aside till Tuesday next.

Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, offered a preamble and bill declaring that the people in the permanent peace of Union in the republic so long as they conform to the laws of the land, and that treason consists in the means of protecting the war; that according to the law of nations, the people have the laws of an enemy to weaken his power; that the President be authorized to declare by proclamation to all our generals and officers in command to order freedom to all slaves who shall come within their lines, and to be in repelling the rebellion, and that the United States pledge the faith of the people for the payment of compensation to all loyal citizens who are or shall remain active in supporting the laws for all damages they may sustain by virtue of this resolution. This resolution lies over for investigation of committee. On 3d inst. Mr. Wilson gave notice of a bill to establish and construct a military and postal railroad from Washington City to Memphis, in Tennessee, to the City of New York, in the State of New York. Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, gave notice of a bill to confiscate the property of rebels, and give freedom to persons held to service. Mr. Wilson, of Missouri, reported that the Message would be sent in at noon on 5d, and that the House would be informed when it was sent in at noon of the 3d. We give its leading points:

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The disloyal citizens of foreign countries, who have offered the ruin of our country in return for the aid and comfort which they have looked anticipated from European patronage and encouragement than they probably expected. . . . . Our relations with Great Britain remained for exciting foreign nations to hostility against us is the embarrassment of commerce. . . . . Our relations with Spain improbably war from the fact that it was the Union which made us of war foreign or rather domestic policy. . . . . We can scarcely have failed to perceive that the effort for dissolution provoked the existing civil war. . . . . Foreign nations promises more durable peace, and a more extensive, valuable, and profitable commerce, than can the same nation broken into fragments.

COAST DEFENSES.

Since, however, it is apparent that we have here, as in every other State, foreign dangers necessarily attend domestic difficulties, I recommend that adequate and permanent measures be adopted for maintaining the public defenses on every side. While, under this general recommendation, provision for defending our coast line readily occurs to the mind, I also, in the light of present experience, call your attention to the Congress to our great lakes and rivers. It is believed that some fortifications and depots, with a few armed vessels, with harbor and navigation improvements at selected points upon those waters, would be of great importance to the national defense and preservation.

THE REVENUE.

The revenue from all sources, including loans for the financial year ending on the 30th of June, 1861, was $86,835,000 27, and the expenditures for the same period, including payments on account of the public debt, were $68,078,054 43, leaving a balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July of $17,757,069 89 for the first quarter of the financial year ending on the 30th September, 1861. The receipts from all sources, including the balance of July 1, were $102,852,239 32, and the expenses $48,120,253 60, leaving a balance on the 1st of October, 1861, of $54,732,176 18. . . . It is gratifying to know that the expenses made necessary by the rebellion are not beyond the resources of the loyal people, and to believe that the same patriotism which has thus far called forth those resources will continue to sustain it till peace and union shall again bless the land.

CLAIMS AGAINST REBELS.

One of the unavoidable consequences of the present insurrection is the embarrassment which many places of all ordinary means of administering civil justice by the officers and in the usual form. . . . . Thus, in the case of the whole or in part, in all the insurgent States, and as our means advance and the power and authority of parts of those States, the practical evil become more apparent. There are no courts to enforce the laws, and in those States may apply for the enforcement of their lawful claims against citizens of the United States, and there is a vast amount of debt constituting such claims. Some have remained at as high as $40,000,000, due in large part from insurgents, in open rebellion, to loyal citizens who are now making the sacrifice incident to the discharge of their patriotic duty to support the Government. . . . . Some circumstances, which may urgently solicited to establish by military power courts to administer summary justice in such cases. I have thus far declined to do it, not because I had any doubt that the ultimate collection of the debts—was just and right in itself, but because I have been unwilling to go beyond the pressure of necessity in the unusual exercise of power. But the powers of Congress, I suppose, are equal to the occasion, and therefore I refer the whole matter to Congress, with the hope that a way may be devised for the administration of justice in all such parts of the integrated States as may be under the control of the military power of the government, whether by a voluntary return to allegiance and order on the part of our citizens, or by force, not to be a permanent institution but a temporary substitute, to be withdrawn as soon as the ordinary courts can be re-established in peace.

CONTRABANDS.

Under and by virtue of the act of Congress, entitled an act to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes approved August 6, 1861, the claims of certain persons to the labor and services of certain other persons have become forfeited to the loyal citizens of the United States, and severally dependent on the United States, and have been employed in the service of the army. Besides this, it is not impossible that some of the States and parts of States will be restored to their former practical relations to the United States respectively, and by the operation of which persons of the same class will be withdrawn from the disposal. In such case I recommend that Congress provide for the payment by the United States according to some mode of valuation in lieu pro-rata of direct taxes, which may be hereafter given to dispose with such States respectively, that such persons on one hand compensation for the loss of such claims to service deemed free, and that in any event steps be taken for colonizing such classes, or persons of African descent, with their consent, on this continent or elsewhere, at some place or places in a climate congenial to them. It is believed that a suitable, too, whether the free colored people already in the United States could cheerfully and individually may desire, be included in such colonization.

OBJECTS OF THE WAR.

In considering the question of the method for suppressing the insurrection, I have been anxious and careful that the inevitable conflict for this purpose shall not degenerate into a violent and remorseless revolutionary struggle. I have, therefore, sought to keep myself and those acting under the integrity of the Union prominent as the primary object of the contest between the parties. In other words, we are not of vital importance to the more deliberate action of the Government. The necessity of this course I have adhered to the blockade of the ports held by the insurgent forces by proclamation and to the law of Congress enacted at the late session for closing those ports, and in accepting the dictates of prudence as well as the obligations of law instead of proceeding, I have adhered to the act of Congress to confiscate property, and for insurrectionary purposes. The law ought to the same subject shall be proposed, its propriety will be duly considered. . . . . Meanwhile I have not thought that the dispensable means must be employed. We should not be in haste to destroy a material and enormous interest, which may reach the loyal as well as the disloyal, are indispensable.

THE BORDER STATES.

The insurgents confidently claimed a strong support from north of Mason and Dixon's line, and the friends of the Union were not free from apprehension on the point. Only, however, in Maryland, Kentucky, and on the right side. South of the line noble little Delaware led off right from the first. Maryland, paying a large contingent to the Union, our soldiers were assaulted, bridges were burned, and railroads torn up within her limits, and we were many days at one time without the ability to bring a single regiment over her soil to the capital. Now her railroads and railroads are repaired and open to the Government. She has already furnished to the cause of the Union and none to the enemy, and her people at a regular election have sustained, by a large majority, and a larger aggregate vote than they ever before gave in any established election. Kentucky, too, was in a similar condition, is now decidedly and, I think, unchangeably, on the side of the Union. Missouri is similarly situated, but I think that we are still less cautiously, I cannot but think that we are still less cautious. I mention Missouri here chiefly to show what is further mark of recognition. The people of these States constitute the Government of General Scott came the executive duty of appointing the commander-in-chief of the army. It is a fortunate circumstance that neither in council nor military was there, on the breaking out of the rebellion, any loss so to the proper person to be selected. The retiring from command of General Scott appeared in favor of General M'Clellan for the position, and in this the nation seems to give universal approbation and confidence. Attention of General M'Clellan is, therefore, in a considerable degree relieved from details, and enabled to give his effective, and hence there is better reason to hope there will be no blunders. The national forces are now present in sufficient fair implication promised, and without which he can not, with or full efficiency.

LABOR AND CAPITAL.

Labor is prior to, and independent of capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor is the superior of capital, and deserves much the higher consideration. Capital has its rights, which are as worthy of protection as any other rights. Nor is it denied that there is, and probably always will be, a relation between labor and capital, producing mutual benefits. . . . . In most of the Southern States a majority of the whole people of all colors are neither slaves nor masters, while in the Northern a large majority are neither hirer nor hired. . . . . There is not of necessity any such thing as the free hired laborer being fixed for that condition of life. Many independent men everywhere in these States a few years back in their lives were hired laborers. The prudent, penniless beggar in the world labors for wages awhile, saves a surplus with which to buy tools and land for himself, then laborers his own account another while, and at length hires another new beginner to help him. This is the just and generous and prosperous system which opens the way to all, gives hope to all, and consequent energy and progress and improvement of the condition to all. No man living are more worthy to be trusted than those who toil up from poverty; none less inclined to take from such unjust which they have not honestly earned. Let them beware of surrendering a political power which they already possess, and which, if surrendered, will surely be used to close the door of advancement to such as they, and to fix new disabilities and burdens upon them till all of liberty shall be lost.

THE OBJECT OF THE STRUGGLE.

From the first hinge of our National census to the last new registration of voters, we find one popular class of the people still times as great as it was at the beginning. The increase of breadth of our national domain, of course, has been even greater. We thus have, at one view, what the popular principle, applied to government through the machinery of the States and the Union, has produced in a certain time: and also what, if faithfully maintained, it promises for the future. There are already among us upwards of 31,000,000 free people; and still we live as it contain 250,000,000. The struggle of to-day is not alone for to-day, but for a vast future also. With this view, Lincoln, in his first inaugural address, at the most firm and earnest, let us proceed in the great task which events have devolved upon us.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

We give the following extracts from the Report of the Secretary of the Navy:

ENLISTMENT OF FUGITIVES.

In the common and blockading duties of the navy it has been not unfrequently that fugitives from inconvenience place have sought our ships for refuge and protection, and in many instances these have applied for the enlistment so to the proper disposition which should be made of them. Considering that they were fugitives from service, they should be handed over to the custody of the Government; but if, on the contrary, they were free from any voluntary participation in the rebellion and sought the service and protection of the flag, they should be cared for and employed in some useful manner and might be entered on board the proper vessels of the navy, if capable, receiving wages for their labor. If such employment could not be found for them in the navy, they might be transferred to the army, and if no employment could be found for them in either service, they should be subsisted and treated kindly and peacefully without restraint to seek a livelihood in the interior country. Many, very many, have applied to the navy for employment, in the premises, of our naval officers.

REBEL EMISSARIES.

Captain Charles Wilkes, in command of the San Jacinto, while cruising in the Bahama Channel for the Gulf, received information that James M. Mason and John Slidell, rebel emissaries, were about embarking at Cuba with their suite to embark from Havana in the English steamer Trent for a voyage to Europe to represent the views of the insurgents. Cruising in the Bahama Channel he intercepted the Trent, fired a shot across her bows to bring her to, and after these dangerous men, when he brought to the United States. They are now having been confined in the navy service at Charlestown, the prisoners were retained on board and conveyed to Fort Warren.

The prompt and decisive action of Captain Wilkes on this occasion has received and received the emphatic approval of the Department, and if a too generous forbearance was exercised by him in the circumstances of the capture of these rebel emissaries on board, it may, in view of the delicate relations, and of its peculiar character, be excused; but it must by no means be permitted to constitute a precedent hereafter for the detention of any case of similar infraction of neutral obligations by foreign vessels engaged in commerce or the carrying trade.

THE NAVY-YARD AT PENSACOLA.

A naval force, auxiliary to and connected with the army movements on the Mississippi and its tributaries, has been organized and is actively employed in the Department. Under H. Foote, who is rendering efficient service in that quarter.

The steamers which have been built or purchased for the service of the Gulf Department are of a very valuable character, and manned by a class of superior seamen and officers. Their services, in the present navy blockade already, have done good service, and will, I am confident, exhibit themselves with increased efficiency hereafter. The expanded exhibiting some of the operations of this command as auxiliary to the military movements on the Mississippi.

SINKING VESSELS.

One method of blockading the ports of the insurgent States, and interdicting communication as well as to protect the harbors and channels of the Southern coast and our commerces, has been that of sinking in the channels vessels filled with stone. The first movement in this direction was on the North Carolina coast, where there are numerous inlets, communicating with Pamlico Sounds, and other interior waters, which afforded facilities for eluding the blockade. For this purpose to be privateers. A number, a class of small vessels were purchased in Baltimore, some of which had been previously placed in Inlets.

Another and larger description of vessels were bought in the Northern States, most of them, it is said, having been employed in the whale fisheries. These were sent to obstruct the channel before and the harbor of Charleston River; and this, if effectually done, will prove the most economical and satisfactory method of interdicting commerce at those points.

VESSELS CAPTURED.

Since the institution of the blockade one hundred and fifty-three vessels have been captured by the vessels of our flags, most of which were attempting to violate the blockade. In a few cases, though these vessels were in such condition when seized as to authorize their being sent at once to the nearest convenient port for condemnation as prizes.

THE FIGHT AT FORT PICKENS.

We illustrate on pages 792 and 793 the scene of the recent conflict at and around Fort Pickens. At the hour we write we are without authentic information from the scene of action. It appears certain, however, that on 19th Nov. the vessels under Flag Officer Porter left Pensacola, returned; that the mutual bombardment lasted all day, and was renewed on the next; that during the whole day the forts both parties stopped the engagement, and that matters were remain in any ways. On the 22d the Flag Officer's squadron has been evacuated, and the Navy-yard burned—but nothing certain is known on these points. The commander of the rebel forces is General Bragg, who is supposed to have sworn to destroy Pensacola or to drive the troops of Fort Pickens is Colonel Harvey Brown, who has sixteen hundred men at his command.

THE OCCUPATION OF TYBEE.

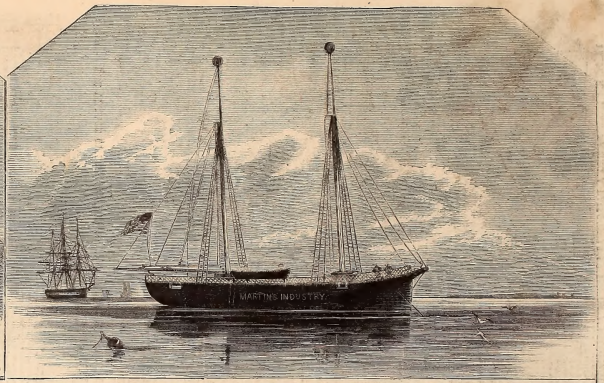
Commodore Dupont last week transferred his flag from the Wabash to the steamer Augusta, and, with the aid of General Sherman, landed a force of United States marines on Tybee Island, the entrance to Savannah River, in communications and contrasting new ones. A fleet of eight gunboats accompanied the Augusta, to be ready in case of necessity. The rebels sunk two vessels between Tybee and Hilton Head Island to lead cotton, and would sink all in a few days, by order of the naval authorities.

An account from Savannah is published in a Richmond paper to the effect that, on the 10th ultimo, Commodore Tatnall, with three small rebel steamers and one gun-boat, attacked the Union fleet in Cockspur Roads. The engagement lasted one hour, and from forty to fifty shots were exchanged.

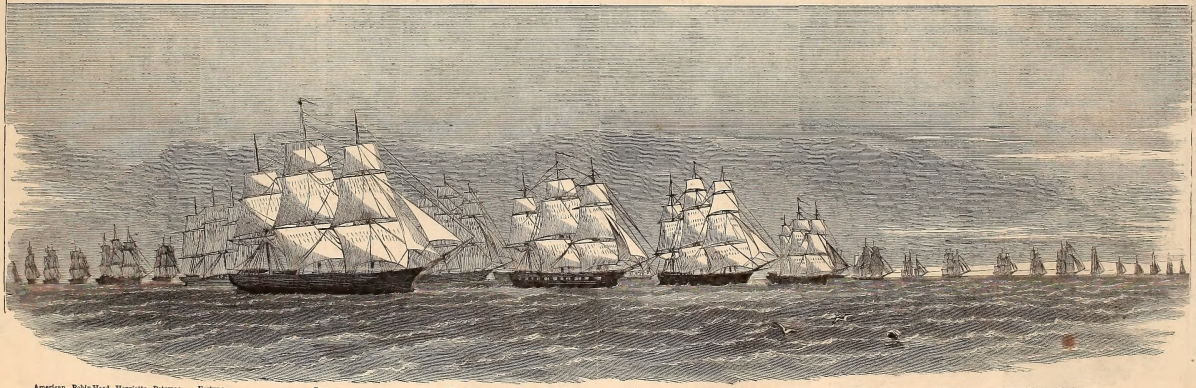
Our illustration on page 797 represents a reconnoissance made towards Fort Pulaski by General Sherman, after they were fired at by the enemy; the general view of the coast, etc.

SCENES IN AND AROUND BEAUFORT, SOUTH CAROLINA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 799.]

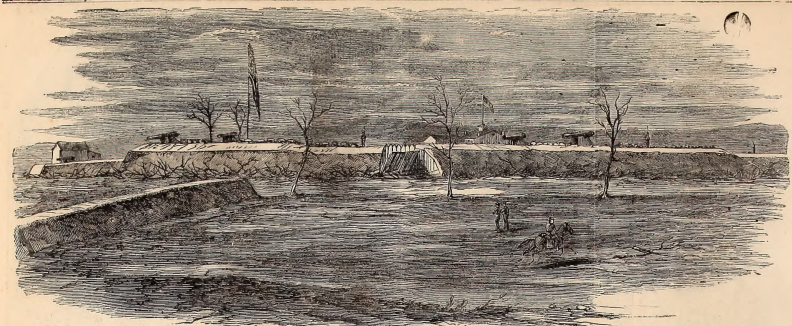
Burial place of those killed at Hilton Head



The new Light Ship off Martins Industry, entrance of Port Royal harbor



THE STONE FLEET ON ITS WAY TO THE SOUTHERN COAST.—[SEE PAGE 798.]



FORT CORCORAN, ARLINGTON HEIGHTS, VIRGINIA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE VILLAGE OF LEWINSVILLE, VIRGINIA, NOW OCCUPIED BY UNITED STATES TROOPS.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

PROFESSOR LOWE MAKING A BALLOON ASCENSION ON A RECONNOITRING EXPEDITION TO VIENNA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

VIEW OF URBANNA, ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK RIVER, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

OUR ARMY AT WASHINGTON.

OUR artist at Washington has sent us some more sketches, which we reproduce on page 790. One of them gives a fair idea of the village of LEWINSVILLE, which has been the scene of several sharp skirmishes, and is now in possession of our troops—a miserable, broken-down village, very Virginian in aspect. Another introduces us to the famous FORT CORCORAN, built by the soldiers of the Sixty-ninth Regiment, under Colonel Corcoran, before the Battle of Bull Run. It is situate on the property of the rebel General Lee, on Arlington Heights, and commands a wide extent of country. A third picture shows us PROFESSOR LOWE MAKING AN ASCENT IN HIS BALLOON on a reconnoitring expedition from General Smith's Division, in the vicinity of Vienna. Balloons now accompany almost all reconnoitring parties, and prove a valuable assistance.

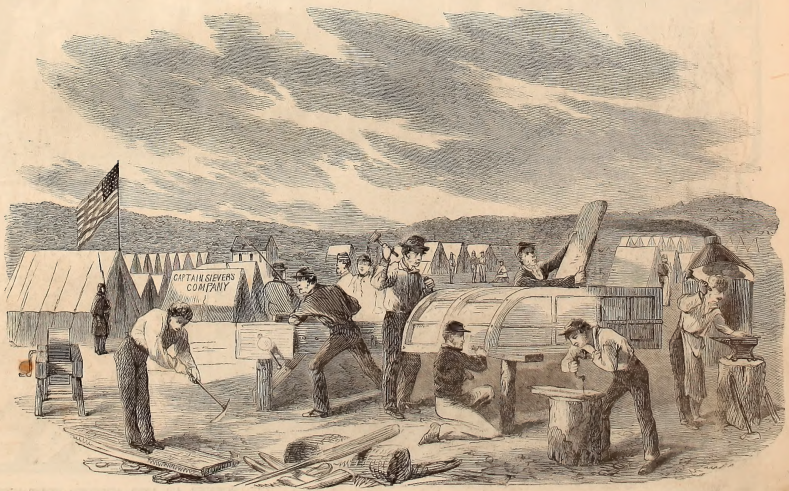
BUILDING PONTOONS.

WE publish on this page an illustration of the CONSTRUCTION OF PONTOONS for the army in Kentucky, from a sketch by Mr. H. Mosler. The pontoons in our picture are being built by the Thirty-second Indiana Regiment, under the superintendence of Lieutenant Fietzuch, a Pole, who has seen service abroad, and is now attached to this regiment. They are to be used as wagon-beds, and are made to fit the United States army wagons. The Thirty-second Indiana Regiment is one of the best drilled in the service. It is composed almost exclusively of Germans, and is commanded by Colonel Willich, formerly Lieutenant-Colonel of the Ninth Ohio.

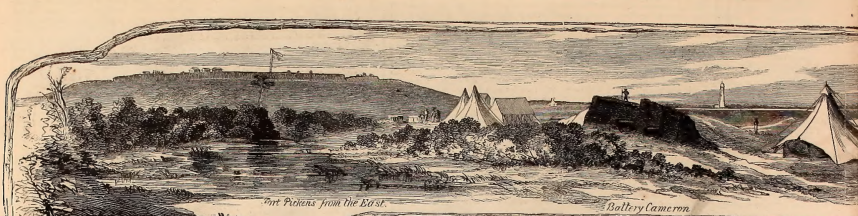
URBANNA.

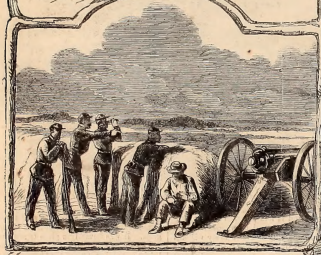
WE publish above a View of URBANNA, on the Rappahannock, lately visited by a reconnoitring party from Fortress Monroe.

Urbanna is a small village near the mouth of the Rappahannock River, in Middlesex County, Virginia. It was formerly a place of some note, but has now dwindled into almost insignificance. The bricks composing some of the houses were brought from England more than a hundred and fifty years ago. It boasts one store, a church, and a schoolhouse; the two last have been converted into lodgings for the soldiers now quartered there. Some time ago the Harriet Lane came up and threw a few shell into the woods on the banks of the river; since then the inhabitants, with the exception of a few men, have all deserted their homes and gone far back into the country. The rebels have erected strong batteries both above and below the village.

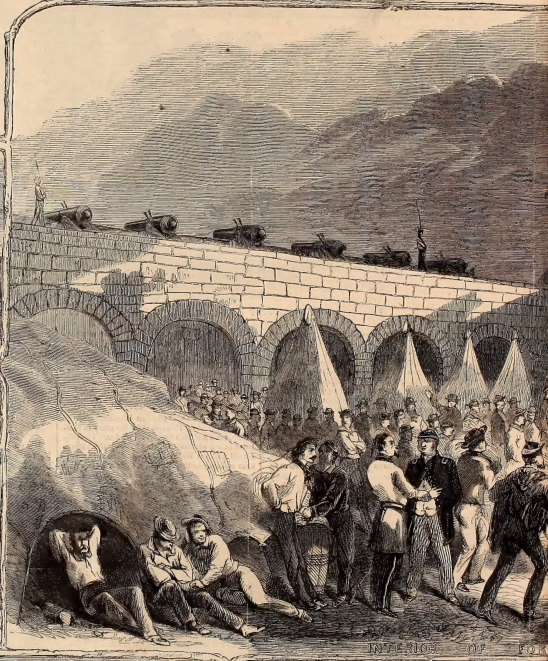


THE THIRTY-SECOND INDIANA REGIMENT (COLONEL WILLICH) BUILDING PONTOONS IN KENTUCKY.—[SKETCHED BY MR. H. MOSLER.]

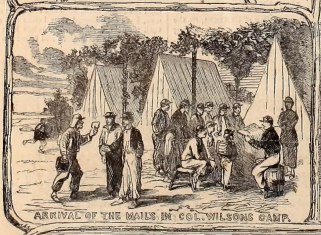




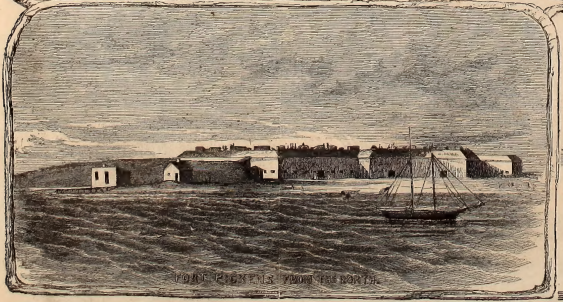
ZOUAVES AWAITING THE REBELS BEHIND THE TRENCHES.



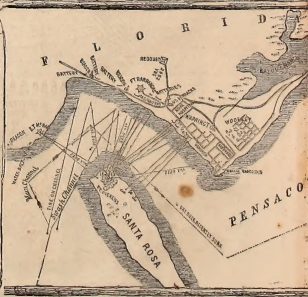
INTERIOR OF FO



ARRIVAL OF THE MAILS IN COL. WILSON'S CAMP.



FORT PICKENS FROM THE NORTH.



SCENES AT AND AROUND FORT PICKENS.—From S

Warrington Navy Yard.

Battery Lincoln.

PENSACOLA LIGHT-HOUSE.

FORT BARRANCAS.

PENSACOLA

LA BAY

OLD NAVY COVE

U.S. LIVE OAK PLANTATION

REBEL CAMP AT WARRINGTON, PENSACOLA.

ETCHED BY OFFICERS OF THE GARRISON.—[SEE PAGE 787.]

A STRANGE STORY.

By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON.

[Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."]

CHAPTER XLIII.

I was just outside the garden-door when I felt an arm thrown round me, my cheek kissed, and wetted with tears. Could it be Lilian? Alas, no! It was her mother's voice, that, between laughing and crying, exclaimed hysterically, "This is joy, to see you again, and on these thresholds! I have just come from your house; I went there on purpose to congratulate you, and to talk to you about Lilian. But you have seen her?"

"Yes; I have but this moment left her. Come this way." I drew Mrs. Ashleigh back into the garden, along the old winding walk, which the shrubs contained from view of the house. We sat down on a rustic seat, where I had often sat with Lilian, midway between the house and the Monks' Well. I told the mother what had passed between me and her daughter; I made no compliment of Lilian's coldness and change; I did not hint at its cause. "Girls of her age will change," said I, "and all that now remains is for you and I to agree on such a tale to our curious neighbors that the whole blame may rest on me. Man is strong to bear such burdens; they should never be imposed on women."

"Do not be rash, my dear Allen," said Mrs. Ashleigh, in great distress. "I feel for you, I understand you; in your case I might act as you do. I can not blame you. Lilian is changed—changed unaccountably. Yet sure I am that the change is only on the surface, that her heart is really yours as entirely and as faithfully as ever it was; and that later, when she recovers from the strange, dreamy kind of torpor which appears to have come over all her faculties and all her affections, she would awake with a despair which you can not conjecture to the knowledge that you had renounced her."

"I have not renounced her," said I, impatiently. "I did but restore her freedom of choice. And pass by this now, and explain to me more fully the change in your daughter, which I gather from your words is not confined to me."

"I wished to speak of it before you saw her, and for that reason came to your house. It was on the morning in which we left her aunt's to return hither that I first noticed something particular in her look and manner. She seemed absorbed and absent, so much so that I asked her several times to say what made her so grave, but I could only get from her that she had had a confused dream which she could not recall distinctly enough to relate, but that she was sure it boded evil. During the journey she became gradually more herself, and began to look forward with delight to the idea of seeing you again. Well, you came that evening. What passed between you and her you know best. You complained that she slighted your request to shun all acquaintance with Mr. Margrave. I was surprised that she had her eyes with your reasonable—or not, she could have hesitated to comply with it. I spoke to her about it after you had gone, and she wept bitterly at thinking she had displeased you."

"She wept! You amaze me! Yet the next day what a note she returned to mine!"

"The next day the change in her became very visible to me. She told me, in an excited manner, that she was convinced she ought not to marry you. Then came, the following day, the news of your committal. I heard of it, but dared not break it to her. I went to our friend, the mayor, to consult with him what to say, what do, and to learn more distinctly than , and done from terrified, incoherent servants the rights of so dreadful a story. When I returned I found, to my amazement, a young stranger in the drawing-room; it was Mr. Margrave.—Miss Brabazon had brought him at his request. Lilian was in the room too, and my astonishment was increased when she said to me, with a singular smile, vague but tranquil: 'I know all about Allen Fenwick; Mr. Margrave has told me all. He is a friend of Allen's. He says there is no cause for fear.' Mr. Margrave then apologized to me for his intrusion in a careless, jolly manner, as if one of the family. He said he was so intimate with you that he felt that he could best break to Miss Ashleigh an information he might receive elsewhere, for that he was the only man in the town who treated the charge with ridicule. You know the wonderful charm of this young man's manner. I can not explain to you how it was, but in a few moments I was as much at home with him as if he had been your brother. To be brief, having once come, he came constantly. He had moved, two days before you went to Dorval Court, from his hotel to apartments in Mr. ——'s house, just opposite. We could see him on his balcony from our terrace; he would smile to us and come across. I did wrong in slighting your injunctions, and suffering Lilian to do so. I could not help it, he was such a comfort to me—to her, too—in our solitude. He alone had no doleful words, were no long face; he alone was invariably cheerful. 'Every thing,' he said, 'would come right in a day or two.'"

"And Lilian could not but admire this young man, he is so beautiful."

"Beautiful? Well, perhaps. But if you have a jealous feeling you were never more mistaken. Lilian, I am convinced, does more than dislike him; he has inspired her with repugnance, with terror. And much as I owe to him, in his wild, joyous, careless, harmless way, do not think I flatter you if I say that Mr. Margrave is not the man to make any girl's pulses beat with nature to a lover with infinitely less advantages than you may pretend to. He would be a universal favorite, I grant; but there is something in him, or a something wanting in him, which makes liking and admiration stop short of love. I know not why, perhaps, with all his good-humor, he is so absorbed in himself, so intensely egotistical—so light, were he less clever I should say ridiculous. He could not make love, he could not say, in the serious tone of a man in earnest, 'I love you.' He owned as much to me, and owned, too, that there is a woman for what love was. As to myself—Mr. Margrave appears rich. No whisper against his character or his fame ever reached me. Yet were you out of the question, and were there no stain on his birth, nay, were he as high in rank and wealth as he is favored by nature in personal advantages, I confess I could never consent to trust him with my daughter's fate. A voice at my heart would cry 'No!' It may be an unreasonable prejudice, but I could not bear to see him touch Lilian's hand."

"If she were, then—never suffer him ever to take her hand?"

"Never. Do not think so meanly of her as to suppose that she could be won by a fair face, a graceful manner. Reflect, just before she had refused for your sake Ashleigh Sumner, whom Mary Haughton said 'no girl in her senses could refuse;' and this change in Lilian really began before we returned to L——; before she had seen Mr. Margrave. It is not reasonable it is something in the reach of your skill as physician —it is on the nerves, the system. I will give you proof of what I say. I do not betray me to her. It was during your imprisonment, the night before your release, that I was awaked by her coming to my bedside. She was talking as if her heart would break: 'Oh, mother, mother! she cried, 'pity me, help me—I am so wretched!' I asked her what troubled her. She have been so cruel to Allen, and I know I shall be so again. I can not help it. Don't question me, don't ask me any more, if he comes to-day or I reject him, tell him some day—perhaps when I am in my grave—not to believe appearances. I have no will, in my heart of hearts, never ceased to love him!'"

"She said that! You are not deceiving me?"

"Oh, Allen, do I look like it?"

"There is hope still," I murmured; and I bowed my head upon my hands, hot tears forcing way through the clasped fingers.

"One word more," said I; "you tell me that Lilian has a repugnance to this Margrave, and yet she has been in his society for days—a contest that could not be wholly ascribed to shrinking words he might say about myself, since it is all but certain that I was not at that time upper-most in her mind. Can you explain this apparent contradiction?"

"I am not, otherwise than by a conjecture which you would ridicule."

"I can ridicule nothing now. What is your conjecture?"

"I know how much you disbelieve in the stories one hears of animal magnetism and electrobiology, otherwise—"

"You think that Margrave exercises some power of that kind over Lilian? Has he spoken of such a power?"

"Not exactly; but he said that he was sure Lilian possessed a faculty that he called by some hard name, not chairvoyance, but a faculty which, he said, when I asked him to explain, was akin to prevision—to second sight. Then he talked of the Priestesses who had administered the ancient oracles. Lilian, he said, reminded him of them, with her deep eyes and mysterious smile."

"And Lilian heard him? What said she?"

"Nothing; she seemed in fear while she listened."

"He did not offer to try any of those arts practiced by professional mesmerists and other charlatans?"

"I thought he was about to do so, but I forestalled him, saying I never would consent to any experiment of that kind, either on myself or on my daughter."

"And he replied—?"

"With his gay laugh, that I was very foolish; that a person possessed of such a faculty as he attributed to Lilian, would, if the faculty were developed, be an invaluable adjunct. He would have said more, but I tegged him to desist. Still I fancy at times—do not be angry—that he does somehow or other bewitch her, unconsciously to herself; for she always knows when he is coming. Indeed I am not sure that he does not bewitch myself. For I have no means justify my conduct in admitting him to an intimacy so familiar, and in spite of your wish; I have reproached myself, resolved to shut my door on him, or to show by my manner that his visits were unwelcome; yet when Lilian has said, in the drowsy, lethargic tone which has come into her voice (her voice naturally earnest and impressive, though always low), 'Mother, he will be here in two minutes—I wish to leave the room and can not'—I, too, have felt as if something constrained me against my will; as if, in short, I were under that influence to which Mr. Vigors—whom I will never forgive for his conduct to you —would ascribe to mesmerism."

"But will you not explain your opinion."

"No, not to-night; but watch and heed her, and if you see aught to make you honestly believe that you may have forgiven the fall of the room which I have released her—why you know, Mrs. Ashleigh, that—that—" My voice failed —I wrung the good woman's hand, and went my way.

I had always till then considered Mrs. Ashleigh—I use the phrase described heaven—"commonplace weak"—still of an intelligence somewhat below mediocrity. I now regarded her with respect as well as grateful tenderness; her plain sense had divined what all my boasted knowledge had failed to detect in my earlier intimacy with Margrave—viz., that in him there was a something wanting, or a something wanting, which forbade love and excited fear. Young, beautiful, wealthy, seemingly blameless in life as he was, she would not have given her daughter's hand to him!

CHAPTER XLIV.

The next day my house was filled with visitors. I had not expected that so many friends, Mr. Vigors wrote me a generous and handsome letter, owning his prejudices against me on account of his son-in-law's death, Dr. Lloyd, and begging my pardon for what he now felt to have been harshness, if not distorted justice. But what most moved me was the entrance of Strahan, who rushed up to me with the heartiness of old college days. "Oh, my dear Allen, am you ever forgive me? I should have disbelieved, suspected you of abstracting my poor cousin's memory?"

"Is it known, then?"

"Oh yes; you must thank Margrave. He, clever fellow, you know, came to me on a visit regarded; he was the first once on the right scent. Only guess; but you never can! It was that wretched old housekeeper who particularized the manner in which I remember she came into the room while you were looking at the memoir. She heard as talk about it; her curiosity was excited; she longed to know the history of her old master, under his own hand; she could not sleep; she heard me go up to bed; she thought you might leave the book on the table when you too went to rest. She stole down stairs, peeped through the key-hole of the lobby, saw you with the book lying before you, entered, took the book away softly, meant to glance at its contents and to return it. You were sleeping so soundly she thought you would not wake for an hour; she carried it into the library, leaving the door open, and there began to pore over it by the light of a candle on one of the passages in Latin; she hoped to find some part in plain English, turned over the leaves, putting her candle down, and, as she read, words and sentences grew dim, when she heard you make some sound in your sleep. Alarmed, she looked round; you were moving heavily in your sleep and muttering to yourself. From watching you she was soon diverted by the consequence of her own confusion and timidity. In turning over the pages in Latin; she hoped to find some part in plain English, turned over the leaves, putting her candle down, and, as she read, words and sentences grew dim, when she heard you make some sound in your sleep. Alarmed, she looked round; you were moving heavily in your sleep and muttering to yourself. From watching you she was soon diverted by the consequence of her own confusion and timidity. In turning over the leaves she unconsciously brought the poor manuscript close to the candle, the leaves caught the flame; her eye was caught by the sparks—a cone her aware of the mischief done. She threw down the book; her sleeve was in flames; she had not time to save the book, or to cease, loaded for her, not sewn to her dress. By the time she recovered presence of mind to attend to the book and its leaves were reduced to ashes. She could not dare then to replace what was left of the manuscript on your table; returned, with it, to her room, hid it, and resolved to keep her own secret. It should never be guessed it; I had never even spoken to her on the occurrence; but when I talked over the disappearance of the book to Margrave he guessed, and expressed my disbelief of your story, he said, in his merry way: 'But do you think Fenwick the only person curious about your cousin's odd ways and strange history? Why, every servant in the household would have been equally curious. Don't you examine your servants, of course?' 'No, I never thought of it.' 'Examine them now, then. Examine especially that old housekeeper. I observe a great change in her manner since I came here, weeks ago, to look over the house. She has something on her mind—I see it in her eyes.' Then it occurred to me too that the woman's manner had altered, and that she seemed always in a trouble and a fidget. I went at once to her room, and charged her with stealing the book. She fell on her knees, and told the whole story as I have told it to you, and as I shall take care to tell it to all to whom I have so foolishly blabbed [illegible] more foolish suspicions of yourself. But [illegible] you forgive me, old friend?"

"Heartily, heartily! And the book is burned?"

"See!" and he produced the mutilated manuscript. Strange, the part burned—reduced indeed to tinder—was the concluding part that related to Haroun—to Grayle; no vestige of that part left; the earlier portions were scorched and mutilated but in some places still quite legible; but as my eye hastily ran over these pages I saw but mangled sentences of the experimental problems which the writer had so minutely elaborated.

"Will you keep the manuscript as it is, and as long as you can?" said Strahan.

"No, no; I will have nothing more to do with it. Consult some other man of science. And so this is the old woman's whole story? No accomplice—none? No one else shared her curiosity and her task?"

"No. Only enough though, she made use of something like the excuse made by that dreadful madman; she said 'the Devil put it into her head.' Of course she did, as he puts every thing wicked into any one's head. That does not mend the matter."

"How! did she too say she saw a Shadow and heard a Voice?"

"No; not such a liar as that, and not mad enough for such a lie. But she said that when she was in bed, thinking over the book, something irresistible urged her to get up and go down into the study; swore she felt something lead her by the hand; swore, too, that when she first discovered the manuscript was not in English, moved her lips whispered to her to turn over the leaves and approach them to the candle. But I had no patience to listen to all this rubbish. I sent her out of the house, fine and huge—scare. But alas! is this to be the end of all my wise cousin's grand discoveries?"

"The end of labors that aspired to bring into the chart of science new worlds, of which even the traditionary rumor was but a voice from the land of dreams, mingled with broken vestiges of a daring footstep! The hope of a name imperishable amidst the loftiest hierarchy of Nature's secret temple, with all the strength of recorded experiment, that applied to the mysteries of Egypt and Chaldea the inductions of Bacon, the tests of Locke—was there nothing left of this but what, here and there, some puzzled student might extract, garbled, mutilated, perhaps misunderstood, such shreds of evidences, wrecks of problems? O mind of man, can the works on which thou wouldst found immortality below perish more utterly than smoke and tinder by an inch of candle in the hand of an old woman!

When Strahan left me, I went out, but not yet to visit Margrave. I stole through by-paths into the fields; I needed solitude to bring my thoughts into some shape and order. What was delusion, what truth in me? —what right or the public? Was Margrave really the dupe of innocent and serviceable of human beings, kindly, unconsciously employing a wonderful acuteness for benignant ends? Was I, in truth, indebted to him for the greatest boon one man can bestow on another? For his own life preserved, his fame justified? Or had he, by some demoniac sorcery, guided the hand of the murderer against the life of my friend, that he alone could imperil his own? had he, by the same dark spell, urged the woman to the act that had destroyed the only rec- ord of his marvelous beings—the only evidence that I was not the sport of an illusion in the horror with which he inspired me?

Could the latter supposition could be admissible, did he use his agents only to betray them afterward to exposure, and that without any motive but that of his own detection as the investigator? Then there came the confused recollections of tales of medieval witchcraft which I had read in my boyhood. Were there on judicial record attestations and evidences, solemn and circumstantial, of supernatural events and influences wrought by Margrave? Of sorcerers instigating to sin through influences ascribed to Demons—making their apparitions glide through guarded doors, their voices heard from afar in the solitude of dungeons or monastic cells? subjugating victims to their will by means which their confidence could have detected, if the victims themselves had not accused the witch-craft that had ensnared—courting a sure and speedy death as the last confession—preferring such death to a life so haunted? Were stories so gravely set forth in the pomp of judicial evidence, and in the history of times comparatively recent, indeed, to be passed [illegible] together, as a wales tadpoets of senseless superstition—all that could be ascribed to the fraud of the victims and tools of the sorcerers lunatics? all the examiners or judges, with their solemn grandeur of intelligence and zeal—from Commissions of Inquiry to Courts of Appeal—to be dismissed for credulity, loathed for cruelty; or, amidst records monstrous, so impudently self-given, were there the fragments of a terrible truth? And had our ancestors been so unwise in those laws we now deem so cruel, by which they, with the aid of scourges more awful and more potent than the felon with his candid dagger? Fell instigators of the evil in men's secret hearts—shaping into action the vague, half-formed desire, and guiding with agencies, impalpable, unseen, their spell-bound instruments of calamity and death.

Such were the gloomy questions that I—by repute, the sternest advocate of common sense against fantastic errors; by profession, the searcher into flesh and blood, and tissue, and nerve, and sinew, for the causes of all that disease the mechanism of the universal human frame—I, self- bossting physician, skeptic, philosopher, materialist, revolved, not amidst gloomy pines, under grim winter skies, but as I paced slow through laughing meadows, and by the banks of merry streams, in the vigorous of the golden August; the hum of insects in the fragrant grass, the flutter of birds amidst the delicate green of boughs checkered by playful sunbeams and gentle shadows, and even the sight of the resorts of busy work-day man. Walls, roof-tops, church-spires rising high. There, white and modern, the handwriting of our race, in this practical nineteenth century, on its square plain masonry and Doric shafts, the Town Hall, central in the animated market-place. And I—I—spying into long-neglected corners and dark holes of memory for what my reason had flung there as worthless rubbish; reviving the jargon of French law, in the procès verbal, against a Gille de Retz or an Urbain Grandier, and sifting the equity of sentences on witchcraft!

Bursting the links of this ghastly soliloquy with a laugh at my own folly, I struck into a narrow path that led back toward the city by a quiet and rural avenue, by the path wound through a wide and solitary church-yard at the base of the Abbey-hill. Many of the former dwellers on that eminence now slept in the lowly burial-ground at its foot. And the place mournfully decorated with the tombs which still jealously mark distinctions of rank amidst the leveling democracy of the grave, was kept true with the care which comes half from piety and half from pride.

I seated myself on a bench, placed between the clipped yew-trees that bordered the path from the entrance to the church-porch, deeming vaguely that my own perplexing thoughts might imbibe a quiet from the quiet of the place.

"And oh," I murmured to myself, "oh that I had one bosom friend to whom I might freely confide all these torturing riddles which I can resolve—one who could read my heart, assured of its truthfulness, and wise enough to enlighten its troubles!"

And as I so murmured my eye fell upon the form of a kneeling child. At the farthest end of the burial-ground, beside a grave with its new head-stone glittering white-and-gold-like ebon moss, grew a tombe, a funeral child, her head bowed, her hands clasped. I could see but the outline of the small form in its sable dress—an infant bereaved.

My eyes and my thoughts turned from that silent figure, too absorbed in my own restless tumult of doubt and dread for sympathy with the grief or the consolation of a kneeling child. And yet I should have remembered that tomb! Again I murmured with a fierce impatience, "Oh for a bosom friend in whom I could confide!"

I heard steps on the gravel under the yews, and an old man came in slightly bent, with long gray locks still over enough of vigor for years to come—in his tread, firm though slow —in the unshrunken muscle of his limbs and the steady light of his clear blue eye. I started. Was it possible? That countenance, marked, indeed, with the lines of laborious thought, but overt in the mildness of humanity, and serene in the peace of conscience!—I could not be mistaken. Julius Faber was before me. The profound pathologist, on whom my own proud self-esteem acknowledged inferiority, without humiliation; the generous benefactor to whom I owed my own emancipation from the arduous road of fame and fortune. I had longed for a friend: a confidant; what I sought stood suddenly at my side.

CHAPTER XLV.

EXPLANATION on his part was short and simple. The nephew whom he designed as the heir to his wealth, if largely outstripped the liberal allowance made to him—had incurred heavy debts; and, in order to extricate himself from the debts, had plunged into ruinous speculations. Faber had come back to England to save his heir from prison or outlawry, at the expense of more than three months of the destined inheritance. To add to all, the young man had married a young lady without fortune: the uncle only heard of the marriage on arriving in England. The spendthrift was hiding from his creditors in the house of his father-in-law, in one of the northern counties. Faber there sought him; and, on becoming acquainted with his wife, grew reconciled to the marriage, and formed hopes of his nephew's future redemption. He spoke, indeed, of the young wife with great affection. She was good and sensible, willing and anxious to compensate any privation by which her husband might retrieve the effects of his folly. "So," said Faber, "on consultation with this excellent creature—for my poor nephew is so broken down by repentance that others must think for him how to exult repentance into reform—my plans were determined. I shall remove my prodigal from all scenes of temptation. He has youth, strength, plenty of energy, hitherto misdirected. I shall take him from the Old World into the New. I have decided on Australia. The fortune left left to me, small here, will be ample abroad there. It is not enough to maintain us separately, so we must all live together. Besides, I feel that, though I have neither the strength nor the experience which could best serve a young settler on a strange soil, still, under my eye, my poor boy will be at once more prudent and more persevering. We sail next week."

Faber spoke so cheerfully that I knew not how to express sympathy; yet at his age, after a career of such prolonged and distinguished labor, to resign the ease and comforts of the civilized state for the hardships and rudeness of an infant colony, seemed to me a dreary prospect: and as delicately, as tenderly as I could to one whom I loved and honored as a father, I placed at his disposal the fortune which, in great part, I owed to him—pressing him at least to take from it enough to secure to himself, in his own country, a home suited to his years and worthy of his station. He rejected all my offers, however earnestly urged on him, with his usual modest and gentle dignity; and assuring me that he looked forward with great interest to a residence in lands new to his experience, and affording ample scope for the hardy enjoyments which had always most allured his tastes, he hastened to change the subject.

"A d who, think you, is the admirable helpmate my scape-grace has had the saving good luck to find? A young lady of small means who undertook the care of poor Dr. Lloyd's orphans, when the orphans who owed so much to your generous exertions to secure a home for them —and that child, now just risen from her father's grave, is my pet companion, my darling eveshare—Dr. Lloyd's daughter, Alice."

Here the child joined us, quickening her pace as she recognized the old man, and nestling to his side as she placed herself between us myself. A winning, candid, lovable child's face, somewhat melancholy, somewhat more thoughtful than is common to the face of childhood, but calm, intelligent, and ineffably mild. Presently she stole from the old man and put her hand in mine:

"Are you not the kind gentleman who came to see Hiu that night when he passed away from us, and who, they all say at home, was so good to my brothers and me? Yes, I recollect you now." And she put her pure face to mine, whispering me low:

I kind! I good! I—I! Alas! she little knew, little guessed, the wrathful imprecation for her father had burned on my lips that night!

I did not dare to kiss Dr. Lloyd's orphan daughter, but my tears fell over her hand. She took them as the child might, and, in her infant thankfulness, silently kissed me.

"Oh, my friend!" I murmured to Faber, "I have more than I deserve in you—solace—alone—come to my house with me, be at least my guest as long as you stay in this town."

"Willingly," said Faber, "though we more intently than he had done before, and, with the true eye of the practised Healer, at once soft and penetrating.

He rose, took my arm, and whispering a word in the ear of the little girl, she went on before us, turning to look back at us from time to time, for another look at her father's grave. As we walked to my house Julius Faber spoke to me much of his child, of her character, her devotion, she was greatly attached to his nephew's wife; she had become yet more attached to Faber himself, though so short an acquaintance. He had fully settled that she was to go with them to Australia.

"There," said he, "the sun that some months hence will shine upon my child's father has settled on her will provide her no mean dower for a colonist's wife, when the time comes for her to leave me. Then, crossing the threshold of ours. He went on to say that she had wished to make him a present—in order to visit me—of her little fortune; but that, though he was touched by such kind care of me all the way, he could not fancy I were the child of the house to take from her the whole purpose of a few poor houses in it which still belong to me, principally to bid you farewell before quitting that town for ever. Accordingly, that on arriving to-day, I left Amy by herself in the church-yard while I went to your house, but you were I could not find you. And now I congratulate you on the reputation you have so rapidly acquired, which has even surpassed my predictions."

"Your error," said I, faltering, "is but the extraordinary charge from which that part of my reputation dearest to all men has just emerged?"

He had not seen the article in the weekly journal, written after my release. He asked details, which I postponed.

Reaching my house, I busied myself to provide for the comfort of my two unexpected guests; strove to rally myself—to be cheerful. Not till night, when Faber and I were left alone together, did I touch on what was weighing at my heart. Then, drawing to his side, I told him all: all of the mysterious interruption, even from the death-scene in Dr. Lloyd's chamber at the hour in which I had seen Dr. Lloyd's child at the Lloyd's counties. Faber then read my papers and conversations which had most impressed. I had already committed to writing, in the fear that elapsed memory might forget for its own thralldom the links of reminiscence which my memory might let fall from its chain. Faber listened with the deepest interest, broken by short pertinent questions; and when I had done, he remained thoughtful for some moments, then the grave physician broke his silence:

"I take for granted your conviction of the reality of all you tell me, even of the Luminous Shadow, of the mysterious Voice, but before admitting the reality itself we must abide by the old maxim, not to accept as cause to effect those agencies which may be but the instruments when causes less improbable for the effect can be rationally conjectured. In this case are there not such causes? Certainly there are—"

"There are!"

"Listen; you are one of those men who attempt to make their own existence subject, in all completed intellect imagination exists, and will force its way; deny it healthful vents, and it may array into morbid energies. The dark room of Dr. Lloyd deeply impressed your heart far more than your pride would own. This is clear, from your having been able to excuse, your conscience in your generosity —to the orphans. As the heart was moved, so was the imagination stirred; and, unaware to yourself, prepared for much that subsequently appealed to it. Your sudden love, conceived in the very grounds of the house so associated with recollections in themselves strange and romantic; the peculiar temperament and nature of the girl to whom your love was attracted; her own visionary beliefs, and the keen anxiety which infused into your love a deeper poetry of sentiment—all insensibly tended to induce the imagination to dwell on the Wonderful; and, in overstriving to reconcile each rarer phenomenon to the most positive laws of Nature, your very intellect could discover no solution but in the Preternatural.

"You visit a man who tells you he has seen Sir Philip Derval's ghost: on that very evening you hear a strange story, in which Sir Philip's name is mixed up with a tale of murder. The tale so interests your fancy that even the glaring impossibility of a not unimportant part of it escapes your notice—viz., the account of a criminal in which the strongest circumstantial evidence was more easily attainable than in all the rest of the narrative, but which could not legally have taken place at all, implicating two mysterious pretenders to magic—Louis Grayle, and the Sage of Aleppo. Thus it is whenever the mind begins to construct a theory: it must be slow of the Supernatural, the Obvious is lost to the eye that plunges its gaze into the Obscure. Almost immediately afterward you become acquainted with a young stranger, whose traits of character interest and perplex, attract yet repel you. And this young man is engaged in a physiological work that severely tasks the brain, and in which you examine the intricate question of cual direction of mind.

"And here, I can conceive a cause deep-hid among what metaphysicians would call latent assentions, from which you might without pedantry you to accept the fantastic impressions afterward made on you by the scene in the Museum and the visionary dream of the following Derval. Doubtless, when at college you first studied metaphysical speculation, you would have glanced over Beattie's Essay on Truth, as one of the works written in opposition to your favorite David Hume."

"Yes, I read the book, but I have long since forgotten in say to what end."

"Well, in that essay, Beattie" cites the extraordinary instance of Simon Browne, a learned and pious minister, who fervently disbelieved the existence of his own soul; and imagined that, by interposition of Divine power, his soul was annihilated, retaining left but a principle of animal life, which he held in common with the brutes! When years ago, a thoughtful, imaginative student, you read that book, probably enough you would have passed, revolved in your own mind and fancy what kind of a creature a man so deluded, yet retaining human life and merely human understanding, he was deprived of the powers and properties which reasoners love to attribute to the human soul. Something in this young man, unconsciously to yourself, revives that forgotten train of meditation ideas. You see in him, not the fatal cessation of being, his brute-like want of sympathy with his kind, his incapacity to comprehend the motives which carry others to scheme and to build for a future that extends beyond his grave, all start up before you at the very moment your reason is overashed, your imagination kindled, in seeking the causes of problems which philosophy alone can not solve. The young man's conversation not only thus excites your fancies, it disturbs your reason. He speaks not only of drugs that renew youth, but of charms that secure love. You tremble for your Lilian while you hear him! And when he has tasked, the imagination thus inflamed, the heart thus agitated, you are presented to Sir Philip Derval, whose ghost your patient had supposed he saw weeks ago.

"This person, a seeker after an occult philosophy, which had possibly acquainted him with some secrets in nature beyond the pale of our conventional experience, though when analyzed they might be found quite reconcilable with sober science, startles you with an undefined mysterious charge against the young man who had previously appeared no different from ordinary mortals. In a room stored with the dead things of the brute soulless world, your brain becomes intoxicated with the fumes of some vapor which produces effects not uncommon in the superstitious practices of the East; your brain thus excited, hears distinctly before you the vague impressions it had before received. Macgravar becomes identified with the Louis Grayle of whom you had previously heard in the same mysterious tale, and all the anomalies in his character are explained by his being that which you had contended, in your undigested work, it was quite possible for man to be, viz., mind and body without soul! You were startled by the more than usual resemblance between that mind, without soul, could not have attained, by ascribing to this prodigy broken memories of a former existence, demons attributed to him former proficience in evil magic. My friend, there is nothing here which your own study of morbid idiosyncrasies should not explain to you."

"So, then," said I, "you would reduce all that have affected my senses as realities into the effects of disease?"

"Indeed, I do not. I added, in a whimsical terrified by my own question, "do not physiologists agree in this: namely, that though illusory phantasms arising from the sane as well as the insane, the sane know that they are only illusions, and the insane do not?"

"Such a distinction," answered Faber, "is far too arbitrary and rigid for more than a very general and qualified acceptance. He would indeed be a bold physician who maintained that every man who believed he had really seen a ghost was of unsound mind. In Dr. Abercrombie's interesting account of spectral illusion he tells us of a servant girl who believed she saw at the foot of her bed the apparition of Curran in a sailor's jacket and an immense pair of whiskers.† No doubt the spectre was an illusion, and Dr. Abercrombie very ingeniously suggests the association of ideas by which the apparition was conjured up with the grotesque adjuncts of the jacket and the whiskers; but the servant girl, in believing the reality of the apparition, was certainly not insane. When I read in the American public journals* of "spirit manifestation," in which large numbers of persons of at least the average degree of education, declare that they have positively witnessed various phenomena much more extraordinary than all which you have confided to me, and arrive at once at the conclusion that they are thus put into direct communication with departed souls, I have no doubt that they are under an illusion; but I should be utterly unwarranted in supposing that, because they entertained that illusion, they were insane. And an impression made on the senses, long in mind suddenly are to excite one wonder, may be strengthened, if it take the form of a positive fact, by various coincidences which are accepted as corroborative testimony, yet which are, nevertheless, nothing more than coincidences found in everyday matters of business, but only emphatically noticed when we can exclaim, 'How astonishing!' In your case such coincidences have been, indeed, very signal, and might well aggravate the perplexities into which your imagination was thrown. Sir Philip Derval's murder, the missing casket, the existing fragment of the manuscript, in which a superstitious interest is already rendered by your expectation to find in it the key to the narrator's haunted powers, and his reason for the astounding demonstrations of the man whom you suspect to be his murderer; in all this there is much to confirm, nay, to cause an illusion, and for that very reason, when examined by what I have of evidence, in all this there is but additional proof that the illusion was—only illusion. Your affections enlisted so strongly in favor of Mary in its war on your reason. The girl you so passionately love developes, to your disquietude and fear, the visionary temperament which, at her age, is ever liable to fantastic ecstatic. She hears Margrave's song, which, you say, has a softness of tone that affects and thrills even you, who does not know the power; and of all music there is none so potential as that of the human voice. Thus, in some measure, charm and song are identical expressions; and even when a critic in our own sober newspapers ex-

* At the date of Faber's conversation with Allen Tarwith the so-called spirit manifestations had not passed from the credulous into the ridiculous. But if in the future world no doubt have remained the same.

† Abercrombie on the Intellectual Powers, p. 278 (25th edition). The author, not more to be admired for his intelligence than his candor, and who, in the course of his work, has given to the world thought than that to which he is higher degree of celebrity, relates a curious anecdote concerning the author between dreaming and spectral illusion, which he received from the gentleman to whom it occurred in conversation with himself. "Mr. Hall, not up from an evening, under considerable anxiety for one of his children, who was ill, had sat down in his chair, and, in a fruitful dream, in which the prominent figure was an immense kitten. He awoke in the night, got up to examine, by, and walked to a table which was in the middle of the room. He was then quite awake, and quite conscious of the articles around him; but close by the wall in the end of the apartment he distinctly saw the kitten making the same grimaces which he had seen in his dream; and this spectre continued visible for about half a minute." Now, a man who saw only a baboon would be quite ready to admit that it was only an optical illusion; but if, instead of a baboon, he had seen an intimate friend, and that friend, by some coincidence of time, had died about that date, he would be a very strong-minded man if he admitted, for the property of seeing his friend, any other natural solution which he would readily admit to receive a baboon.

* Beattie's Essay on Truth, part i. c. ii. § 3. The story of Simon Browne is to be found in The Adventurer.

not even in the house.* But instances of the facility with which phantasms once admitted repeat themselves to the senses are numberless. Many are recorded by Hibbert and Abercrombie, and every physician in extensive practice can add largely, from his own experience, to the list. Intense self-concentration is, in itself, a mighty magician. The magicians of the East inculcate the necessity of fast, solitude, and meditation for the due development of their imaginary powers. And I have no doubt with effect; because fast, solitude, and meditation—in other words, thought or fancy intensely concentred, will both raise apparitions and produce the invoker's belief in them. Spinello, striving to conceive the image of Lucifer for his picture of the Fallen Angels, was at last actually haunted by the Shadow of the fiend. Newton himself has been subjected to a phantom, though to him, son of Light, the spectrum presented was that of the sun! You remember the account that Newton gives to Locke of this visionary appearance. He says that 'though he had looked at the sun with his right eye only, and not with the left, yet his fancy began to make an impression upon his left eye as well as his right, for if he shut his right and looked upon a book or a cloud with his left eye, he could see the sun almost as plain as with the right, if he did but intend his fancy a little while on it;' nay, 'for some months after, as often as he began to meditate on the phenomena, the spectrum of the sun began to return, even though he lay in bed at midnight, with his curtains drawn!' Seeing, then, how any vivid impression once made will recur, what wonder that you should behold in your prison the Shining Shadow that had first startled you in a wizard's chamber when poring over the records of a murdered visionary? The more minutely you analyze your own hallucinations—pardon me the word—the more they assume the usual characteristics of a dream; contradictory, illogical, even in the marvels they represent. Can any two persons be more totally unlike each other, not merely as to form and years, but as to all the elements of character, than the Grayle of whom you read, or believe you read, and the Margrave in whom you evidently think that Grayle is existent still? The one represented, you say, as gloomy, saturnine, with vehement passions, but with an original grandeur of thought and will, consumed by an internal remorse; the other you paint to me as a joyous and wayward darling of Nature, acute yet frivolous, free from even the ordinary passions of youth, taking delight in innocent amusements, incapable of continuous study, without a single pang of repentance for the crimes you so fancifully impute to him. And now, when your suspicions, so romantically conceived, are dispelled by positive facts—now, when it is clear that Margrave neither murdered Sir Philip Derval nor abstracted the memoir, you still, unconsciously to yourself, draw on your imagination in order to excuse the suspicion your pride of intellect declines to banish, and suppose that this youthful sorcerer tempted the madman to the murder, the woman to the theft—"

"But you forget the madman said 'that he was led on by the Luminous Shadow of a beautiful youth,' that the woman said also that she was impelled by some mysterious agency."

"I do not forget those coincidences; but how your learning would dismiss them as nugatory were your imagination not disposed to exaggerate them! When you read the authentic histories of any popular illusion, such as the spurious inspirations of the Jansenist Convulsionaries, the apparitions that invaded convents, as deposed to in the time of Urban Grandier, the confessions of witches and wizards in places the most remote from each other, or, at this day, the tales of 'spirit-manifestation' recorded in half the towns and villages of America—do not all the superstitious impressions of a particular time have a common family likeness? What one sees another sees, though there has been no communication between the two. I can not tell you why these phantasms thus partake of the nature of an atmospheric epidemic; the fact remains incontestable. And, strange as may be the coincidence between your impressions of a mystic agency and those of some other brains not cognizant of the chimeras of your own, still, is it not simpler philosophy to say, 'They are coincidences of the same nature which made witches in the same epoch all tell much the same story of the broomsticks they rode and the sabbats at which they danced to the fiend's piping,' and there leave the matter, as in science we must leave many of the most elementary and familiar phenomena inexplicable as to their causes—is not this, I say, more philosophical than to insist upon an explanation which accepts the supernatural rather than leave the extraordinary unaccounted for?"

"As you speak," said I, resting my downcast face upon my hand, "I should speak to any patient who had confided to me the tale I have told to you."

"And yet the explanation does not wholly satisfy you? Very likely: to some phenomena there is, as yet, no explanation. Perhaps Newton himself could not explain to his own satisfaction why he was haunted at midnight by the spectrum of a sun; though I have no doubt that some later philosopher, whose ingenuity has been stimulated by Newton's account, has, by this time, suggested a rational solution of that enigma.* To return to your own case. I have offered such interpretations of the mystery that confound you, as appear to me authorized by physiological science. Should you adduce other facts which physiological science wants the data to resolve into phenomena, always natural, however rare, still hold fast to that saying of Goethe's, so simple, yet, when considered, so profound—'Mysteries are not always miracles.' And if all which physiological science comprehends in its experience wholly fails us, I may then hazard certain conjectures which, by acknowledging ignorance, is compelled to recognize the marvelous; for, as where knowledge enters the marvelous recedes, so where knowledge falters the marvelous advances. Yet still, even in those conjectures, I will distinguish the marvelous from the supernatural. But, for the present, I advise you to accept the guess that may best quiet the fevered imagination which any holder guess would only yet more excite."

"You are right," said I, rising proudly to the full height of my stature, my head erect and my heart defying. "And so, let this subject be renewed no more between us. I will brood over it no more myself. I regain again the unclouded realm of my human intelligence; and in that intelligence I mock the sorcerer and disdain the spectre."

"I SEATED MYSELF ON A BENCH, PLACED BETWEEN THE CLIPPED YEW-TREES," ETC.

* Sir David Brewster's Letters on Natural Magic, p. 39.

* Dr. Roget, Animal and Vegetable Physiology Considered, with reference to Natural Theology, Bridgewater Treatise, p. 564, 8vo, states, as a phenomenon which all of us may experience, that which Newton details as "strange," and offer a very rational explanation of it.

"When the impressions are very vivid (Dr. Roget is speaking of visual impressions) another phenomenon often takes place, namely, their subsequent recurrence after a certain interval, during which they are not felt, and quite independently of any renewed application of the cause which had originally excited them. (I mark by italics the words which more precisely coincide with Julius Fabre's explanations). If, for example, we look steadfastly at the sun for a second or two, and then immediately close our eyes, the image or spectrum of the sun remains for a long time present to the mind as if the light were still acting on the retina. It then gradually fades and disappears; but if we continue to keep the eyes shut, the same impression will, after a certain time, recur and again vanish: and this phenomenon will be repeated at intervals, the sensation becoming fainter at each renewal. It is probable that these reappearances of the image, after the light which produced the original impression has been withdrawn, are occasioned by spontaneous affections of the retina itself which are conveyed to the sensorium. In other cases where the impressions are less strong, the physical changes producing these changes are perhaps confined to the sensorium."

It may be said that the difference between the spectrum of the sun, for instance, and that which persisted after Newton's is, that we have already looked at the sun before his visionary appearance can be reproduced—and Alan Fewvick only imagines he has seen the apparition which repeats itself to his fancy. But according to Müller, the eye does behold the phantom which the mind conjures up, and, without here contesting a point on which other eminent physiologists however agree with Müller, no idea or image is at all events distinctly conveyed to the sensorium, and that idea or image the sensorium reproduces. Hence the Q. E. D. of Julius Faber's problem, the impression of an image once conveyed to the sense (no matter how) is liable to renewal, "independently of any renewed application of the cause which had originally excited it."

GENERAL HENRY W. BENHAM, U.S.A.—[SEE PAGE 799.]

GENERAL NELSON, OF KENTUCKY.—[SEE PAGE 799.]

SCENES AT AND AROUND THE ISLAND OF TYBEE, GEORGIA.

IN CHARLESTON, DECEMBER, 1860.

I.

"I WISH you'd stop playing that tune, Grace. Just now it's in very bad taste, to say the least of it."

The musician looked at her uncle with a funny expression of mirth, willfulness, and malice in her exceedingly pretty face, and said, her fingers saucily rattling over the keys and repeating the chorus of "The Star-Spangled Banner:"

"Why, it's a good tune. You fought for it in 1812."

"Yes; but things are very different now. Then we were united people, and an intelligent, energetic, fanatical section had not attempted—"

Spare the reader the rest of the sentence: the fulminations of a time-honored, generous, laid-back, kindly-natured, simple-hearted, but inveterately prejudiced South Carolinian of sixty would be productive of no exertions of spirit and waste of space; the imagination may easily supply them.

His niece meanwhile changed her tune to "Yankee Doodle."

"That's worse!" he said, irritated; "for of all the swivelling, nasal, singsong, whining, Yankee, Puritan—" Speech suppressed for previously given reasons. "Play 'Dixie' or the 'Marseillaise;' they're the tunes for our people now."

"That's so!" assented a tall, fair-haired young man, attired in a military uniform of coarse homespun gray, scantily trimmed with red worsted, who entered the room, his clanking steel scabbard striking at his heels; "you hear 'em every whar."

"Except over at Moultrie," added his cousin.

"Except over at Moultrie," he admitted, "and they won't be played thar long!"—speaking with a burr which proclaimed him from the up country.

"So, indeed!" echoed the old gentleman; "the honor and dignity of South Carolina demands that, after solemnly voting herself out of the Union, she shall remain at the pivot-gun of a sovereign State, taking immediate possession of her property in forts, arsenals, post-offices, public—" Suppression as before, in deference to the reader.

"I'll tell the officers so at Captain F——'s party," said the young lady, when her uncle had temporarily exhausted his eloquence.

"I wish you wouldn't go there," he answered, pettishly; "F—— is a Yankee, and I don't like him. All the leading quartermaster's at the fort are attributed to him, to D——, and their cowardly distrust of our people. Major Anderson, now, is a Southerner, and a gentleman—understands us—we shall have no trouble with him."

"So is half abolitionist, I reckon, since she came back from Boston and England," said the young volunteer, with a look of mingled shyness, admiration, and distrust at the brilliant beauty of his cousin.

"I'm not I" she exclaimed, with a flash of Carolinian hotspur, for to Southern ears the epithet applied to her always sounds like a taunt; "but the soldiers are only doing their duty, and if you're going to attack and murder that brave little garrison for that, I think it's a wicked and cowardly business—there!"

More platitudes on the part of the old gentleman.

"Grace," he inquired, presently, "have you accepted for this evening?"

"Yes, uncle!"

"Who goes with you?"

"Eva and Clare, and the Doctor—and you, if you like."

Mr. Allen shook his head negatively. "I have great respect for the officers at Fort Moultrie," he said, "with a few exceptions, and with them (as they probably with themselves) safely out of the false position in which a treacherous and imbecile government has placed them, but I can not visit Captain F——. You will do as you please. Only there was a little girl five years ago, by—before she went to Paris and London to finish her education and contract such French and English notions in what he kindly, wouldn't disobey them in any thing."

"Uncle," the girl remonstrated, "if you really don't wish me to go, I won't."

"No, no!" he said, good-naturedly, satisfied with having spoken, "go—go and enjoy yourself, only don't fall in love with any of the officers."

Grace reddened so suddenly and deeply at this, that had not the old gentleman bustled to the window for the purpose of igniting it and looking over the yellow water of Charleston harbor, he must have perceived it. As it was, he only drew in a deep inspiration of the mild, moist December morning, took his hat, told Grace to give him a match for his cigar, lit it, and strolled forth into the garden. His nephew remained. He had observed his cousin's discomposure.

"Grace," he asked, bluntly, "who's that United States captain who talked with you on board the Osiris, going down to the island yesterday?"

She took the blushing deeper than before.

"Him! Then I think—" He commenced impetuously but broke off, faltering and confused by the sudden concentration of two big, black, and exceedingly wide open eyes upon his own.

"Mark, if you have any thing to say to me, say it; but remember that I like to have my own way just as much as you do, and have an equal right to it!"

"Gracie, I'm jealous of the captain. I supplicioned him from the first!"

Grace laughed, tossed her curls, blushed again, and answered,

"Foolish fellow, what business is it of yours?"

The tall volunteer pulled at his blond mustache and bit it vindictively.

"Look here," he said, awkwardly, yet with a certain earnestness and simplicity about his rustic features which seemed to refine them for the occasion, "I've been toying to get your good-will for ever so long, Gracie, and I do think—"

"Then you oughtn't! You're a very good fellow, Mark, but we can't be any thing more to each other than cousins, as I have told you again and again, so don't say a word more about it. Recollect, too, I'm for the Union and Uncle Sam, and don't believe in secession. You ought to hate me for that!"

"Well, I can't be, it, though I do think it mean to go back on us and side with the Yankees against old Carolina. But you'll know better when we have whipped 'em—that is, if they oblige us to do it."

"Mark, I hate to hear you talk so; it's as wicked as it is foolish, and I'll tell you why. When I was a girl here, in Charleston, I used to think South Carolina the greatest place in the world, and that we were the finest, and best, and bravest people, just as you do now. So when I went to France and England I talked and bragged like a perfect goose, and was very mad when they called me a Yankee, as they do all of us from this side of the water; but I found they knew nothing about South Carolina (except in connection with slavery —I heard enough of that of course!), and cared as little. But every body understood and knew that America meant something, and believed we were a great people, even if they didn't like us. And now here we are trying to pull down all this, and to ruin the country just because Mr. Lincoln is to be President!"

"Don't want to be any ruin, I reckon. The Yankees are a no-fight people, and will back right square down when they see they've got to do it or fight."

"I don't believe it. Captain ——— says—" In her eagerness the girl forgot herself, the name escaping before she was aware of it. Mark Hardin consultaneously gave vent to an expression of anger, which if not an oath was very like one.

"See here!" he said, striding up to her with a lowering brow, and looking into her conscious, confused, yet resolute face, "you've said enough now, if I hadn't been on the lookout before. You've told Captain ——— if he wants you to 'wave me—that's all!"

And he strode, rather melodramatic ally, from the room, his long sword clanking at his heels. The girl gazed after him at first defiantly, and then with a changed expression, as she shook out her hand and mused deeply. Presently her eyes followed the direction of her thoughts; she rose, walked to a window, and looked forth in the direction of Sullivan's Island.

II.

THAT evening—it was the twenty-sixth of December, 1860—the lights of a neat wooden villa not far from the walls of Fort Moultrie shone out brilliantly into the raw, moist evening, the shadows of graceful and manly forms flitted across the illuminated curtains, and the sound of music, song, mirth, and laughter awoke the ordinary quiet echoes of the sandy island. Captain F—— of the U. S. A.—the "Yankee" officer disparaged by Grace's uncle—in other words, a brave and loyal Vermonter, whose known hostility to the designs of the secessionists had rendered him more of their hatred, was holding revel in honor of the Christmas time. I need not say that my heroine made one of the party.

The house, a summer one, like most of its class, has long windows reaching to the floor, some of which are open for the better ventilation of this heated room. Now and then certain of the guests emerge from the hall-room on to the wooden piazza. Two of these, after lingering for some time, descend the shallow flight of steps to a neighboring thicket, horrent with the green spikes of the tropical-looking Spanish bayonet, and from thence saunter into and along the sandy road. They are male and female, the lady small and slight in figure, the gentleman wearing the uniform of a captain in the United States Army.

"Gracie," he says, tenderly arranging a shawl about her head and shoulders, and looking lovingly down into the big black eyes, "you mustn't ask why? Take my word for it and promise."

"Promise what?"

"That whatever befalls me you will credit me with having loved you dearly; that nothing shall make you distrust this; that, so long as you have no reason to doubt my love, faithful, true, true, you will be true to me, in the faith that some day you will become mine own dear wife!"

"George," she says, as though some danger were hanging over you?"

"You know our position here!" And he shrugged his shoulders.

"Is that all? Is there any thing imminent?"

"We think the Charlestonians are going to attack us. We are pretty sure of it, and have got some intimation of the time and plan resolved upon. And we shall do our duty."

The girl clung impetuously to his arm. "It's very dreadful," she said, "for Americans to kill Americans; but—what's that?"

They had reached the picturesque cluster of palmetto-trees growing by the road-side, and known as "the Five Indians." Grace's exclamation was caused by a figure emerging from their shadow, striding into the road, and confronting them.

"Captain ——," said Mark Harding, "I want the favor of a few last words with you in private, if your can spare the time."

The Captain looked surprised, exchanged a few words with his companion, who, apprehensive and indignant, had uttered an exclamation of alarm at her cousin's appearance, and followed his example in stepping a little aside.

"Well, Sir?"

"Will you fight?"

Captain ——— slightly elevated his eyebrows at the inquiry, and responded:

"I am a soldier, Sir."

"When will you give me a meeting, then?"

"If you have no objection to answering the question, I should like to know what cause of quarrel you have with me."

"You are a ——— Yankee, and fond of my cousin Grace. There!"

"A sufficient reason! I suspect you ought to sympathize with me in the latter part of it. Indeed of being so, you want to kill me, eh?"

"Unless you'll give her up right off!"

"I shall not submit to be dictated to by any body in such a matter, least of all by a person of your appearance and manners."

"Then you've got to fight. I'm bound to fix you to that, though I know you Yankees 'll talk yourselves out of any thing, if you only get a chance."

"I will fight you whenever you please except now. I suppose you don't want Miss Allen to be a looker-on?"

"Will you meet me here to-night when the ball breaks up? I'll wait for you."

"Without seconds?"

"I don't want 'em, just as you please. I can raise a friend if you want to bring one."

"You know that, as the challenged person, I have the right to the choice of weapons?"

The young South Carolinian looked puzzled. Like most of his class he possessed very crude ideas as to the etiquette of the duello, connecting it indefinitely with the use of revolvers and bowieknives. He assented, however.

"I name swords, then, and will endeavor to give you a lesson which may be of value to you as a soldier—as I see you are ambitious of becoming one."

Mark Harding, of the Palmetto Guard, Edgefield, South Carolina, had as little practical acquaintance with the use of the weapon which he wore so proudly in his belt as with the sword at he had with the harpoon or the int-gral calculus, but his black mould have induced his acceptation of a proposition to be taught how to hold with his opponent, then to walk over a precipice. So he bowed with as much dignity as he could muster, and would have stride away if Grace had not called to him imperatively.

"Well?" he said, ungraciously.

"I've got a few very very word you have been saying—I know it's something quarrelsome—I'll never speak to you again."

The young Carolinian found something to himself, turned on his heel, and was gone. None the less endeared to each other from what had occurred, and conversing together, the lovers returned to Captain F——'s Christmas party.

III.

"You can't keep the appointment, it's to be done to-night, George."

"To-night!"

"Immediately. I'm free to tell you now that the hop was only a blind. The men will be in the island no half an hour. The cannon-cheers they only eleven of them pointing toward Sumter—are already spiked and the flag-staff cut down, so that when you next hear any of their miserable Secession rags upon it in place of the dear old Stars and Stripes, which, please God, shall to-morrow defy them from the top of the strongest fort in the harbor. In another half hour the gun-carriages will be blazing; the Major and I have seen to it ourselves. Now you understand immediately. Let the blockhead wait, or defer his quarrel with you until they attack us, if they dare to do it. We have not a moment to lose."

IV.

ALL Charleston was frantic next morning with the news of the secret evacuation of Fort Moultrie by Major Anderson and his garrison. Then and throughout that day and the succeeding, of rejubilation, of expectation, of chronic alarm, anger, and vainglory which marked that memorable time, perhaps the most important man in the rebellious city was Mark Harding.

Three weeks afterward the columns of a New York newspaper contained the following paragraph in a letter from its Charleston correspondent:

"All private visits to Fort Sumter are strictly forbidden. For the present this order includes Chaplain, the Rev. Dr. ——, and three young ladies were recently expelled from Charleston. The lives of Anderson and his command are in the fort in a pleasure-boat, spending an hour or two in the society of the officers, friends of the party. It is said that the revered gentleman and ladies have proceeded to Washington."

V.

"AT last, dearest!"

"At last! I feared I should never see you again."

"And I, too, for all the long, dreary weeks, and particularly at the close of them. It was really pretty artillery practice on the forts, I assure you. Do you know that that ambulance coach of yours was exceedingly energetic during the attack? I understand he wanted to lead a storming party in a hollow bomber or open boat, in which case we should have been obliged to have blown both him and his enterprising friends out of the water. I am glad they compelled him to retreat upon us, for I shouldn't like to shed blood akin to that which flows in your veins, Grace. I have no doubt he was actuated by motives of personal hostility toward one particular 'cowardly Yankee,' who disappointed him by not keeping a certain nocturnal appointment on Sullivan's Island."

"Foolish Mark! he talked horribly about it, and made my life miserable, until I was almost glad when they sent me away."

"And your uncle, dearest? What did he say?"

"He was a member of the Vigilance Committee, and thought very angrily, seemed as wretched as myself. He loves me so, that I think he would like to be here too, if he weren't for deserting South Carolina, as I call it."

"I'm sorry he's not here to give you away, Grace!"

"George!"

"Dearest, you are so long in the world now; I love you best of any ——— in it, and claim you for that love's sake. I shall be ordered on duty in a fortnight—let me have a wife bound to pray for me! One dear old Yankee is here, you know, and you owe him a job for getting him expatriated. I dare say Miss Eva and Clare will look very pretty as bridesmaids!"

VI.

WE are in the debatable land between the two armies in Virginia, near the outskirts of the rebel camp. It is a calm, moonlight night in autumn, and the "sweet regent of the sky" sails aloft in unclouded splendor, silvering with her pure effulgence, or hiding in broad deep shadow, the hideous features of devastation which war has stamped upon the once beautiful landscape. The dreariness, windowless, and dismantled farm-houses—the blackened remains of those which have been destroyed by fire—the fenceless and trampled gardens and fields, all scored with unaccustomed wheeltracks and footprints of men and horses—the fetid water-pools in the hitherto pure cheery waters—the carcasses of steeds, which lie putrefying by the road-side, no longer intrude themselves upon the sickened senses in such disgusting quantity. Yet the scene is otherwise than peaceful. From the woody covert of a little copse bordering a field of maize, which has been trodden into a pulpy jungle of rotting corn-stalks, comes the scattering report of musketry, the sharp crack of the rifle, and the solemn, continuous sound of the revolver. Out from frequent, bloody, nameless skirmishes characterizing the present war is in progress, having originated in the surprisal and attack upon a piece of rebel troops by a daring little party of United States riflemen.

Hotly the ground is contested, inch by inch, but the alarm has been communicated to the Union troops in the rear, and dreading the arrival of reinforcements, the rebels are compelled to retreat, half of their number having already bit the dust. The fight slackens until it is a mere duel between a few desperate marksmen on both sides, frequently apparently preferring death or captivity to flight.

One of these, a tall, muscular young fellow, with fair hair and florid mustache, and strikingly handsome if with more fury than skill with a long cavalry sabre, finds it shivered in his grasp by the blow of a tomahawk, and throws away the useless hilt as a bayonet thrust through his sword-arm into his side.

"Don't kill him, Rob!" cries the officer in command of the Union party, as the man is about to repeat his thrust with fatal intent. "Yield yourself our prisoner, Sir, and your life shall be spared."

The officer's words are in English, and he has having been lost in the mêlée, and the moonlight strikes full upon his countenance. And Mark Harding, with an oath of astonishment and hatred, despite his wounded sword-arm, draws his revolver and fires its two remaining charges at his preserver thrice and misses.

"Bayonet him!" is the cry, and a storm of execration and rage rises round the wounded Carolinian. It is with the greatest difficulty, and the prompted enforcement of his authority, both by voice and gesture, that the officer can save the justly-doomed life of his former betrothed.

"You would have slain me," he said; "now see how a Yankee will revenge himself on one who has no title to his surrender but his relationship to her who was Grace Allen! You are our prisoner, but your hurt shall be seen to as soon as possible, and I will do all I can toward obtaining your liberty by procuring your exchange for one of our men. Fight against us again, if you will; but remember the lesson of to-night. Boys, let us go back to the camp."

THE RAT-HOLE SQUADRON.

WE present our readers, on page 789, with a sketch of the fleet of OLD WEATHERS, as seen by the brig Curtillan, Nov. 21, in lat. 38° 53', long. 72° 40'. The fleet is comprised of old whalers, which have been purchased by the Government for the purpose of effectively blockading the Southern ports. By this means the rebels will be frustrated in their little excursions on the high seas, and our naval and Coast Commissioners will find their way out upon the blue waters to be caught by our gallant naval officers.

Among this fleet is the old ship Ceres, whose history is well worthy of record here. She was formerly an armed store-ship belonging to the British navy. During the Revolutionary war she came over loaded with supplies for the British army. A storm coming on, she sought shelter in Long Island Sound. It became known to the Yankee fishermen that she was in their waters, and they determined to capture her. Accordingly they formed a company of nearly one hundred stout-hearted and hardy men, and put out into the Sound. Shortly after they discovered the ship, and they discovered the Britisher in the distance. All hands save an elderly man and three men and one boy went into the boats and pulled manfully for the ship armed. By the little craft stood still she reached the fishing-ground, where they threw out their lines and commenced operations as if nothing. The storeship altered her course and ran down toward the fisherman, and fired a gun, and the Yankee boys rowed lustily toward the ship. As soon as she came within hail they were ordered to come alongside, which they did after some murmuring. The fish which they had caught were transferred to the deck of the store-ship, and carried over to the other side of the vessel, away from the side where the schooner lay. Curiosity prompted the British sailors to crowd around the fishermen with their fish. In the mean time one of the boys took a knife and cut the cable of the boat, and it striking the schooner's deck gave the signal for the men in the hold to come up. This was but the work of a moment. Then the Britisher could arm his crew or recover from the surprise his ship was a prize. The ship was taken into New Bedford, where she was discharged of her stores, and when the war was over she was converted into a whaler, and she has been employed in that business from that time to within a year past. She now goes to assist in sealing up one of the Southern ports. The Ceres was a very fast sailer, and has been ordinarily a very lucky ship. But now her sailing days are over, and she will find a white sandy bed on which to lie until broken up by the storms and tides of ocean.

GENERAL HENRY W. BENHAM.

THIS officer, whose portrait we give on page 796, entered West Point from Connecticut, and graduating in due course with the highest honors of his class, was assigned to the Engineer Corps of the Army. For years he was engaged in the usual routine of repairing and constructing fortifications in various parts of the country until the Mexican war arose, in which he served with zeal; and being wounded at Buena Vista, was breveted Captain.

At a later date he held for some years the charge of the United States Coast Survey Bureau, at Washington, under its distinguished chief, Professor Bache; also seizing an opportunity for liberal and profitable improvement by a brief trip to Europe. Soon after his return he took charge of the fortifications at New Bedford, and at a later date, and for several years, was engaged with the construction of the defenses of the great commercial emporium—New York—at Sandy Hook, where he successfully overcame engineer difficulties in Rond.

At the first outbreak of this War of Secession Captain Benham applied for active service, and was assigned by his General—the present distinguished Commander of the Army—to the charge of fortifying the prominent military point—Cairo, Illinois. He there called attention to the importance of Bird's Point, as bearing on the defense of Cairo. But about the middle of May, under General McClellan's orders, Captain Benham ascended early to Western Virginia, as chief of the staff of General Morris, who is himself known as a high graduate of West Point. As chief engineer of the army he at once applied himself to the study of the country—its roads, resources, and obstacles.

Finally, while in command of the advanced body of General Morris's troops, Captain Benham effected his crowning effort, the victory at Carrick's Ford, which it is known resulted in the death of the brave Garnett, and the complete rout of his army.

In September the brave General Rosecrans had his division and the battle of Carnifex took place. Here Benham fought conspicuously on the front, and was eager, if General Rosecrans had thought it prudent to consent, to bring on a general engagement, which, however, was prevented until morning; but in the night General Floyd, satisfied with his defeat, cautiously retreated.

The zealous services of Captain Benham through his whole career, and his military capacity, have attracted the attention of the Government, and he has been created Brigadier-General of Volunteers.

GENERAL NESON, U.S.A.

We publish on page 796 a portrait of GENERAL NELSON, of Kentucky, who is now commanding a brigade of United States forces. General Nelson is a native of Kentucky, and served in the United States Navy for many years. On the outbreak of the rebellion he offered his services to the Government in any capacity in which they might be required; and was accordingly intrusted with the delicate and important duty of introducing arms into his native State to arm the Union men. This task was performed successfully, in spite of various obstacles arising from the hostility of the Executive and a large number of the leading men of the State. General Nelson was then authorized to recruit troops for the Government service in Kentucky. He worked so well that he was soon at the head of a regiment of well-drilled troops, and soon afterward of a brigade. His latest exploit was the attack and dispersion of a rebel corps d'armée near Piketon, Kentucky.

BEAUFORT, SOUTH CAROLINA.

OUR special artist at Hilton Head, South Carolina, has been to Beaufort, and sends us the sketches which we reproduce on pages 788 and 789. He writes as follows concerning them:

BEAUFORT AND ITS SCENES.

The leading-places for the steamers which formerly ran between Savannah and Charleston is now used by our troops as their place of debarkation. Among the prominent buildings is the Arsenal, which was built by the United States Government, and a part of which was used as a lighthouse under the old regime. It has since been put by the secessionists to various military purposes.

On the arrival of the United States steamship M'Clellan, Captain Gray, she was surrounded by boats loaded with fruits, sweet potatoes, chickens, etc., gathered by the slaves, who imprisoned the Captain to purchase their small lots of produce. Captain Sautlin, the quartermaster of the Division, accompanied the M'Clellan to Beaufort, and succeeded in landing on board and in camp about 100,000 feet of valuable lumber.

The street in the sketch displays the prison, etc., and which, like all the other buildings, was deserted by the whites.

The rebel look-out was in the belfry of the Baptist Church, which commanded a view of the town, river, shell road, etc. On being visited by our party an empty decanter, but a very recent picture of water was found.

The Raising of the Flag was performed by an officer of the M'Clellan, whose joke is well known to all New Yorkers.

THE FINAL HOME OF THE BRAVE WHO FELL IN THE ENGAGEMENT OFF HILTON HEAD.

The bravery shown on the 7th of November are buried in a beautiful sequestered spot near the Post, marked now occupied as the head-quarters of the Division. The graves are in the midst of live oaks, palmettos, magnolias, vines, wild roses, and tropical flowers. Neat head-boards mark the resting-place of each, the most prominent of which is the grave of John M. Whittemore, Assistant-Engineer of the Mohawk, the only officer killed, who fell while standing by the bell-pull of the engine, and heroically cheering to the last the attacking party. He was an Instantaneously, as he uttered his last words.—Give it to them, boys! He was born in Cumberland, Androscoggin county, and was the son of the late Rev. Thos. Whittemore.

THE LIGHT-HOUSE AT MARTIN'S INDUSTRY, OFF THE ENTRANCE TO PORT ROYAL, SOUTH CAROLINA.

The light-ship which is to be placed off the entrance to Port Royal harbor is of the ordinary size, and will display two bright white lights, which can be seen at a distance of from twelve to fifteen miles. She will be armed with four rifled cannon, and, to prevent the rebels from boarding her, nettings will be placed around her, above the rail. Her crew will consist of about twenty persons in addition to the light-keepers. On each side the words "Martin's Industry" will be painted, as she will be placed on the edge of a shoal before that name. When in position this will be the only light in use on the Southern coast.

IMPORTANT FACTS.—Constant writing for six months is done cheaper with Gold Pens than with Steel Pens; therefore, it is economy to use Gold Pens.

The Gold Pen remains unchanged by years of continued use, while the Steel Pen is ever changing by corrosion and wear; therefore, perfect uniformity of writing is obtained only by the use of the Gold Pen.

The Gold Pen is always ready and reliable, while the Steel Pen must be often consciously and a new one selected; therefore, there is great saving of time in the use of the Gold Pen.

Gold is capable of receiving any degree of elasticity, so that the Gold Pen is exactly adapted to the hand of the writer; therefore, the muscles of the hand and arm are not injured, as is known to be the case by the use of Steel Pens.

See "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword," in the next column.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

AGENTS WANTED—to sell Yale's Flag of our Union and Military and Soldiers' Packages. Agents who are now selling imitations, put up by other parties, are respectfully requested to send us their address and we will forward them a sample with circular, which will at once convince them that they can make more money and give better satisfaction by selling our packages than any others in market. Address J. W. YALE, Proprietor, Metropolitan Gift Book Store, Syracuse, New York.

GENTLE DORA!—DARLING MAGGIE! Mrs. Mary J. Holmes's Popular Stories.
DORA DEANE
and
MAGGIE MILLER.
In one neat 12mo Volume. 400 pages. Price $1.

Mrs. Holmes endeavors to touch the heart, to take what is pure and excellent and hold it up to the reader in contrast with what is vile and deceptive. And in that she excels. The Brindle, we are sure, will thank her heartily for these books, and rejoice with that religious critic—Boston, for they are entertaining as well as instructive.

Also ready, uniform in style with the above, New Editions of

LENA RIVERS. 416 pages. 12mo. Illustrated $1
HOMESTEAD ON THE HILLSIDE. 380 pages, 12mo. 1
MEADOW BROOK. 12mo. Illustrated. 390 pages, 12mo. 1
COUSIN MAUDE AND ROSAMOND 1
Sent free of postage on receipt of price by
C. M. SAXTON, Publisher,
No. 25 Park Row, New York.

REVOLVER.

A MOST POWERFUL ARM, WHICH CAN BE carried constantly about the person without inconvenience or danger. Length four inches, scarcely more than that of the barrels. It is the most compact, safe, and powerful Pocket Revolver ever made; weighs only eight ounces, charged with cartridges, which can be purchased in any city or large village, and are barrel rifled, gain twist and sighted. Will penetrate one inch of pine at one hundred and fifty yards.

Retail price, Plated, with 100 cartridges, $10 00
" " Unplated, " " 9 00
Trade supplied. T. W. MOORE, 495 Pearl, N. Y.

Cloaks! Cloaks!

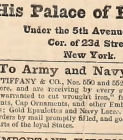
BRODIE
has made his
Grand Opening
for
Fall and Winter Cloaks,
at his
OLD STAND,
300 Canal Street,
and
His Palace of Fashion,
Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,
Cor. of 23d Street,
New York.

To Army and Navy Officers.

TIFFANY & CO., Nos. 550 and 552 Broadway, have in store, and are receiving by every steamer, SWORDS, "warranted to cut wrought iron," from Solingen; Pistols, Cap Grenades, and other Embroideries, from Paris; Gold Epaulettes and Navy Lace, &c., from London. Orders by mail promptly filled, and goods forwarded to all parts of the loyal States.

IMPORTANT INFORMATION to all women afflicted with female weakness, or uterine disease, or irregularities, will be received by inclosing a postage stamp to JOSHUA F. BRIDGE, M.D., Resident Physician Graefenberg Company, No. 2 Read Street, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Quicuet will force them to grow rapidly in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, on receipt of address. R. G. GRAHAM, P. O. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.



A New Cartridge Revolver.
Carrying Six Balls (84 to the pound). Any one wanting a superior Pocket or Belt Arm will find this to be the best in the country. Price $12. Circular sent. A. W. HARRIS, Phila.

MERWIN & BRAY, Agents, 245 Broadway, N. Y.

COMMERCIAL TREATISES sent to Merchants, Lawyers, Bankers, Mechanics, Farmers, &c., &c., on receipt of 25 cents. Large commission, favorable business. Circular sent. A. W. HARRIS, Phila.

"The PEN is Mightier than the Sword."

THE GOLD PEN—THE BEST OF ALL PENS.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS.

The Best Pens in the World.

On receipt of any of the following sums in cash or poststamps, the subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens, selecting the same according to description.

GOLD PENS, WITHOUT CASES.

For 25 cents, the Single Pen; for 38 cents, the Lucky Pen; for 50 cents, the Always-Ready Pen; for 75 cents, the Elegant Pen; and for $1 25, the Excelsior Pen.

The sizes are, Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For 50 cents, the Single Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 25, the Elegant Pen; and for $1 50, the Excelsior Pen. These are well-finished, good writing Gold Pens, with Iridosmin Points, but whose wear of every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens.

The sizes are, No. 1, "Number," and "Quality" are stamped on the following Pens, and the Points are warranted for six months, except against accident. The numbers run as follows: No. 1, being the smallest, No. 6 the largest, adapted for the pocket; No. 4 the smallest, and No. 10 the largest American Gold Pen, for the Gold-Long and medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Nos. 3, 4, and 5, and made only of first quality. The engravings are fac similes of the sizes and styles.

GOLD PENS, WITH SILVER EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For 75 cents, a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 25, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 50, a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 75, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 90, a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 25, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 50, a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 75, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $3, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $3 50, a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

GOLD PENS, WITH SILVER CASES, IN SILVER-MOUNTED EBONY HOLDERS.

For $2, a No. 4 Pen; for $2 50, a No. 5 Pen; for $3 75, a No. 6 Pen; for $3 50, a No. 7 Pen.

For $4, a No. 7 Pen; for $5, a No. 9 Pen; and for $6, a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridosmin Points, carefully selected, and none of this quality are sold with the slightest imperfection which skill and the closest scrutiny can detect.

The "2d Quality" are superior to any Pens made by him previous to the year 1861.

The "3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity, and Fine Writing Qualities (the only true considerations) any Gold Pens made elsewhere.

In ordering Pens, he begs leave to state that, as a habitual, previous to operating his New and Patented Machinery, which have been made at Good Writing and Durable Pens, for the prices, had the Gold been furnished gratuitously.

Address A. MORTON,
No. 47 Maiden Lane, New York.

FOR SALE by all dealers in this line throughout the country.

Any one sending a single letter post-stamp will receive a circular with the above cuts and logs above referred to.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS. — (SUPERIOR Patent), 659 Broadway, New York.
Send for a Circular.

COOLEY'S Cabinet Printing Office for small Printers and Amateurs, the best thing out. Send for Circulars. J. G. COOLEY & CO., 1 Spruce Street, N. Y.

!!!For Beautiful White Teeth!!!
Use Thurston's Tooth Powder.
FOR HARD AND HEALTHY GUMS,
Use Thurston's Tooth Powder.
Price 25 cents.
F. C. WELLS & CO., 110 Franklin Street, N. Y.

The Current and Back Numbers of Harper's Weekly can be had of J. F. HUNT, Wholesale and Retail News Agent, Masonic Hall, Fifth St., Pittsburg, Pa.

A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agents F. C. WELLS & CO., 110 Franklin St., New York. Sold by Apothecaries everywhere.

500 Agents Wanted!
Something New! Patent Wood Holder, made of The New Gold, and 5 other curious inventions. Address (send stamp) SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—A Clergyman having cured his son of Consumption in its worst stages, after being given up to die by the most celebrated physicians, desires to make known the mode of cure, which proves successful in every case to those afflicted with Coughs, Colds, and Consumption, and will send a Receipt of charge to all who desire it and will forward him their address. Address
DANIEL ADEE, 375 Pearl Street, New York.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to
HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

AT GIMBREDE'S Stationery Depot and Card Engraving Establishment, 568 Broadway, a Box of Invited Note Paper and Envelopes six varieties, furnished free of charge on receipt of Three Dollars.

588 Broadway, Gimbrede's Wedding Cards. Unsurpassed for Beauty and Finish.

The New England Family Newspaper.

The Springfield Republican
for 1862.

Daily, Tri-Weekly, and Weekly.

THE SPRINGFIELD (MASS.) REPUBLICAN may not hesitate to claim position as the first and most distinctive of New England Journals. In the energy and adaptation of its news; in the choice of its subjects for editorial discussion; in the manner in which it treats them; in the great variety of its contents; and in the prominence it gives to practical, moral, and religious questions to literature, to art and theoretical science, and to every branch of general and domestic interest to the people of New England, the REPUBLICAN stands unapproached and unapproachable.

Among the political newspapers of the Republican order, it is, and is among of New England News, arranged by counties and towns, and in the comprehensive and wonderful Review of the Week; Special Correspondence of a high character from Boston, New York, and Washington; a weekly review and summary of all Religious Movements; original papers on the industrial resources of new ideas and inventions in Science and Mechanics; a weekly article on Books, Authors, and Art; and an abundance of original literary articles, both of prose and poetry, with carefully-selected miscellanies from the freshest local and magazine.

The editorial corps of The Republican number six individuals, including Dr. J. G. Holland, the popular "Timothy Titcomb" of literary and humorous fame.

TERMS.—For the Daily—one copy, one year, $6. Ten copies to one address, one year, $50.

For the TRI-WEEKLY (published on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday morning)—one copy, one year, $3; ten copies to one address, $25.

For the WEEKLY REPUBLICAN—one copy six months, $1; one year, $2; two copies to one address, one year, $3. To clubs of twenty copies to one address, one year, $7; ten copies, $12; twenty copies, $20.

$\frac{1}{2}$ All orders must be accompanied with the cash.

Specimen copies sent on application.

SAMUEL BOWLES & COMPANY,
Publishers, Springfield, Mass.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, and other places, should be sent by the Adams Express, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Charges charged low rates.

$150 PER MONTH made by enterprising Agents selling the DOWNEY SHUTTLE and SHIELD for hand sewing. Protects the finger and makes a beautiful stitch. Sample sent on receipt of 25 cents. Address A. H. DOWNER, No. 447 Broadway.

Personal.—For free cerulean and honorable business at a liberal salary, write HARDIN BROTHERS, Boston, Mass.

Card to Country News-Dealers.

The New York Mercury.

In consequence of the refusal of ROSS & TOUSEY to furnish like of their country agents to the publishers of THE MERCURY,—who desired to supply the newsmen with their paper at the same quantities of posters, show-cards, and circulars that are forwarded from our office to agents,—we have made arrangements to supply the New York wholesale dealers,—those gentlemen have ceased to be the Agents of the Proprietors of THE NEW YORK MERCURY.

The trade will continue to be supplied, as always heretofore, through the more enterprising-packing establishments of

H. DEXTER & CO.,
HAMILTON, JOHNSON & FARRELLY,
JOHN F. FEEKS & CO.,
L. N. SHEAR & CO.,
WILLIAM SKELLY,
OKIE, DAYTON & JONES,
SAMUEL YATES, and
C. M. SAXTON.

as well as direct from the office of the publishers and proprietors.

CAULDWELL, SOUTHWORTH & WHITNEY,
Nos. 46 and 48 Ann Street, New York.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT TO HIRE AGENTS in every County at $75 per month and expenses, to sell a new and cheap Sewing Machine. Address (with stamp) S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

Commencement of Volume XXIV

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

For December, 1861.

Its unparalleled circulation from month to month, and a constant demand for back Numbers and complete Sets, evince that HARPER'S MAGAZINE meets the wants of the great body of intelligent readers. No change will therefore be made in its general character. The Magazine contains at least twice the amount of matter of the leading English Monthlies. It is therefore enabled to present the best productions of American Novelists and Essayists, besides furnishing a larger amount of original matter than is given in any other Magazine of the day. Each Number contains a large amount of reading matter, and in ordinary octavo volume, with abundant Pictorial Illustrations of every subject in which the Artist can aid the Writer. More than Seven thousand Illustrations have already appeared in the Magazine.

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Any Volume, comprising Six Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight at the charge of the p' chaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rate. Twenty-three Volumes, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to November, 1861, are now ready.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE DANGEROUS PLAYMATE—A SINGULAR INSTANCE OF FASCINATION.
That Innocent Infant JOHNNY BULL giving Aid and Comfort to the Reptile.

A SHORT BLANKET.

OLD SECESH. "While I cover my Neck, I expose my Feet, and if I cover my Feet, I expose my Neck. Ugh!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Christmas Week among the American Slaves!

Ready Tuesday, December 10th.

Beadle's Christmas Story.

Maum Guinea,

And Her Plantation "Children;"

Or, CHRISTMAS WEEK AMONG THE AMERICAN SLAVES.

By MRS. METTA V. VICTOR,

Author of "Alice Wilde."

LOUISIANA PLANTATION LIFE DURING THE HOLIDAYS is seized upon by the author to weave around the barbarous, night-dancing, story-telling and love-making of the Slaves a romance embodying all the tragedy and pathos, the sorrow and enjoyment, the happiness and humor of Slave Life and its two-fold experiences. The negro and white characters introduced are all "representative"—each illustrative of some peculiar phase of a strange history.

200 pages complete, beautifully illustrated. Price Twenty Cents. For sale by all News Dealers, Bookstores, and Army Sutlers, &c. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers
141 William Street, N. Y.

A New Frontier Story.

By the Author of "Seth Jones," &c.
(Beadle's Dime Novels, No. 23.)

Irona;

Or, LIFE ON THE SOUTHWEST BORDER.

Price Ten Cents. For sale by all News Dealers and Army Sutlers. Address
BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.

Head-Quarters for Jewelry.

A full assortment of all kinds appropriate for the Jewelry and Gift Jewelry Business. Dyeing can order the amount they would like to have sent, and pay the Express, and have the privilege of retaining any thing they may wish to. W. A. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, New York.

Chapped Hands, Face, Lips, &c.

Certain cure and preventive. HEGEMAN & CO.'S CAMPHORICE WITH GLYCERINE will keep the hands soft in the coldest weather. Sold by druggists generally. Price 25 cents; sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.
HEGEMAN & CO., Chemists and Druggists, N. Y.

Devlin & Co.

We are now in receipt of large importations of choice

WINTER OVERCOATINGS,

FRENCH CASSIMERES,

NEW STYLES VESTINGS,

WINTER UNDERWEAR.

And have also added largely to our superior stock of ready made

WINTER CLOTHING,

All of which we are selling at exceedingly low prices.

DEVLIN & CO.,

Corner of Broadway and Warren and Grand Streets.

CHOICE FURS. No. 49 Broadway.

Opening at Retail ofan entirely new stock of Sable, Mink and other choice FURS, in the most desirable styles, much below usual prices.

S. GOKEL,
Practical Furrier.

Ladies are invited to call and examine the splendid stock of dress, rare and choice fancy hats now open at TERRY'S, 267 Broadway, New York.

AGENTS WANTED—To sell something entirely new and original—none others like them—the Union Prize Stationery and Breech Package. Each package contains a beautiful and correct engraving of GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, 6x10.
75 Valuable Receipts.
6 White Fine Envelopes, in colors.
6 Ladies' White Fine Envelopes, in colors.
6 Buff Envelopes.
6 sheets Commercial Note Paper.
6 Sheets Fine Ladies' Note Paper.
6 Sheets Ladies' Billet Paper.
1 Accommodation Penholder.
2 Fine Steel Pens.
1 Fine Pencil.
1 Sheet Blotting Paper.
1 Gift of Valuable Jewelry.
Retail price for the whole, twenty-five cents. Agents wanted in every city, town, and village. Call on or address, enclosing stamp,
RICKARDS & CO.,
102 Nassau Street, New York.

Cardigan Jackets

A

Large Variety, at

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York City.

Skates 65 cents to $5 dollars. Everything in the skating line cheapest goods to suit all ages, sexes, ladies, and gents. LOCKWOOD & WALKER, 464 Broadway, N. Y.
Out of town orders attended to carefully and promptly.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

Splendid List!!

Of Articles to be Sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Case Watches	$100,00 each
100 " Watches	60,00 each
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	25,00 each
500 Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches	15,00 each
5000 Vest and Neck Chains	5,00 to 10,00 each
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5,00 to 10,00 each
3000 " " "	5,00 to 8,00 each
3000 Cameo Brooches	4,00 to 6,00 each
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4,00 to 6,00 each
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4,00 to 6,00 each
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches	4,00 to 6,00 each
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4,00 to 6,00 each
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4,00 to 6,00 each
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4,00 to 6,00 each
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Ear Drops	4,00 to 8,00 each
5100 Gilard Bruzel Pins	2,00 to 5,00 each
3000 Watch Keys	2,00 to 6,00 each
5000 Pair and Ribbon Slides	2,00 to 6,00 each
5000 Sets of Bosom Studs	2,00 to 6,00 each
5000 Sleeve Buttons	2,00 to 6,00 each
7000 Plain Rings	2,00 to 5,00 each
7000 Stone Set Rings	2,00 to 6,00 each
7000 Lockets	2,00 to 10,00 each
10000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5,00 to 10,00 each
10000 Gold Pens, 14 Carats and Warr'd, 4,00 to 5,00 each (with Silver Mounted Holders.)

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, will be placed in envelopes and sealed. These envelopes will be sent by mail, or delivered as called for, without regard to choice. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1, eleven for $2, thirty for $5, sixty-five for $10, and one hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

W. FORSYTH & CO.,

193 Broadway, corner of Fulton Street, New York.

N.B. We wish it distinctly understood that all articles of jewelry not giving perfect satisfaction can be returned and the money will be refunded.

Snow's Pure Confectionery,

200 Kinds, 623 Broadway, N. Y. Wholesale and Retail. Dealers enclose stamp for catalogue and prices.

WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Marriage Cards and Envelopes, by A. DENAREST, Engraver, 182 Broadway. Samples by mail.

THE NEW MUSIC BOOK.

By LOWELL and WILLIAM MASON.

ASAPH; Or, The Union Bond: a Collection of Vocal Music, Sacred and Secular, for Choirs, Singing-Schools, Musical Societies and Conventions, and the Home Circle. Just issued, and contains nearly all new matter, comprising a very attractive Manual for Singing-Schools, a Collection of Church Music, and a Collection of Four-Part Songs and Glees, all in one volume. Price $8 per dozen. For sale by Booksellers generally. Published at Nos. 8 and 7 Mercer Street, New York, by MASON BROTHERS.

SENT BY EXPRESS

EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S

PERFECT FITTING

SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices,

Made to Measure at $18 per doz.

OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS,

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,

With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $7 50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

10 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 14½ c. per yd. $1 45
7 Yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard. 2 50
Making and cutting. 6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c. 1 50
Profit. 7 05

Total. $18 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These shirts are a perfect fit guaranteed that any one can take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

387 Broadway, up stairs,

Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—The advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe Lung Affection, and that dread disease, Consumption, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the mean of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the prescription is to ben fit the afflicted, and he hopes every sufferer may try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address

Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON,
Williamsburgh, Kings County, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $5 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 260.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3 00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

"WORK'S OVER"—SCENES AMONG THE BEAUFORT CONTRABANDS.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 805.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1861.

OUR FINANCES.

MR. CHASE, in his Report just laid before Congress, estimates that the rebellion is costing us about $400,000,000 a year, exclusive of the proceeds of the new war loan. In other words, so long as the war lasts, the loyal people will have to pay direct and indirect taxes at the rate of about $4 per head per annum, and will besides have to borrow $400,000,000 a year.

He has already borrowed $197,000,000 at a 6 7.30 per cent.; further loans to the amount of $75,000,000 were authorized at the extra session in last July: Mr. Chase now asks Congress to authorize the negotiation of fresh loans to the tune of $150,000,000 to carry on the war to 1st July, 1863. Besides the money to be thus raised, he proposes to obtain $150,000,000 by obliging the Banks to call in all their present circulation, and issue fresh notes based on the pledge of United States Stocks and registered at the Treasury Department at Washington.

We can thus realize what the nefarious rebellion of the Southern Slaveholders is costing and going to cost us. The figures constitute a fitting accompaniment to the theories of those politicians who would have us still use half-measures, and deal gingerly with the rebels who are putting us to an expense of blood and treasure unparalleled in the history of nations.

It was expected that Mr. Chase would recommend either a United States Bank or an issue of United States Demand Notes, not redeemable in coin, but made a legal tender by Act of Congress. Wars of such magnitude as the present one have never been waged upon a specie basis. Wall Street was prepared for a recommendation which would have practically amounted to a suspension of specie payments. Mr. Chase has not fulfilled these expectations. If specie payments are to be suspended he leaves the responsibility of the act to Congress.

The new loan, it will amount, as we said, to about $90,000,000 a year, or say $4 per head of the loyal population. This tax is distributed as follows:

Indirect taxes, customs, etc., etc.	$40,000,000
Income tax	10,000,000
Direct tax to be levied by States	20,000,000
Tax on tobacco, distilled liquors, etc., etc.	20,000,000
Aggregate taxation	$90,000,000

In order to show the actual state of the Treasury Department, we condense from the Report of the Treasury the following figures:

ESTIMATES FOR 1861-'62.

EXPENDITURE.
Expenditure for first quarter	$98,329,733
Estimated expenditure for second, third, and fourth quarters, exclusive of acts of extra session	362,603,761
Additional appropriations now asked for	143,139,973
Total	$604,406,432

REVENUE.
Ordinary revenue from customs, etc.	$36,809,721
Revenue from direct taxes	20,000,000
Borrowed already	197,452,688
Balance of loans authorized	75,849,678
Deficit	218,104,427
	$548,406,422

ESTIMATES FOR 1862-'63.

EXPENDITURE.
Civil list	$23,648,971
Interior Department	4,100,963
War	368,110,000
Navy	45,454,374
Public debt	17,836,733
Total	$467,851,041

REVENUE.
Customs, etc.	$45,500,000
Direct taxes	20,000,000
Deficit	379,051,345
	$467,851,345

The latter estimate, we need hardly explain, is based upon the hypothesis that the war will last another year. Mr. Chase hopes and believes that it will be over by mid-summer.

THE END AND THE WAY.

WE must never lose sight of the main object of the war, and of the means by which that object can be attained.

This war is prosecuted for the maintenance of the Union and of the indivisible nationality of the United States. It is not, as foreigners suppose, a war for tariffs, or on account of slavery. The United States Government has no other object in view than the assertion of its authority over the whole of its dominion, and the practical refutation of the subversive doctrines of secession and State sovereignty. It is likely that, in the course of the contest which is being waged, various existing interests, including the institution of slavery, may suffer severely. With that the United States have nothing to do. As soon as the authority of the United States Government is acknowledged throughout the revolted section the war will cease, whatever be the condition of the slaves and the slave-owners; but until that authority is acknowledged the war will go on, and, whatever may be the views of individual generals, it will be waged in the most thorough manner, and every rebel interest, including the institution of slavery, will be assailed as vigorously as possible. If we are forced to free the slaves in order to restore the Union, we shall do so. But no one in authority would desire to carry on the conflict for one hour after the authority of the Government was acknowledged as the South, for the sake of abolishing slavery.

How are we to succeed in accomplishing our purpose of restoring the authority of Government throughout the revolted section?

When the war first broke out it was generally assumed that there was in every Southern State, with, perhaps, the single exception of South Carolina, a majority loyal to the Union, and that nothing was needed but the presence of an imposing force of Union troops to enable this majority to reassert its control over the section which it inhabited. The idea of many persons was that if we sent a hundred thousand troops into Virginia, the loyalists of that State would straightway overwhelm the rebels, and elect members of Congress. Everywhere else we caused a modification of these views. People soon realized that a majority which lets itself be ruled by a minority could not prove a very efficient ally to an invading army. Independently of this consideration, it was remembered that all revolutions are the work of minorities; in every community the majority of people are timid and pusillanimous, and accustomed to be led by a few daring, reckless spirits. It is undoubtedly true that in March last a clear majority of the people of Virginia, Georgia, Louisiana, and Tennessee were opposed to secession. The minority, however, carried the day in all these States, and the majority now, broadly speaking, are members of almost every Union family at the South in the rebel army; Southern pride has been thoroughly aroused; and it is safe to conclude that the Union party are there "out of a party—has ceased to exist. There are no doubt large numbers of men at the South who in their heart desire the restoration of the Union. But many of these are actively engaged in the ranks of the rebels. To expect any aid from them is as fallacious as it was for the secessionists to count upon the alliance of Mr. Fernando Wood and the city of New York. The "masses" always stand by their section, and follow their leaders.

It is clear, then, that we can not succeed in our purpose of restoring the Union through the aid of Southern Unionists, whose efforts in that behalf—now held in check by the rebel despotism—can be evoked by the presence of Union armies.

What we have to do is to convince the people of the South that we are stronger than they, and as resolute: that we are determined to restore the Union at any cost; and that they can not contend against us. When this is done, we shall find plenty of Southern Unionists, and the war will be over.

In order to convince the South that the struggle is hopeless on their part, that we must succeed in the end, and that the Union must will be promoted by a surrender, we must do two things—we must beat them in the field, and we must render the inconveniences of the war intolerable to the Southern people.

The first will be done by General M'Clellan at his own time, and in his own way. He is working with unexampled industry and energy to create an army which shall vastly exceed that Northerners are the better men as well as the better citizens. It is, perhaps, hardly desirable that he should strike a blow before other measures have prepared the Southern people for a reactionary movement against the rebel despotism. At all events, when the cost of rebellion has been thoroughly brought home to every rebel State, a victory on the Potomac will yield far more useful fruit than it would at present, while the bulk of the rebels are still sanguine of success.

The measures which are being taken by Government to teach the South the cost of rebellion are of various kinds. The blockade is the first. This must cause very severe suffering. For six months no vessel has arrived at New Orleans. Thousands of families, which derive their living from foreign trade at Southern ports, must be puzzled to obtain food and clothing. "The "stone fleet" blockade will strike at other classes as well. The sinking of stone-laden ships at the mouth of Southern harbors will render it impossible that those harbors can ever again be opened to trade, and must render real estate in the sea-ports that are blockaded worthless. A necessary part of the blockade is the descent and occupation of the Mississippi River. We understand that Government is resolved to occupy the shores of the Mississippi, from Cairo to New Orleans, at whatever cost. If two hundred thousand men under General M'Clellan are needed for the operation, they will be forthcoming. We must then occupy Memphis, Natchez, and New Orleans. We may hold simultaneously Hatteras, Port Royal, Savannah, Brunswick, Fernandina, and Pensacola. Thus encircled, the rebel section will be within our grasp, and we can make the rebels feel what it is to be at war. For instance, they are suffering severely from the want of various articles of prime necessity, leather, coffee, tea, salt, woolen cloths, all kinds of hardware, drugs, etc. This want will become more stringent as time elapses, and the blockade is perfected. When ever our armies go slaves escape, and the dread of servile insurrections spreads. When we come to hold half the great cities of the South, we should imagine that this consideration alone will lead many rebels to weigh the advantages of surrender. Our occupation of Port Royal is said to have cost the people of that district 2000 slaves, worth—as they are mostly adults—at least $5,000,000. Virginia has lost more than 7000. When we take Memphis and New Orleans the difficulties will probably be counted by the hundreds of thousands. The Confiscation Act is another part of the regular course of instruction through which the rebels will be put. It is well understood that Congress will pass a law which will forfeit the property of every rebel, and will divide it between loyal men who have been ruined by the war and the Government itself. As our armies advance, and this Act is carried into effect, its execution will exercise a wholesome effect upon the rebels who are still in arms.

It is believed that by the time the cordon is fairly tightened round the rebel States, and the Southern people have had time to appreciate the discomforts of a paralysis of trade, the want of a large number of articles of prime necessity, the loss of slaves, the dread of slave insurrections, and the ruin of many their property confiscated, they will be ready for a reactionary movement, and "Union Southerners" who have some backbone will begin to develop in various spots. A march of Sherman in the field would then probably end the war.

This, we take it, is the programme of the Government, as planned by Generals Scott and M'Clellan, and carried out by Mr. Lincoln. We need hardly observe that its success mainly depends upon the thoroughness with which the penalties of rebellion are impressed upon the Southern mind. If we are to convert these rebels by chastisement there must be no sparing of the rod. Nothing must be neglected, consistently with the rules of warfare, which can increase the inconveniences and terrors of their position. When the war is over we shall be ready enough to forgive: just now the severest methods are the most humane.

THE LOUNGER.

THE PRESIDENT

IT is not too late to speak of the Message, for the Message is the programme of the policy of the Government in dealing with the rebellion; and the true criterion of its merit is the universal praise we are latter able to measure the impression produced by the Message upon the country.

It was a message from a statesman, not a President to speak. But unquestionably the public confidence is confirmed by the Message; and that is, upon the whole, the highest praise of it. It is a thoroughly characteristic paper. The President is an honest, plain, shrewd magistrate. He is not a brilliant man, but he is a sensible, practical man. He views his office as a strictly executive one, and wishes to cast responsibilities, as much as possible, upon Congress. He wishes to get as near, and keep as near to the people as he can. If the people are right, the President will be so. If the people are wrong, the President can not be more right. He thinks he can be successful which is not based upon the public conviction.

The President states the condition of the country calmly and dispassionately. "I have adhered," he says, 'to the Act of Congress to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes. If a new law upon the same subject shall be proposed, its propriety will be duly considered. The Union must be preserved, and hence all indispensable means must be employed. We should not be in haste to determine that radical and extreme measures, which may reach the loyal as well as the disloyal, are indispensable.'

These are the words of a wise magistrate. No loyal citizen, surely—not even he believes that the Government is adequate to all the objects that honorable men desire—could wish that extreme measures should be taken before they are indispensable. If it should appear that the supremacy of the Government could be restored only by putting New Orleans under martial law, and totally destroying the other Southern ports, such measures would, of course, be taken. But nobody wishes that they should be resorted to if the necessity is beyond question. So, if it should appear that the Union can be preserved only by a summary emancipation and arming of the slaves, it would be an extreme measure justified by military necessity, and would unquestionably be taken; because the Government of the United States is more precious than the system of human slavery.

The President clearly contemplates the possibility of such extreme measures, and he therefore wishes to express the necessity of maintaining the Government, even at such cost, in the most unreserved manner. That it is done without rhetoric or passion makes it only the more impressive. Does any intelligent man suppose that Mr. Lincoln is less firmly persuaded now that he was four years ago, when he said it, that a house divided against itself can not stand? Does any body doubt that he believes the Union is the sole practicable principle of permanent security, and that he means to do all he can as the Chief Magistrate to secure that result? His method may not seem to us the most heroic, but so long as we confide in the honesty of his purpose we shall not foolishly perplex him.

If any body supposes that Slavery is going to survive this war he seems to us not rightly to understand human nature. The military hand, which knows no rule but success, will loosen its roots; and the hand of law will afterward tear it up and cast it into the fire. Probably there is no man in the country who sees this more clearly than the President.

BRIGHT CHAPTERS OF OUR HISTORY.

The annual Reports from the Departments of Government are always a part of our history; and it has few more glowing chapters than they write. They are the record of the spirit and power of the nation; the full, crowning testimony to the quality of the race and the character of our political system. The rebellion took us at the utmost disadvantage. It had tied the national resources head and foot, as far as it could, and it had the official control. It relied upon the long habit of peace and upon party division to compel the nation to surrender. Last winter eminent rebel—John Slidell was one of them—said that the plot was perfect and sure. The Montgomery Constitution was to be adopted; the new lawful administration set aside; New England left out, or suffered to come in only as a single State with two Senators; New York was ready, they said, to accede, for they had just read Fernando Wood's Message; there would be but little fighting, and that not serious; the Government was to be subverted, the nation betrayed, and the revolution accomplished, before the world distinctly knew what was going on.

This was the amiable Slidell's view. But Heaven's, and Davis's. The gentlemanly James M. Mason, on the 19th of February, expressed his firm persuasion and ardent desire that the Union would be and should be maintained: and the gentlemanly man, who is all honor, wrote on the 20th, that the President in Frazer, the details of the conspiracy. These people had been so long assiduously poisoning the nation that they assumed it to be paralyzed or dead. And there were honest men, too, who really feared it might be so.

On the 12th of April the rebellion began hostilities against the nation at Sumter. We had then 16,000 regular troops, mainly on the Western frontier. 75,000 volunteers for three months were called for; 78,000 immediately responded. In July 500,000 volunteers were asked for three years or the war, and the regular army was increased by 22,000 men. On the first of December we have a force of 600,000 troops; and, reckoning three months' soldiers, the force that has responded to the call since April a few years since 1200 men. Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri were then threatened with rebellion. But they have held and have held fast to the Government.

And this is only preparation.

Turning from the land to the water, what is the naval condition and prospect of the nation?

On the 4th of March we had 12 vessels in a home squadron, and of these 4 only, mounting 25 guns, were in Northern ports; the rest, 8 vessels of 162 guns, including the Sabine of 50 guns, were at Pensacola, at Vera Cruz, or homeward bound from that port, all of material questioned intended by Toucey to fall into the hands of the rebels. Our navy then counted 42 vessels, carrying 555 guns, and 7600 men. It now consists of 264 vessels, 2557 guns, and 22,000 men. The naval arm of the nation has thus far struck the heaviest blows at the rebellion. Hatteras and Port Royal are henceforth historic names.

Thus the nation that Slidell, Mason, and the other conspirators believed to be dead or hopelessly imbecile, which they supposed was dough in their hands, in seven months has created an army and navy, invaluable material every inch of the ground it occupied, and retaking parts of the investment section. Surely we had never fairer cause for congratulation. But it is our own congratulation to ourselves. It is the justification of our system which some could not help doubting.

And have not the two Departments vindicated themselves also in regard to the charges of incompetency? Mr. Welles was called to the head of the Navy Department when instant and extensive action was required. He had no ships, no men, and he could do nothing but provide them as fast as possible. In human probability he never can fully human impatience in an emergency. There seemed to be heaviness because there was delay. Because ships were not provided at every point where they were needed; because an officer of the government could not make purchases without consultation, it seemed as if nothing were done. And all would be lost before we raised a hand. In addition to all this, the Secretary had a long beard—consequently he was Rip Van Winkle soundly sleeping. And now behold his dreams!

Certainly not in our day have the annual Message and the Presidential Reports of the Secretaries struck a key so perfectly in accordance with the spirit and intent of the Government and the honest of the nation as those which were lately published. The Union means power, and liberty, and peace.

AFTER THE ELECTION.

Now that the days of the election is over, every honest citizen should think a moment of the grounds upon which the late Mayor urged his reelection. For Mr. Wood will again be a candidate for office, doubtless, and his conduct should be well remembered.

His speeches just before the election were the most startling that have been known in our civic affairs. He deliberately incited the worst passions of the worst men, politically, but socially. He appealed to the most hateful prejudices, and in sheer desperation strove to array class against class, race against race, and the city against the State. This war, he said, is a war of the abolitionists against Southern men and their rights. They are very willing to spend Irish and German blood to secure a victory, and when they have secured it, they will bring the black laborer up into the North to steal the work and the bread of the honest Irish and Germans.

As for the abolition war let Dickinson and Cochrane, Barcroft and Burnside, Meagher and Corcoran answer.

As for the feeling of all loyal men toward all of any race or of any party who have taken up arms for their country, let Mr. Colfax's resolution that Slidell shall have the same treatment as Colonel Corcoran answer.

And as for Mr. Fernando Wood, who makes these charges, let the fact that he sought to play into the hands of the conspirators who have thrust Corcoran into a felon's cell answer.

Let every man stand in the daylight. Mr. Wood solicited, and will again solicit, the Irish vote. Is he then so especially endeared to Irishmen because when Corcoran refused to parade in honor of the Prince of Wales Mr. Wood was especially conspicuous to him? Or does he rest his claim upon the fact that he is the first friend of Mason and Slidell who ever appears to invite the aid of English bullets against our soldiers, of whom so many are Irish?

Mr. Wood has the right to choose his own course; and every body has the right to expose him. He is defeated, but he will unquestionably reappear as a candidate for some other office. He will make the usual appeal to the worst passions, to the basest prejudices. Let it then be remembered that in the dark hour of national peril he sought to divide loyal men for the benefit of the enemy and for the defeat and disgrace of the very men whose especial support he desired.

It is not the least of the victories of the time that one demagogue is thoroughly exposed.

JOHN BULL GORED.

MR. THORNTON HUNT, an Englishman, son of Leigh Hunt, came to see us last spring. He was unknown, but his father was famous and beloved among us, and he had to take the risk of being kindly received. One day he was dining at a table with a well-known American author, and Mr. Hunt indulged in the customary flippant abuse of Brother Bull when he discourses of a foreign country to its natives. After a series of remarks which showed that a man of the second rank is easily unjustified in holding any opinion upon the subjects discussed, he remarked:

"And can you tell me why it is that all the gentlemen in this country are at the South? Really it is very extraordinary; and I wish you had not kicked up all this row, so that I can not get down among them."

"Well," slowly replied the American, "I suppose the reason is the skin to which minds in all the English gentlemen stay at home in England. We hear that there are gentlemen in England, but they never come to this country."

John Bull is a pachydermatous animal, and it is still a question whether he felt the arrow.

ZAMPILLAERESTATION.

THE nerves which survived the shock of the word Prestidigitation will doubtless preserve their equanimity under the very verbal infliction of Zampillaerestation. We have yet found no capable interpreter of the term. The Dictionary gives it up. But there is no reason why any cautious to shout it in the largest and most lurid type, and we are confidentially told that there is but one way of ascertaining what it means. It is not by persuading Dr. Johnson's ghost to rap, but by seeing the Brothers Hanlon walk upon the ropes in the sky, and hang, and leap, and dart in the dizzy empyrean.

CONFISCATION.

MR. TREMBLE'S speech in the Senate upon moving a bill confiscating the property and giving freedom to the slaves of rebels is worthy the closest attention. Mr. Trumbull has been loosely called an "extreme" man; but the extremity of his speech, in that sense, it is not easy to find. The substance of his argument is this:

The Constitution furnishes the only peace necessary to suppress this rebellion. Under that instrument Congress is empowered to declare what is the control of the civil power in war as in peace. The powers under our Government are three, and the military is one of them, and is made subject to one of them, the legislative; and when called into being by Congress, it is by the Constitution subject to such rules as Congress may determine. When therefore an army, raised by Congress under authority of the Constitution, marches to suppress insurrection, and shoots and destroys it is as subordinate to the civil power as it is upon a holiday parade. In the absence of any express regulation by law it is to be used, its commander could use it in the way he deemed most serviceable to the state, on the principle that every man intrusted with a duty is presumed to be invested with the power necessary to its discharge. When the army is thus acting the judicial tribunals have no right to interfere, because the ground of invoking the military authority is that the judicial, being overborne, is incompetent to the task; and the executive is declusive when the military are to be invoked. Part of the rebellious domain may, for reason, be left under judicial control; and in such the loyal man's property shall be subject also to the judicial power: in the other part, to the military.

The right of seizure and confiscation of enemy's property is affirmed by the Supreme Court, and its exercise is to be authorized by legislative act. The right to free slaves is affirmed by the same kind of confiscation; for it is as property that the rebels hold them: and as one of the most efficient means of obtaining the aid for which the army is summoned, the right is doubly clear.

The policy of this act is plain. If we would successfully end the war, it must be made as terrible to the enemies as to the friends of the Republic. At present, the loyal citizen in the rebellious States, if he wears allegiance to the Government, forfeits all he has; if he forswears it, his property is protected both by friend and foe. Under such a policy the pain of fidelity for property is to put it on the road to treason.

This is the general argument of a most compact and admirable speech. The case of the slaveholding rebels is rapidly closing. If their slaves are property, of course they may be confiscated. If they are persons, of course they may be called by aid the Government in suppressing the rebellion—always supposing that we do not mean to hold up the enemy with one hand and knock him over with the other.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ALMANACK AND DIARY.

ASTRONOMICAL AND METEOROLLOGICAL NOTICES.

SUN sets to MOON, balances, and retire.
Morning SUN, bright—low spring.

FLOWER GARDEN—Sow short buttons on garden fronts: the prospect is limitless, and cheaper by the ton than in full season. Try yardant delicate roots from Frost. — Extract grass gently from the roll (if you have one) and first, you can entice them with a low malodious whistle like the cooing of a bee. Mahogany-trees require hot water (if not marked with the signature of the firm it is sporious), or the dill dry, hands across, cannon off the red, and return the lead.

KITCHEN GARDEN.—On Monday, dig up cabbages and plant celery. On Tuesday, dig up celery, and plant cabbages; and so on through the week. Cut cut kidneys from Monday's beef, that they make an excellent relish for breakfast, or your butcher will give you a high price for the kidneys.

HOUSE OR PEA.—When your house is on fire, tie to bed and calmly reflect for half an hour what is best to be done. Having arranged your plans, prepare to put them into execution. Then, suddenly, and in a state of violent, shouts you be unable to arrive at any decision, or should you arrive at it, stop the window, and in either case to it be a silk handkerchief over your eyes and fasten yourself to the bed-post, then bite a mattress, and in a minute; the pest will break your fall. Do not scream, or you may wake the neighbors, and they have their own part. If you follow out these directions closely, any thing further will be delicacy.

PROVERB FOR THE MONTH.—"A cheerful look makes a dish a feast." Applicable to those who have a fastidious stance to dinner; they arrive; kitchen fire smokes, servants in relation, your self in a hurry, and in a violent, assemble your guests round the mahogany, light your candelebra, prepare to enjoy the first course, and cut the table, and look as cheerful as possible under the circumstances; your friends' mouths will be filled with it for the next six years.

MARRY-TIME EXTRACTS.

NOVEMBER 8.—The Mary Ann, of Belgravia, was severely spoken to this morning by the Nelson in relation with the X. Y., of Brompton, with considerable damage to her bows. She had a very good run for it all the way.

The Hiram Anne, bound from Pimlico to Pillar Post, with a large miscellaneous cargo, started at her course, and run upon the green bank by the ornamental water, St. James' Park. Got off without assistance.

The Harriet, of Hammersmith, having the Perambulator in tow, ran foul of the Lamp Post, and after striking against a cake and apple stall, filled rapidly. The Tommy and Jane, of Bethnal Green, was also in the same spot, and were obliged to have a tug before they could be got off. Sorry, with wet.

Arrived.—The Downer Countess, screw, from the Continent. Hasn't had a rough passage all the way.

Departed.—The Lady Fiora de Montmorency for St. George's, where she will change owners.

FASHION FOR THE FIRESIDE.

I give thee this fire-proof dress, my love.
Wearing all that attire,
It gives a double security, my love,
To see thee go near the fire.
Shouldst treat them with scorn, and wave thy draper to catch,
Then, the burned alive!
And the loss of such a wife, whom I love better than my life,
I could ne'er survive.

That muslin expanse is untrustable
For what have I got?
But this one is incombustible,
So that is what I gain.
And thy Crinoline may swell beyond the biggest Mrs. Gamp,
Yet secure thou'lt be,
In a dress that can't catch fire, from a death that I may name,
Frederic Suttee. JONES.

TALES OF MY GRANDMOTHER.

"SARAH, my dear, I know of no accessary though stopping at present in a lodging-house, it is one of very high rental think it a extension to call brought up that, though it has been an inverstest, and we, may say, an incurable sufferer all the year round, and that it is quite a subject to enter the room than it says, in a voice as sweet as a tea-kettle's. 'I hope my mother's very disagreeable to you, Ma'am?' And if the body says 'as how it is,' and begins complaining to prove it, never a word answers, without waiting to be blown up, or hauled over the coals, or put out, as all members in the process of being hauled over the coals have done unto, does not give another blessed puff, but goes out instantly of its own accord. There, you wouldn't believe it, but I tell you it's a fact."

Observations made by Sarah, the elderly Lady. "You my dear, and there's many a young gentleman of the present day who could learn a deal from the example of that excellent chimney with the very best advantage!"

[Left speaking.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, 3d, in the Senate, a resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore Wilkes and the officers, seamen, and marines serving under him, for the decisive and brilliant achievement in the capture of Mason and Slidell, was offered, but laid aside until the formation of the standing committees. The Vice-President was authorized to fill the vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, caused by the expiration of Senator Douglas' and the resignation of Senator Mason, of Virginia.——In the House, Mr. Dunn, of Indiana, introduced a bill for the credentials of Mr. Clemens, representative-elect from the Eleventh district of Virginia, which was referred to the Committee on Elections. Mr. Dunn, of Indiana, offered a resolution expelling John B. Clark, Missouri, and Lucky. Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, made a speech on the subject, in which he declared emphatically that he would not force Kentucky out of the Union, and concluded with the resolution that the House do not expel Clark. On motion of Mr. Stout a rebel be found treading the soil of Kentucky. The resolution expelling Mr. Clark was adopted, and the payment of whatever salary may be due him was ordered.——In the Wednesday's Senate, Mr. Wilson, of Missouri, presented John C. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, now an officer in the rebel army, was declared by a vote of twenty-two to twenty. Senator Hale submitted a resolution directing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the present Supreme Court, and organizing another Supreme Court, which will meet the requirements of the Constitution. Senator Wilson introduced a resolution providing for the release of slaves confined in prison in Washington. Referred to the Committee on District of Columbia Affairs. On motion of Senator Wilson the same Committee were directed to consider the question of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, offering compensation to loyal owners of slaves. Senator Saulsbury proposed the appointment of a commission to confer with a like number of commissioners from the so-called Confederate States, with a view to the restoration of peace. Laid on the table.——In the House, Mr. Gurley gave notice of a bill to embargo and declare free the slaves of rebels, also providing for their apprenticeship to loyal masters, and subsequent colonization. Mr. Dunn, of Indiana, introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Foreign Affairs to inquire as to the practicability and expediency of acquiring, in a "congenial climate" on a part of this continent, or on the adjacent islands south of the United States, a right to colonize and apprentice the slaves of rebel masters. Referred. Mr. Hutchins, of Ohio, asked leave to introduce a bill to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, but objection was made by Mr. Cox, of Ohio. A resolution providing for the proper measures for an exchange of prisoners of war was referred to the Judiciary Committee.——On Thursday, 5th, in Indiana, introduced a preamble and resolutions reaffirming the Crittenden declaration as to the status and rights of the war, which, on motion of Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, were laid on the table by a vote of 71 against 54. A bill was introduced providing for the restoration of Alexandria County, Virginia, to the District of Columbia.

On Thursday, 5th, in the Senate, Senator Rice, of Minnesota, presented the governor's recent fair vote in favor of the expulsion of the traitor Breckinridge. Senator Trumbull, from the Judiciary, had his bill for confiscating the property and giving freedom to the slaves of rebels. In a long speech in support of the measure, Senator Trumbull complimented the main points of the bill. The bill was ordered to be printed and referred to the Judiciary Committee.——Senator Carlile, of New Hampshire, gave notice of an amendment to the Fugitive Slave Act. The Senate went into Executive session.

In the House, the standing committees were announced by the Speaker. Mr. Gurley, of Ohio, offered a resolution, which was adopted, directing the Judiciary Committee to inquire as to whether a commission of the Confederate dispatches of the press had been established. Mr. Blair's resolution declaring that the United States remain adopted in Committee of the Whole, then rejected by the House, and subsequently referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. Lovejoy introduced a bill repealing all laws requiring fugitive slaves to be returned to their owners. Referred. It was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Mr. Lovejoy introduced a bill providing for the confiscation of the slaves of rebels, all of which were referred to the Committee on Judiciary. Mr. Speaker Clark offered a resolution requesting the Marshal of the District of Columbia to report to the authority referred to slaves belonging in the District were imprisoned, which was agreed to. Mr. Dunn introduced a bill abolishing the present Supreme Court and establishing another was referred to the Judiciary Committee. Mr. Stevens offered a resolution inquiring into the causes of the disasters to our army at Ball's Bluff and Leesburg. Mr. Speaker Chandler, which took a wide range. Senator Trumbull moved that the Judiciary should not be confined to the disasters, but the whole conduct of the war should be inquired into. The resolution was passed.——In the House of Representatives a preamble and resolution were adopted requesting the President to inaugurate a system for the exchange of prisoners with the rebels. Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, introduced a resolution requesting the President to call upon the north of the recent orders of General Halleck as prohibited fugitive slaves from coming within the lines of the various commands operating in Missouri. The Committee on Foreign Relations were instructed to inquire into the expediency of furnishing relief to the famine-stricken people of Ireland. Two or three bills in relation to the Post Office were introduced. The Ways and Means Committee were instructed to devise some plan for the early resumption of the operations of the tariff and direct tax. Various other matters, of more or less interest, were introduced at the bottom of the House. Secretary Chase's report was received and referred.

REPORT OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The Report of the Secretary of War gives a history of the operations of the army during the year, and presents the following estimate of the strength of the army, both volunteer and regular:

States.	Volunteers.		Regulars.
	For the War.	Aggregate.	Aggregate.
California		3,000	3,683
Connecticut	2,733	12,460	14,460
Delaware	775	4,000	4,715
Illinois	4,941	80,000	84,041
Indiana	4,500	67,053	71,553
Iowa	968	19,800	20,768
Kentucky		15,000	15,000
Maine	768	14,329	15,097
Maryland		7,000	7,000
Massachusetts	3,425	26,769	30,195
Michigan	1,000	23,881	24,881
Minnesota		4,160	4,160
New Hampshire	9,256	15,189	15,489
New Hampshire	719	9,000	10,379
New Jersey	1,000	10,000	11,000
New York	10,188	100,200	110,388
Ohio	11,341	91,341	102,682
Pennsylvania	19,159	94,760	113,959
Rhode Island	1,000	5,988	7,151
Vermont	759	8,000	8,759
Wisconsin	1,579	13,779	15,358
Wisconsin	792	14,153	14,945
Nebraska		5,000	5,000
Colorado		1,000	1,000
Dakota		1,000	1,000
Nevada		1,000	1,000
New Mexico		1,000	1,000
District of Columbia	2,823	1,000	3,823
Total	77,975	646,631	718,573

—To the above add the number for the war, 646,631, and the estimated strength of the regular army, including the three additional regiments for the war, 25,942, which is 20,354, and our entire military force now in the field will be 646,571; to the several arms of the service being distributed as follows:

	Volunteers.	Regulars.	Aggregate.
Infantry	567,468	14,776	582,244
Cavalry	44,744	10,388	55,132
Artillery	20,359	4,668	24,688
Rifles and sharp-shooters	8,395	3,228	8,623
Engineers		107	107
Total	646,631	25,384	670,971

—For the ensuing year appropriations are asked for 500,000 men.

REPORT OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The Report of Secretary Welles to the New York publishes a comprehensive statement of the condition of the branch of the service under the Navy Department since last July. With the vessels now building and purchased of every class are in service, and ready for service, the strength of the navy will be:

Number of Vessels.	Guns.	Tonnage.
Steam Sloops-of-war	64	16,016
7 Frigates	350	15,104
17 Sloops	326	16,031
2 Brigs	12	529
3 Store-ships	9	3,443
3 Receiving-ships, etc	196	6,340
12 Screw-steamers	223	9,000
9 First-class screw sloops	169	11,053
3 First-class side-wheel steam sloops	31	5,003
8 Second-class screw sloops	42	7,593
5 Third-class screw sloops	15	2,595
4 Third-class side-wheel steamers	8	1,808
2 Steam tenders	4	299
76	1185	109,571

VESSELS PURCHASED.

56 Side-wheel steamers	168	28,659
23 Screw steamers	75	10,339
13 Ships	52	9,334
24 Schooners	72	8,423
19 Barks	76	8,427
1 Bark	4	460
136	518	71,297

VESSELS CONSTRUCTED.

	Guns.	Tons.
14 Screw sloops	98	16,737
23 Gun-boats	23	11,661
12 Side-wheel steamers	49	9,400
7 Iron-clad steamers	28	4,500
56	256	41,488

—Making a total of 264 vessels, 2257 guns, and 219,056 tons. The aggregate number of seamen in the service on the 4th of March last was 7,600. The number is now not less than 22,000. The amount appropriated at the last regular session of Congress for the naval service of the current fiscal year was $13,500,000. This was added at the special session of last July $20,000,000, making an aggregate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1862, of $34,500,000. To this must be added:

For extra pay, bounty, and advances to fit them for service $2,500,000
For the purchase of additional vessels 10,000,000
For 10 iron-clad vessels 13,000,000
$25,500,000
Add previous appropriations 34,000,000
Total for year ending June 30, 1862 ..... $59,145,551

—The estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863, are as follows:

For the navy proper $41,096,559
For the Marine Corps 1,196,075
For miscellaneous objects 3,473,476
Total for fiscal year ending June 30, 1863 ..... $45,766,110

THE EXPEDITION DOWN THE MISSISSIPPI.

Another naval and military expedition is about to start from St. Louis and Cairo, under the direction of General Halleck and Commodore Foote, comprising a force of from eighty to one hundred thousand men. The destination of this grand expedition and its points of attack will undoubtedly be Columbus, Kentucky; Fort Henry, Tennessee, and Harris, in Tennessee, and possibly the city of Memphis.

A BATTLE IN EAST TENNESSEE.

Just before the news came that Zollicoffer had met Tennessee in battle, and defeated them. They acknowledge it. A despatch to the Memphis papers of the 24 instant states that on the 1st, Sunday, Brownlow, at the head of 3000 Federal troops, attacked the rebels in East Tennessee, and was signally victorious. Even this rebel dispatch reads like Union victory. The fighting continued two days.

BANKS AND RESOURCES IN WINTER-QUARTERS.

General Banks has taken up his winter-quarters at Frederick, Maryland. The war-cloud rests with its gloomy apparent enthusiasm by the inhabitants, and looked himself up in the intellectual Colonel Bradley Johnson, of the rebel army. There are no signs of the rebels between Harper's Ferry and Winchester, and the rebel General's command is keeping a vigilant look-out for them.

General Stonewall Jackson has sold several of Wheeling last week to take up their winter-quarters. The General has been offered but it is probable that he will remain for his winter home. It is probable that the campaign in Western Virginia is therefore as at end for the present.

FRIGHTFUL SUFFERING AMONG OUR PRISONERS.

An order from the Secretary of State to General M'Clellan reaffirms the position of the act of Congress of August 6th, in relation to persons engaged in the rebellious service against the Government, who may escape within our military lines. Such persons employed upon farms from any further claim to service or labor, and brings them within military protection. Any attempt to hold such arrest them as fugitives should themselves be immediately arrested by the military authorities.

COTTON TO BE SHIPPED BY GOVERNMENT.

An order issued by the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the shipment of property in United States by the National forces has been published. It provides, in brief, that there shall be appointed agents at the different places conquered by our arms, who shall secure and prepare for shipment all the cotton, and such other property as may be seized, and that the naval and military authorities shall aid in this work. He says: "The commissioners of the Secretary—" persons held to service for life under such laws"—may be employed by the agents, and will be organized for systematized labor, in securing and preparing for market their products. For its labor a fair price, and a just compensation allowed to these laborers, the same to be fixed by the agents, and approved by the military commandant and the Secretary of the Treasury. The ownership of all stock and a share of the products taken will be carefully made by the agents and officers. The cotton and other products will be shipped from city for market, and accounts will be settled by the Secretary of the Treasury. The agents will be appointed and removed at a little injury as possible may occur to loyal citizens, or those who within reasonable time may assume the character of loyal citizens.

IMPORTANT ORDER FROM GENERAL HALLECK.

General Halleck has issued an important general order to his commanding officers in Missouri, directing them to arrest and hold in close confinement every one found in arms against the Government, or those who, in any way, give aid to the rebels; and ordering all persons found within the lines of the army, in disguise as loyal citizens, and giving information to the enemy, and all those taken from the ranks of the rebels, or who have acted as hostile treated as prisoners of war, but as spies, and shall be shot. He further orders that in the event Murdoch of St. Louis shall take in charge the numbers of Union families who are compelled to leave their homes—having been burned and driven from their homes by the rebels—and quarter them upon secessionists, compelling them to furnish all the food to them, on the ground that, although they have not themselves plundered the Union people, they have given aid to people, they are giving aid and comfort to those who have done so.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

RUMORED DECISION OF THE MASON-SLIDELL CASE.

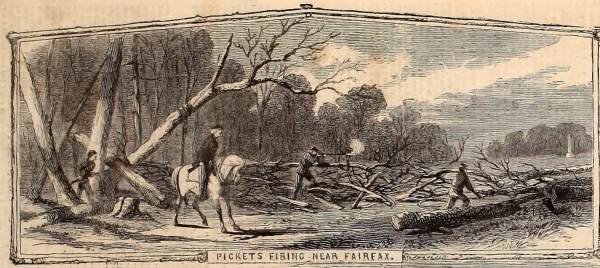
When the Africa left England rumors were afloat that the James Adger had gone out with the intention of forcibly taking Messrs. Mason and Slidell from the British mail steamer. It was an English port, and the Edinburgh Scotsmans, a reliable journal, asserts that the Government officials had a perfect and legal right to seize a mail steamer knowing Government dispatches were on board, even in the harbor of an ally. Britain. The case would, it was thought, be taken into the Admiralty Court, and the decision would be by the British Admiralty Council, which was attended by the leading members of the Government, had been held on the subject.

THE "NASHVILLE" IN ENGLAND.

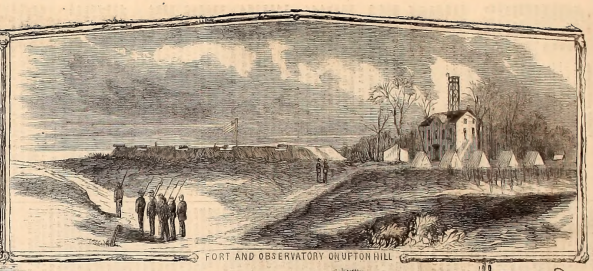
The rebel steamer Nashville, Commander Pegram, arrived without disguise at Southampton, on the 21st November, and was duly received by the authorities as a war vessel commissioned by a recognized power. The Government of England or legal right to seize a mail steamer knowing Government dispatches were on board, even in the harbor of an ally. Britain. The case would, it was thought, be taken into the Admiralty Court, and the decision would be by the British Admiralty Council, which was attended by the leading members of the Government, had been held on the subject.

THE "NASHVILLE" IN ENGLAND.

The rebel steamer Nashville, Commander Pegram, arrived without disguise at Southampton, on the 21st November, and was duly received by the authorities as a war vessel commissioned by a recognized power. The Government gave a hospitable welcome to Captain Pegram himself published the particulars of the overhauling and examination of the ship Harry Bluck near the mouth of the British Channel, exhibited his commodious and powerful vessel, and gave a ball to officers and crew of the Harvey Birch immediately to the charge of the United States steamer Southampton. The officer of the Harvey Birch as refused to make a declaration not to serve against the South, and the ship was therefore put in irons by Captain Pegram. Captain Nelson, the commander of the Harvey Birch, had published a protest in the English papers against the acts of the rebel officers. Mr. Porter, a rebel Commissioner to Europe, and Mr. Mann, were landed from the Nashville, and had, with Captains Pegram and Nelson, gone to London—the first-named parties to communicate with Mr. Yancey, and Captain Nelson to see Mr. Adams. The affair produced intense excitement in the commercial, financial, and political circles of England, but the impression seemed to be general in favor of sheltering the Nashville for refit and supplies, just as the British vessel James Adger had been treated a few days previously.



PICKETS FIRING NEAR FAIRFAX.



FORT AND OBSERVATORY ON UPTON HILL.

SKIRMISH NEAR HUNTER'S MILL, VIRGINIA, BETWEEN TWO COMPANIES OF THE PENNSYLVANIA CAVALRY AND A LARGE FORCE OF REBELS.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 807.]

HONORABLE GEORGE OPDYKE, MAYOR ELECT OF NEW YORK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

HON. GEORGE OPDYKE, MAYOR ELECT.

WE publish on this page, from a photograph by Brady, a portrait of the Hon. GEORGE OPDYKE, Mayor Elect of New York.

Mr. Opdyke is a native of this city and about forty-one years of age. In early life he went to New Orleans, and learned the trade of a tailor, which he followed for some years, growing rich enough to open a large dry-goods store. He eventually retired from business in New Orleans with a handsome fortune, which he has since increased here. On his establishment here, he devoted his attention to politics, and was elected to the Assembly from this city. Two years ago he ran for Mayor and was defeated; he has just been elected after one of the closest contests that ever took place in the city. Mr. Opdyke is engaged in the dry-goods trade, and is understood to be a millionaire.

MISS BROWNLOW.

IN connection with the recent fight at Morristown, Tennessee, where the rebels, according to their own accounts, were badly beaten, we publish a portrait of MISS BROWNLOW, the daughter of the intrepid Parson Brownlow, of Knoxville, Tennessee. She is as brave as her father, and as devoted to the Union. We can give her no higher praise than this. When a mob of secessionists attacked her father's house in his absence and insisted on the Union flag being hauled down from where it floated, this young lady seized a rifle and told them she would defend it with her life. The first who approached would be shot. They threatened her for some time, and tried in every way to frighten her. But she was firm, and after a time the ruffians withdrew, leaving the flag still flying. This noble girl will doubtless be heard of again in the course of the war in Tennessee.

"WORK'S OVER."

WE give the above title to the series of "contraband" sketches which are reproduced on page 801. Our special artist at Hilton Head—the author of the sketches—thus writes us concerning them:

"We have made use of the contraband in so many different employments, that I find it necessary to send to you a series of sketches to illustrate his value. Upon our landing at Hilton Head a lack of good oarsmen was found seriously to deter our rapid progress in landing. Soon the negroes flocked in, and I assure you that I have seen few better oarsmen. Captain Fuller at once manned his little Whitehall boat with them, dressing them in the man-of-war style, which is exceedingly picturesque. Again, in landing, the slope of the shore being very gradual, it was found necessary to have some one to back off the passengers; at once the contrabands filled the need. They are invaluable as foragers, bringing in the different fruits, game, etc.

"Their head-quarters are directly back of those formerly occupied by Gen. Wright, of which you had a sketch; here are congregated a small village of these happy mortals, jolly ever, and willing to work.

"Aunt Chloe is a brief sample of ebony, who is the general head-cracker of the settlement, the terror of all juvenile darkeys and admiration of the elder.

"The extensive earth-works that have been thrown up, and which their hands have done well their share of work, are almost monuments of the willing work of a paid negro.

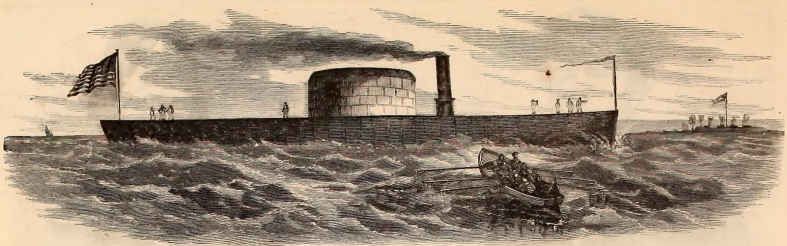
"Uncle Sam, a fine specimen of the African race, is the overseer of General Drayton's plantation, and one of the best-natured boys that we have. He is the general forager for the mess, and is never back in woods without an abundant return."

Of the real condition of the slaves, a correspondent of the Times says: "The efforts of the masters to carry off the slaves have been in nearly every case abortive. No love for masters, no fear of their cruelty, no apprehension of the Yankees has been sufficient to alarm the blacks. They all look upon us as friends; and where they do not come within our lines, say that all that restrains them is the dislike of leaving their families and the things—their little property. They have a cat-like clinging to their old quarters, and do not generally manifest any desire to quit them. When they have fled in large numbers, it has been always toward our lines, but so far as I can learn it has been because of the efforts of their masters to take them off. This they resist, but they manifest no peculiarly vindictive spirit. They complain of bad treatment, but I can not learn that they display any desire to revenge themselves. They chuckle, indeed, with infinite glee over Southern disasters; they tell of the lies they told their former owners, of their pretenses to love them, of their forced obedience; they believe in the power of the Unionists to overthrow the Southern rule; they are willing to act as guides or scouts (occasionally), to work; to give all information; and the more intelligent they are the readier to aid us. But unless provoked by the foolish attempts of the rebels to carry them off, I doubt whether they will attempt any injury to the persons of the whites. The plundering indeed ravages evil, but if the rebels set the example by firing their own cotton-houses, they need not be surprised to find it imitated. If they persist in their attempts at forcibly restraining the slaves and in living at them, the worst consequences are likely to follow."

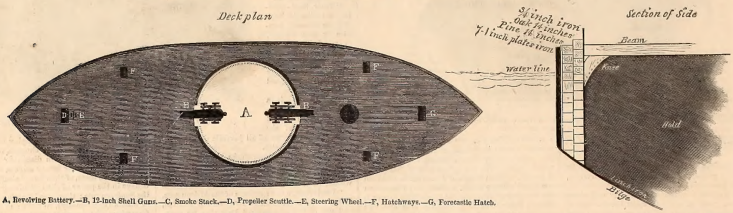
Some writers from Port Royal have stated that the negroes will not work, but that when work is offered them they will fly to the woods. This is indignantly denied by other writers, and by several officers of the expedition, who state that the contrabands work willingly and ably. It would not be surprising if poor Sambo, after a dozen generations of slavery, should want to celebrate his sudden emancipation by a brief holiday.

MISS BROWNLOW, PARSON BROWNLOW'S DAUGHTER.

COLONEL RANKIN'S LANCER REGIMENT, NOW AT DETROIT, MICHIGAN.—SKETCHED BY B. R. ERMAN.—[SEE PAGE 811.]



THE ERICSSON STEEL-CLAD BATTERY, NOW BUILDING AT GREEN POINT, LONG ISLAND.



A, Revolving Battery.—B, 12-inch Shell Guns.—C, Smoke Stack.—D, Propeller Scuttle.—E, Steering Wheel.—F, Hatchways.—G, Forecastle Hatch.

THE ERICSSON STEEL-PLATED BATTERY.

THE ERICSSON BATTERY, a sketch of which will be found on this page, is now in process of construction at the Continental Iron Works at Green Point, Long Island. She will be launched in the course of a few days. She is about 200 feet in length, with 36 feet beam and 11 feet depth of hold. Her hull is built of iron, and to protect her sides she is covered with a layer of oak 14 inches in thickness, another layer of pine 14 inches in thickness, the whole being plated with seven plates of one inch iron, making her shot-proof. A revolving fort, which contains two 12-inch guns, is placed upon the deck near the centre. This fort, or bomb-proof, is eight inches in thickness. The diameter of the fort is 20 feet inside, and it is 10 feet in height. She will be propelled by a powerful Ericsson engine. She is one of the most novel and interesting pieces of naval architecture constructed in this country. For proper reasons we forbear to give very full details in relation to this vessel, as we do not desire to give the rebels any information on such matters.

Other iron-clad vessels are being built at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and Mystic, Connecticut. By next summer we shall have several afloat.

OUR NEW MAPS.

WE continue in this Number the series of WAR MAPS, which have been so marked a feature of this journal since the war began. On this page we give a map showing the proposed reconstruction of the States of Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware. This can be best understood by reference to the following extract from the Report of the Secretary of War:

The geographical position of the metropolis of the nation, menaced by the rebels, and required to be defended by thousands of our troops, induces me to suggest for consideration the propriety and expediency of a reconstruction of the boundaries of the States of Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia. Wisdom and true statesmanship would dictate that the seat of the National Government, for all time to come, should be placed beyond reasonable danger of seizure by enemies within, as well as from capture by foes from without. By agreement between the States named, such as was effected, for similar purposes, by Michigan and Ohio, and by Missouri and Iowa, their boundaries could be so changed as to render the capital more remote than at present from the influence of State governments which have arrayed themselves in rebellion against the Federal authority. To this end, the limits of Virginia might be so altered as to make her boundaries consist of the Blue Ridge on the east and Pennsylvania on the north, leaving those on the south and west as at present. By this arrangement two counties of Maryland (Alleghany and Washington) would be transferred to the jurisdiction of Virginia. All that portion of Virginia which lies between the Blue Ridge and Chesapeake Bay could then be added to Maryland, while that portion of the peninsula between the waters of the Chesapeake and the Atlantic, now jointly held by Maryland and Virginia, could be incorporated into the State of Delaware. A reference to the map will show that there are great natural boundaries, which, for all time to come, would serve to mark the limits of these States.

MAP SHOWING THE NEW BOUNDARIES OF VIRGINIA, MARYLAND, AND DELAWARE AS PROPOSED BY SECRETARY CAMERON.

To make the protection of the capital complete, in consideration of the large accession of territory which Maryland would receive under the arrangement proposed, it would be necessary that the State should consent to modify most pergoreal, it would be necessary that the State should consent to modify her Constitution as to limit the basis of her representation to her white population.

In this connection, it would be the part of wisdom to reannex to the District of Columbia that portion of its original limits which by act of Congress was retroceded to the State of Virginia.

This arrangement would reduce the size of the State of Virginia at least one-half, leaving the name of Virginia to that part only which is now mainly loyal. The disloyal section, comprising all the great cities of Virginia—Richmond, Norfolk, Fredericksburgh, Lynchburg, etc.—and all the sea-coast, would be annexed to Maryland, while Delaware would rise, by spreading over the whole peninsula between the Chesapeake and the ocean, to be a State of considerable magnitude. Under this reconstruction Maryland would become one of the three great States of the Union. We need hardly direct attention to the clause in the Secretary's report which hints that emancipation in Maryland must be the price paid for this acquisition of territory.

On this page we give a full and elaborate map of Tennessee, which, from all appearances, is destined to be the seat of war in the West. Our map shows the railway bridges broken in Eastern Tennessee by the Union men; the city of Nashville, which, according to some authorities, is destined to be the rebel capital; the city of Memphis, near which, in all probability, the bloodiest battle of the war will be fought; and all other cities and places of interest in the State. Our artist writes as follows of this map:

The bridges burned by the Union men of Eastern Tennessee were two bridges over Chickamauga Creek below Chattanooga, one fine bridge on the Eastern Tennessee and Georgia Railroad, over the Hiwassee River at Charleston, Tennessee; also two bridges on the Eastern Tennessee and Virginia Railroad, one of which over the Holston River at Union, near the Virginia line, was destroyed, the other, over Lick Creek, between Russellville and Greenville, was but partially burned and has been repaired.

A railroad bridge over the Tennessee River in the western part of the State has recently been completed, and there is now uninterrupted railroad communication between Nashville and the Mississippi River at Columbus and Memphis.

Morristown, where the reported victory of Parson Brownlow occurred, is on the Eastern Tennessee and Virginia Railroad. There is another place of the same name, simply a post-office in Grainger County, about 15 miles north of the railroad.

OUR ARMY AT WASHINGTON.

OUR attentive Washington correspondent has sent us the sketches which we reproduce on page 804. One of them represents the OBSERVATORY AND EARTHWORK ON UPTON'S HILL; another, an "AFFAIR OF PICKETS" on the road to Fairfax Court House, over the abattis placed in the road by the rebels; and a third, the late CAVALRY SKIRMISH near Vienna.

The following account of the cavalry skirmish near Vienna, from the Washington Star, will serve to explain the illustration:

The reconnoissance made yesterday by a squadron of the Third Pennsylvania regiment, consisting of companies F and N, under command of Captain Bell, in the neighborhood of Vienna, resulted disastrously to our forces. After reaching Vienna they took the right-hand road toward Dunn's Mill, and had gone about a mile and a half when they suddenly found themselves hemmed in on three sides by an ambuscade of the rebel cavalry, but also of infantry. The discharges of the rebel musketry placed the horses of our cavalry beyond the control of their riders, the animals having been but recently brought into service, and therefore unaccustomed to such alarms. The officers, after several ineffectual attempts to get their men in line for the purpose of making a charge, ordered a retreat, which was effected in as good order as the peculiar circumstances permitted.

The skirmish was brisk, though of short duration, the rebel cavalry firing hotshot from their carbines. The number of rebels killed and wounded is not known. John Bently, private in Company N, killed a rebel officer and captured his horse. The mark on the saddle was D. S. Davis, Edgeway, North Carolina.

Better fortune attended our arms on the occasion of Colonel Bayard's cavalry reconnoissance near Dranesville. The Colonel himself tells the story so briefly that we give his report in full:

CAMP PIERPONT, VIRGINIA, Nov. 27, 1861.

SIR,—In obedience to orders, I started from this camp yesterday with my regiment at nine o'clock in the evening, for the purpose of marching on Dranesville. We reached positions above and behind Dranesville shortly after five in the morning, after a very tedious and tedious march. Major Barrows advanced on the town by the northern pike which leads to it with two companies of the regiment, while I with the other eight skirted the town of the town, and advanced by the Leesburg pike. There were but two pickemen in the town. These were cavalrymen belonging to Colonel J. E. B. Stuart's regiment of Virginia horse, and were captured, with their horses and arms, by Captain Stoddartsburg, Company B. I arrested as well as captured three of Dranesville; who are known to be accessories of the bittered stamp. The names of the citizens taken are as follows: John P. Dye, M.D., of Dranesville; B. H. Gannell, of Great Falls, Virginia; John T. D. Bacon and C. W. Coleman, of Dranesville; W. B. Dye, M.D., of Dranesville, and J. B. Fair.

Upon my return, some miles from Dranesville, a fire was opened upon the head of the column from a thick pine wood. Assistant-Surgeon Alexander was severely wounded, and private Joel Houghtling was badly wounded, and I had my horse killed. The wood was instantly surrounded, and the cavalrymen sent into the woods. We killed two and captured four, one of whom was shot twice, and is not likely to live. I captured two good horses, five shot-guns, one Hall's rifle, and two pistols.

The names of the prisoners are as follows: W. D. Farley, First Lieutenant South Carolina Volunteers (was Captain on Beaufort steamer); Sergeant J. H. Carnahean, Lieutenant Seventh South Carolina Volunteers; P. W. Cooper, Seventh South Carolina Volunteers; Thomas Coleman, citizen of Dranesville (dangerously wounded); F. Hildebrand, private Thirtieth Virginia cavalry; A. M. Whitten, private Thirtieth Virginia cavalry (taken at Dranesville as picket). We killed or captured all we saw.

I can say this report without speaking of the splendid manner in which both men and officers behaved. The fine manner in which Majors Jones and Bayard, and the Second Lieutenant of the Fifth cavalry, Mr. Barrows, acted, can not be too highly commended or appreciated. As stated well, am I sure not but then publicly express my admiration for their truly admirable behavior.

I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. D. BAYARD,
Colonel First Pennsylvania Cavalry.

MAJOR-GENERAL M'CALL, Commanding Division, etc. &c.

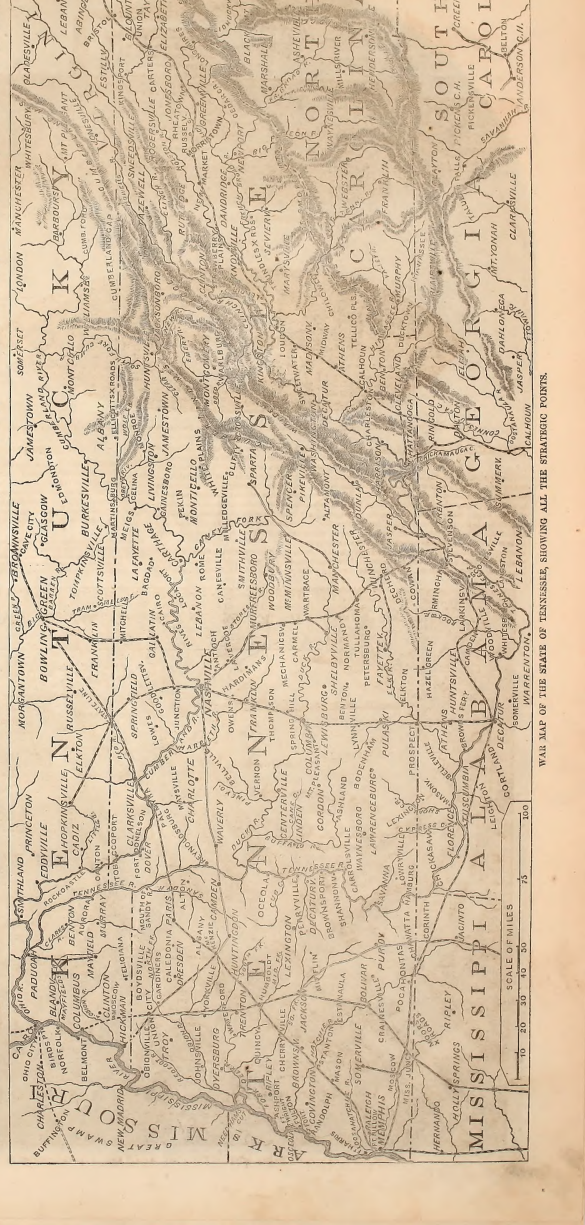
THE COMBINED EUROPEAN FLEET AGAINST MEXICO.

We publish on page 812 a view of the COMBINED BRITISH, FRENCH, AND SPANISH FLEET now collected at Havana for the purpose of operating against Mexico. The Spanish vessels are the most numerous, the British the least, though the largest in size of ships. The British send 850 guns and 10,000 men; the Spanish Admiral, Rubalcava, commands twelve steamers, mounting 300 guns; and the French Admiral, Jurien de la Graviere, ten, also mounting 310 guns. The following extract from the Convention between the three Powers will show the purpose of the expedition:

Art. 1. Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, her Majesty the Queen of Spain, and his Majesty the Emperor of the French engage to make, immediately after the signature of the present convention, the necessary arrangements for dispatching to the coasts of Mexico combined naval and military forces, the strength of which shall be determined by a further interchange of communications between their Governmental fortresses and military positions on the Mexican coast.

The commanders of the allied forces shall be, moreover, authorized to execute the other operations which may be considered, on the spot, most suitable to effect the object specified in the preamble of the present convention, and specifically to insure the security of foreign residents.

All the measures contemplated in this article shall be taken in the name and on account of the high contracting parties, without reference to the particular nationality of the forces employed to execute them.



KENTUCKY
TENNESSEE
VIRGINIA
NORTH CAROLINA
SOUTH CAROLINA GEORGIA ALABAMA
MISSISSIPPI
ARKANSAS
LOUISIANA
MISSOURI
SCALE OF MILES
0 10 20 30 40 50 75 100
LONDON
MANCHESTER
SOMERSET
LEBANON
LABANON
BLAKESVILLE
WHITESBORO
HARRODSVILLE
ESTILL
MT. VERNON LANCASTER
CRAB ORCHARD
STANFORD DANVILLE
PERRYVILLE
HARRODSBURG
LEXINGTON
VERSAILLES
FRANKFORT
GEORGETOWN
SHELBYVILLE
SHELBYVILLE
LOUISVILLE
BARDSTOWN
BRANDENBURG
HENDERSON
OWENSBORO
HOPKINSVILLE
CLARKSVILLE
PRINCETON
EDDYVILLE
PADUCAH
CAIRO
BELMONT
COLUMBUS
HICKMAN
CLINTON
MAYFIELD
MURRAY
PARIS
CALEDONIA
JACKSON
MADISON
CHARLESTON
BUFFINGTON
NEW MADRID
SWAMP
GREAT
CUMBERLAND GAP
CUMBERLAND FORD
JAMESTOWN
ALBANY
BURKESVILLE
GLASGOW
CAVE CITY
BOWLINGGREEN
MORGANTOWN
GREEN
RUSSELLVILLE
ELKTON
HOPKINSVILLE
CADIZ
CANTON
TROY
DRESDEN
UNION CITY
OBION
TROY
HICKMAN
BOYDSVILLE
MOUTH
SANDY
CALEDONIA
ARNOLD
MILLIGAN
COLUMBUS
BELMONT
NORFOLK
BIRDS
POINT
CAIRO
OHIO
MISSISSIPPI RIVER
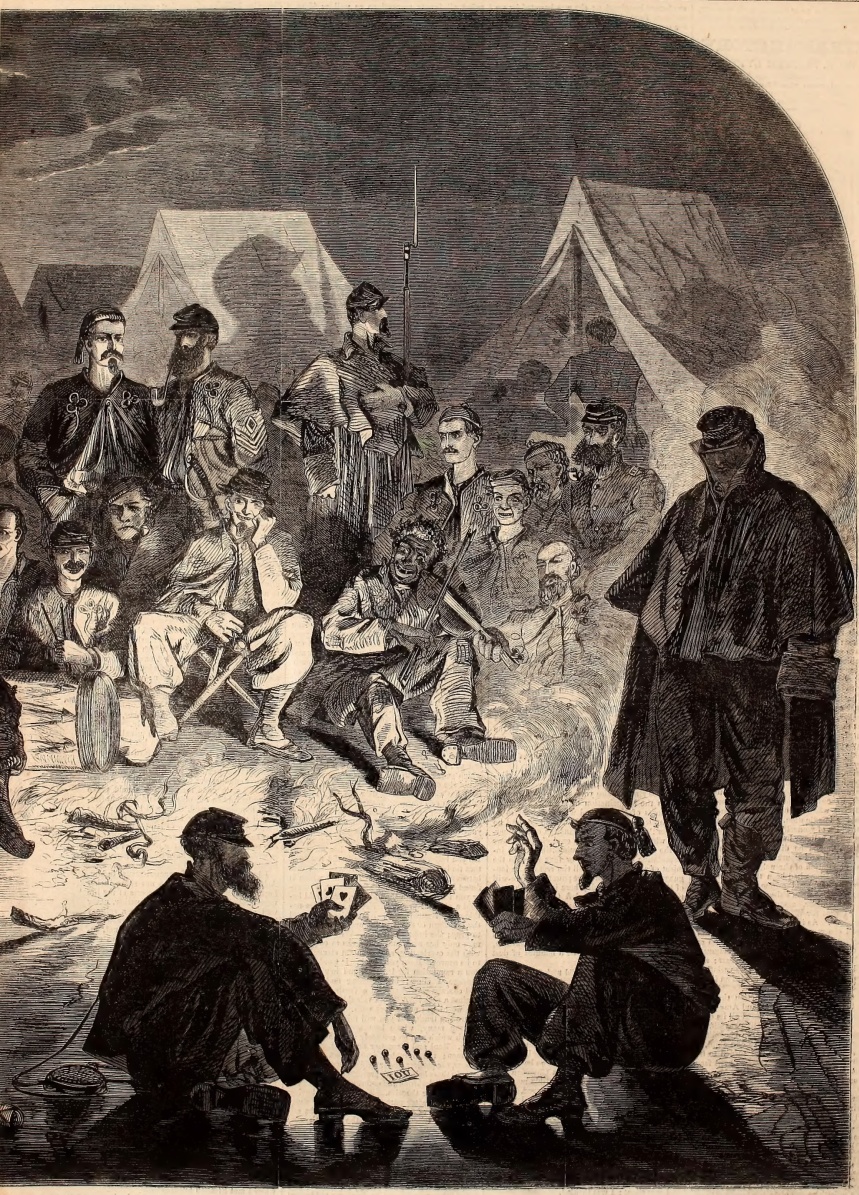
MONTICELLO
SOMERSET
LAFAYETTE
BRADFORDSVILLE
HARRODSBURG
SPRINGFIELD
LEBANON
NASHVILLE
FRANKLIN
SCOTTSVILLE
TOMPKINSVILLE
GALLATIN
HARTSVILLE
CARTHAGE
LEBANON
ROME
CANEVILLE
GAINESBORO
WOODSTOCK
SMITHVILLE
MCMINNSVILLE
WARTRACE
MANCHESTER
TULLAHOMA
WINCHESTER
ATHENS
CHARLESTON
CLEVELAND
DALTON
CHATTANOOGA
RINGGOLD
TUNNEL HILL
CROSSVILLE
CARTHAGE
GAINESBORO
CELINA
LIVINGSTON
JAMESTOWN
ALBANY
MONTGOMERY
SPARTA
SPENCER
PIKEVILLE
ALTAMONT
SEWANEE
POWELTON
JASPER
STEVENSON
BRIDGEPORT
SCOTTSBORO
STEVENSON
HUNTSVILLE
DECATUR
ATHENS
ELKTON
PULASKI
FAYETTEVILLE
SHELBYVILLE
MURFREESBORO
LEBANON
NASH

A BIVOUAC FIRE



ON THE POTOMAC.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York].

A STRANGE STORY.

By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON.

[Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."]

CHAPTER XLVI.

JULIUS FABER and Amy Lloyd staid in my house three days, and their presence gave to me a sense of healthful security and peace. Amy wished to visit her father's house, and I asked Faber, in taking her there, to seize the occasion to see Lilian, that he might communicate to me his impression of a case so peculiar. I prepared Mrs. Ashleigh for this visit by a previous note. When the old man and the child came back both brought me comfort. Amy was charmed with Lilian, who had received her with the sweetness natural to her real character, and I loved to hear Lilian's praise from those innocent lips.

Faber's report was still more calculated to console me:

"I have seen, I have conversed with her long and familiarly. You were quite right—there is no tendency to consumption in that exquisite, if delicate, organization; nor do I see cause for the fear to which your statement had prejudiced me. That head is too nobly formed for any constitutional cerebral infirmity. In its organization ideality, wonder, veneration are large, it is true, but they are balanced by other organs, now perhaps almost dormant, but which will come into play as life passes from romance into duty. Something at this moment evidently oppresses her mind. In conversing with her, I observe abstractions, vacillations: I am so convinced of her truthfulness, that if she has once told you she returned your affection, and pledged to you her faith, I should, in your place, rest perfectly satisfied that whatever be the cloud that now rests on her imagination, and for the time obscures the idea of yourself, it will pass away."

Faber was a believer in the main divisions of phrenology, though he did not accept all the dogmas of Gall and Spurzheim; while, to my mind, the refutation of phrenology in its fundamental propositions had been triumphantly established by the lucid arguments of Sir Wm. Hamilton.* But when Faber rested on phrenological observations, assurances in honor of Lilian, I forgot Sir W. Hamilton, and believed in phrenology. As iron girders and pillars expand and contract with the mere variations of temperature, so will the strongest conviction on which the human intellect rests its judgment vary with the changes of the human heart; and the building of Gall and Spurzheim, while than one person has told me that you are looking ill and jaded. So you are! And the town now is hot and unhealthy. You must come to Derval Court for a week or so. You can ride into town every day to see your patients. Don't refuse. Margrave, who is still with me, sends all kind messages, and bade me say that he entreats you to come to the house at which he also is a guest."

I started. What had the Scin-Laeca required of me, and obtained to that condition my promise? "If you are asked to the house at which I also am a guest, you will come; you will meet and converse with me as guest speaks to guest in the house of a host!" Was this one of the coincidences which my reason was bound to accept as coincidences and nothing more? But, tut! Was I returning again to my "hallucinations?" Granting that Faber and common sense were in the right, what was this Margrave? An ordinary mortal, to whose friendship, acuteness, and energy I was under the deepest obligations; to whom I was indebted for active services that had saved not only life from a serious danger, acquitted my honor of a horrible suspicion. "I thank you," I said to Strahan, "I will come; not, indeed, for a week, but, at all events, for a day or two."

"That's right; I will call for you in the carriage at six o'clock. You will have done your day's work by then!"

"Yes, I will so arrange."

On our way to Derval Court that evening Strahan talked much about Margrave, of whom, nevertheless, he seemed to be growing weary.

"His high spirits are too much for me," said he; "and then so restless—so incapable of sustained quiet conversation. And, clever though he is, he can't help me in the least about the new house I shall build. He has no notion of construction. I don't think he could build a barn."

I thought you did not like to demolish the old house, and would content yourself with pulling down the more ancient part of it?"

"True. At first it seemed a pity to destroy so handsome a mansion; but you see, since poor Sir Philip's manuscript, on which he set such store, has been lost mutilated, I fear, to allow me to effect his wish with regard to it, I think I ought at least scrupulously to obey his other whims. And, besides—I don't know—there are odd noises about the old house. I don't believe in haunted houses, still there is something dreary in strange sounds at the dead of night, even if made by rats, or winds through decaying rafters. You, I remember at college, had a taste for architecture, and can draw plans. I wish to follow out Sir Philip's design, but on a smaller scale, and with more attention to comfort."

Thus he went on to run, as satisfied to find me a silent and attentive listener. We arrived at the mansion an hour before sunset, and, entering light rooms full against the many windows cased in mouldering pilasters, and making the general dilapidation of the whole place yet more mournfully evident.

It was but a few minutes to the dinner hour. I went up at once to the room appropriated to me—but the coat I had before occupied. Strahan had already got together a new establishment. I was glad to find in the servant who attended me an old acquaintance. He had been in my own employ when I first settled at L——, and left me to get married. He and his wife were now both in Strahan's service. He spoke warmly of his new master and his contentment with his situation, while he unpacked my carpet-bag and assisted me to change my dress. But the chief object of his talk and his praise was Mr. Margrave.

"A wonderful fine gentleman, by the first fine day in May!"

Margrave was always popular with women and people—common people in any class—popular with those who did not see nor converse much with him.

When I came into the dining-room Margrave and Strahan were both there. The former was blithe and genial, as usual, in his welcome. At dinner, and during the whole evening till we retired severally to our own rooms, he was the principal talker; recounting incidents of travel, always very loosely strung together, jesting, goodhumoredly enough, at Strahan's sudden hobby for building, then putting questions to me about mutual acquaintances, but never waiting for an answer, and every now and then, as if at random, startling us with some brilliant aphorism or some suggestion drawn from abstract science or unfamiliar erudition. The whole effect was sparkling, but I could well understand that, if long continued, it would become oppressive. The mind has need of pauses of repose—intervals of escape not only from the flesh, but even from the mind. A man of the loftiest intellect will experience times when his intellect not only fatigues him, but amidst its most original conceptions, amidst its proudest triumphs, has a something trite and commonplace compared with one of those vague intimations of a spiritual destiny which are not within the ordinary domain of reason; and, gazing abstractedly into space, will leave suspended some problem of severest thought, or uncompleted some golden palace of imperial poesy, to indulge the passive instinct that do not differ from those of an innocent, quiet child! The soul has a long road to travel—from time through eternity. It demands its halting hours of contemplation. Contemplation is serene. But with such wants of an immortal fragmentarial spirit, Margrave had no fellowship, no sympathy; and for myself, I need scarcely add that the lines I have just traced I should not have written at the date at which my narrative has now arrived.

CHAPTER XLIX.

I HAD no case that necessitated my return to L—— the following day. The earlier hours of the forenoon I devoted to Strahan and his building plans. Margrave flitted in and out of the room fitfully as an April sunbeam, sometimes singing himself on a sofa and reading for a few minutes one of the volumes of the ancient mystics, in which Sir Philip's library was so rich. I remember it was a volume of Proclus. He read that crabbed and semi-barbarous Greek with a fluency that surprised me. "I picked up the ancient Greek," said he, "years ago in learning the modern." But the book soon tired him; and then he would come and, after the orderly enjoying Strahan's peevishness at interruption; then he would throw open the window and leap down, chasing one of his wild savage airs; and in another moment he was half hid under the drooping boughs of a broad lime-tree, amidst the antlers of deer that gathered fondly round him. In the afternoon my host was called away to attend some visitors of importance, and I found myself on the grass before the house, right in view of the mausoleum, and alone with Margrave.

I turned my eyes from that dumb House of Death wherein rested the corpse of the last lord of the soil, so strangely murdered, with a strong desire to speak out to Margrave the doubts respecting himself that tortured me. But, setting aside the promise to the contrary, which I had given, or dreamed I had given, to the Luminous Shadow—to fulfill that desire would have been impossible—impossible to any one gazing on that handsome, careless face. I think I see him now as I saw him then; a white doe, that even my presence could not scare away from him, stood patiently by his side, looking up at him with her soft eyes. He stood there like the incarnate principle of mythological sensuous life. I have before applied to him that illustration: let the repetition be pardoned. Impossible, I repeat it, to say to that creature, face to face; "Art thou the master of demoniac arts and the instigator of secret murders?" As if from redundant happiness within himself, he was humming, or rather cooing, a strain of music, so sweet, so sweet, so wildly sweet, and so unlike the music one hears from virginals in crowded rooms! I passed my hand over my forehead in bewilderment and awe.

"An Eton hymn," I said, unconsciously—"are there, indeed, such prodigies in Nature?"

"Nature!" he cried, catching up the word; "talk to me of Nature! Talk of her, the wondrous blissful Mother! Mother I may well call her. I am her spoiled child, her darling—But oh, to the, poor man, or to one sight of Nature!—to rot, senseless, whether under these turfs or within those dead walls—"

I could not resist the bitter irony.

"Like you murdered man! murdered, and by whom?"

"By whom? I thought that was clearly proved!"

"The hand was proved; what influence moved the hand?"

"Tush! the poor wretch spoke of a Demon! Who can tell? Nature herself is a grand destroyer. See that pigeon's bird, in its beak a writhing worm! All Nature's children live to take life;* none, indeed, so lavishly as man. What beautiful slaughtered, not to satisfy the irresistible, sting of hunger, but for the wanton ostentation of a feast, which he has scarcely taste, or for the sport that he finds in destroying. We speak with such a measure of these prey; what beast of prey is so dire a ravager as man? So cruel and so remorseless? Look at yon flock of sheep, bred and fattened for the shambles, and this hind that I caress, when the season comes, by the park-keeper, should I refuse to shoot her because of the caress?"

"It is true," said I, "a grim truth. And, on the setting day. The sun so gentle, is full of terror in her deeps when our thought descends into their abyss!"

Strahan now joined us with a party of country visitors.

"Margrave is the man to show you the beauties of this park," said he. "Margrave knows every bosk and dingle, twisted old thorn-tree, or opening glade, in its intricate, undulating ground."

Margrave seemed delighted at this proposition, and as he led us through the park, though he was not a botanist, I think he was better than one seemed fatigued. For the pleasure he felt in pointing out detached beauties which escaped an ordinary observer. Sometimes, He did not talk as talks the poet or the painter; but at some lovely effect of light among the tremulous leaves, some sudden glimpse of a sportive rivulet below, he would halt, point it out to us in silence, and with a kind of childlike ecstasy in his own bright face that seemed to reflect the life and the bliss of the blithe summer-day itself.

Thus seen, all my doubts in his dark secret nature faded away. I felt no horror, all my hate it was impossible to resist the charm that breathed round him, not to feel a tender, affectionate sympathy drawn to him as to some fair, happy child. Well might he call himself the Darling of Nature! Was he not the mysterious likeness of the Luminous Shadow, the Apollo, lo in one aspect, divine as Typhoon in another?

CHAPTER L.

"WHAT a strange-looking cane you have, Sir!" said a little girl, who was one of the party, and who had entwined her arm round Margrave's. "Let me look at it."

"Yes," said Strahan; "that cane, or rather walking-staff, of Margrave's is worth looking at. He bought it in Egypt, and declares that it is very ancient."

This staff seemed constructed from a reed; looked at, it seemed light, in the hand it felt heavy: it was of a pale, faded yellow, wrought with black rings at equal distances, and graven with half-obliterated characters that seemed hieroglyphic. I hastened to have sent Margrave with it before, but I had never noticed it with any attention till now, when it was passed from hand to hand. At the head of the cane there was a large unpolished stone of a dark blue.

"Is this a pebble or a jewel?" asked one of the party.

"I can not tell you its name," said Margrave; "but it is said to cure the bite of serpents,"

* May I be pardoned, since Allen Fenwick does not confess, in his reply, the title fallacy contained in Margrave's remarks on the destroying agency of Nature, if I earnestly commend to the general reader the careful perusal of chapter xiii., page 120, of Dr. Duckland's Bridgewater Treatise—Geology and Mineralogy—in the "Aggregate of animal enjoyment increased and that of pain diminished by the existence of carnivorous race." Nothing in the mind can surpass the terseness and simplicity with which the truth of that proposition is worked out to the vindication of the great drama of universal life.

† The following description of a stone at Corfu, celebrated as an antidote to the venom of the serpent's bite, was given to me by an eminent scholar and legal functionary in that island:

"Description of the Blue Stone.—This stone is of an oval shape, 1½ in. long, ⅞ broad, ⅓ thick, and, having been broken formerly, it now set in gold.

"When a person is bitten by a poisonous snake, the bite must be opened by a cut of a lancet or razor both ways, and the stone applied within twenty-four hours. The stone then attaches itself firmly on the wound, and when it has done its office falls off, the cure is then complete: the stone must then be thrown into milk, wherein upon it vomits the poison it has absorbed, which remains green on the top of the milk, and the stone is then again fit for use.

"The stone has been from time immemorial in the family of Ventura, of Corfu, a house of Italian origin, and is notorious, as that peasants immediately apply for its aid. The virtues have been imparted by the fracture. Its nature or composition are unknown.

and has other supposed virtues—a talisman, in short.

He here placed the staff in my hands, and bade me look at it with care. Then he changed the conversation and renewed the way, leaving the staff with me, till, suddenly, I forced it back on him. I could not have explained why, but its touch, as it warmed in my clasp, seemed to send through my whole frame a singular thrill, and a strange sickness. I no longer felt my own weight—as if I walked on air.

Our rambles came to a close; the visitors went away; I re-entered the house through the sashwindow of Forman's study; Margrave threw his hat and staff on the table, and amused himself while examining minutely the tracery on the mantle-piece. Strahan and myself left him thus occupied, and going into the adjoining library, resumed our task of examining the plans for the new house. I continued to draw outlines and sketches of various alterations tending to simplify and contract Sir Philip's general design. Margrave soon joined us, and this time he was seat patiently beside our table, watching me use ruler and compass with unwonted attention.

"I wish I could draw," he said; "but I can do nothing useful."

"Rich men like you," said Strahan, peevishly, "can engage others, and are better employed in rewarding good artists than in making bad drawings themselves."

"Perhaps. I can employ others; and—Fenwick, when you have finished with Strahan I will ask your permission to employ you, though without reward: the task I will impose on you will not take you a minute."

I threw down myself back in his chair, and seemed to fall into a doze.

The dressing-bell rang; Strahan put away the plans—rubbed, they were now pretty well finished and decided on.

Margrave woke up as our host left the room to dress, and drawing me toward another table in the room, sat down before me one of those mysterious books, and, pointing to an old wood-cut, said, "I will ask you to copy this for me; it pretends to be a likeness of Solomon's famous seal. I have a whimsical desire to have a copy of it. You observe two triangles interlaced and inserted in a circle. The miracle, in short. Yes, just so. You need not add the astrological characters, they are the senseless superfluous accompaniments of the learner who wrote this book. But the pentacle itself has an intelligible meaning; it belongs to the only universal language, the language of symbol, in which all men that think—around, and above, and below us—can establish communion of thought. If in the existent universe there be one constitutive principle can be detected, it is that principle in which consists the most positive of all the sciences, viz., the geometrical; and in every region of the world in which magic pretends to a writer character, I find that its hieroglyphics are geometrical figures. Is it not probable that the most positive of all the sciences should thus lend its angles and circles to the use of—what shall I call it?—the most positive of all arts, in the word—the ignorance of dealers in magic!"

He took up the paper on which I had hastily sketched the triangles and the circle, and went out of the room, chanting the serpent-charmer's song.

COLONEL RANKIN'S LANCERS.

WE publish on page 805 an illustration of Colonel Rankin's Regiment of Lancers, now in quarters at Detroit, Michigan, from a sketch kindly sent us by Mr. B. R. Evans. This is the regiment about which the Canadian authorities have made such a noise, and on account of which Colonel Rankin has been dismissed from the Canadian militia. It is to be 1600 strong, armed and equipped like the 16th Regiment of British Lancers. The principal weapon used will be the lance, whose haft will be 10 feet long, and the blade 14 inches. It is held upright when marching, the end resting on a portion of the stirrup. In charging, it is thrust forward so as to project considerably beyond the horse's head, the haft being attached to the rider's arm by a strong cord. In addition to the lance, each man will be provided with sabre rifle, and pistol. The lance is known as "la reine des armes blanches," and well-drilled regiments of lancers have always been deemed very formidable in the field. It is understood that Colonel Rankin's Regiment will be incorporated into the Regular army, and will be retained in service after the war. It is to take the field during the present month.

The French Lancers have always been considered the flower of their cavalry. The men are the tallest and finest in the service, the horses equal to those of the famous cuirassiers. It is understood that General M'Clellan, during his tour of inspection in Europe, was much impressed w i t h the value of lancers as an object to other service, and recommended the adoption of the weapo n by our War Department. Colonel Rankin's regiment is the forefruit of the suggestion: and all that we hear about it is likely to give a good account of itself, and make the old cavalry regiments look to their fame.

"A WHITE DOE, THAT EVEN MY PRESENCE COULD NOT SCARE AWAY FROM HIM, STOOD PATIENTLY BY HIS SIDE," ETC.

* "In a cave where two were stung at the same time by serpents, the stone was applied to one, who recovered, but the other, for whom it could not be used, died.

"It never failed but once, and then it was applied after the twenty-four hours.

"Its color is so dark as not to be distinguished from black."

"Corfu, 7th Nov., 1860."

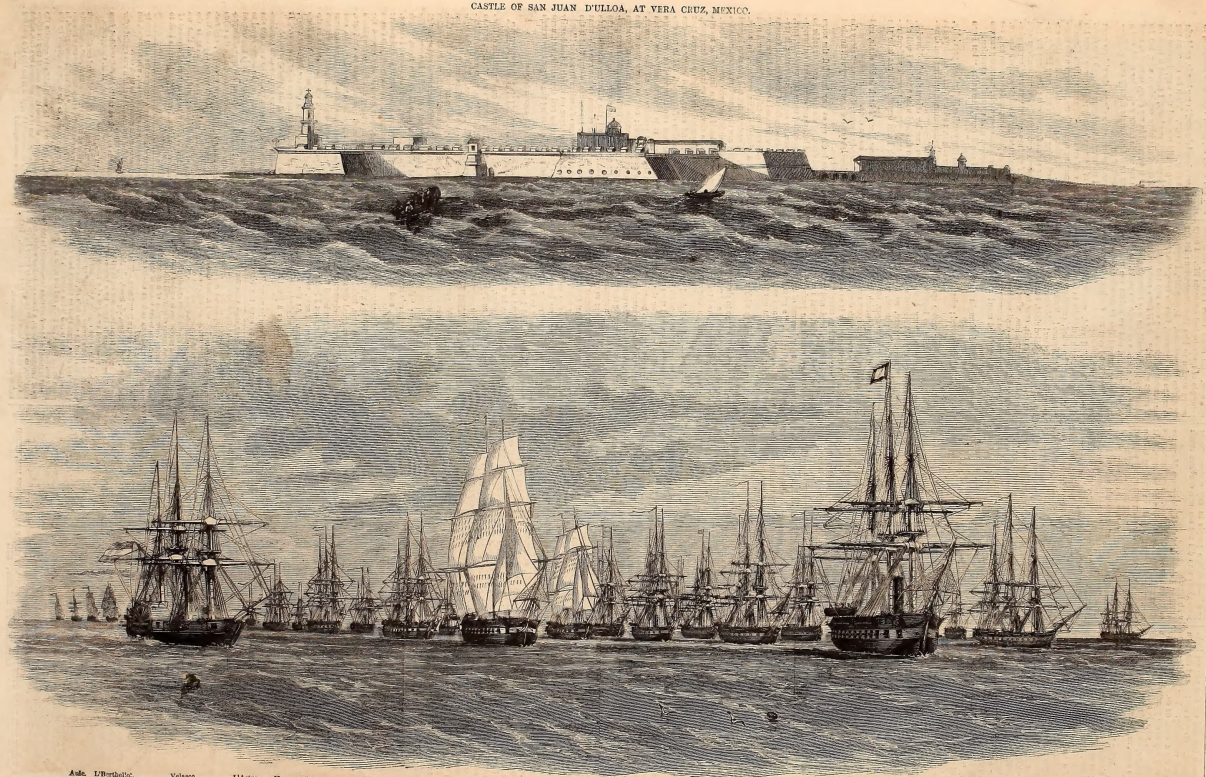
Sir Emerson Tennant, in his popular and excellent work on Ceylon, gives an account of "snake stones" apparently similar to the one at Corfu, except that they are "unusually black and highly polished," and which are applied, in much the same manner, to the wounds inflicted by the cobra capella.

Query.—Might it not be worth while to ascertain the chemical properties of these stones, and, if they be efficacious in the extraction of venom received by a bite, might they not be as successful if applied to the bite of a mad dog as that of a cobra capella?

CASTLE OF SAN JUAN D'ULLOA, AT VERA CRUZ, MEXICO.



THE COMBINED SPANISH, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH EXPEDITION AGAINST MEXICO.—[SEE PAGE 807.]

'TWEEN DECKS OF A UNITED STATES MAN-O'-WAR IN ACTION.

WOUNDED.

I SHALL never forget that day. We were all sitting on a rock down by the beach just under the cliffs. Sitting talking of the war, speculating and discussing. Of course we should win the day —every day. Who doubted that? At the end of these three months we should see this foolish rebellion half, if not quite mastered! It was mainly the end now—only think!—and our boys all coming back safe. So we talked on that day—that day of Monday, July——. It was quite late in the afternoon too, for we do not get the papers early at Newport, and we never knew we were talking right in the face of death about our boys all coming back safe. All coming back safe? Ah me!

Then Camilla Payne read that sonnet of Dobell's —"Home in War Time"—just the sweetest, saddest thing. I hear her melting tones now, saying softly, while the waves murmured an accompaniment,

"She turned the fair page with her fairer hand—
More fair and frail than it was wont to be;
Over each remembered thing he loved to see
She lingered, and as with a fairy's wand
Enchanted it to order. Oft she fanned
New notes into the sun; and as a bee
Hangs through a brake of bells, so murmured she.
And so her patient love did understand
The reliquary poem. Upon the sill
She fed his favorite bird. 'Ah, Robin, sing!
He loves thee.' Then she touches a sweet string
Of soft remembrance toward the Eastern hill
Smiles all her soul—for him who can not hear.
The waves sound high at his curtain ear."

As she ended Marian Hope burst forth into a passion of weeping, crying brokenly, too, between the sobs, "I think it is horrid, horrid, that ending!"

St. George was there; he also shook his head at that last line, saying it was in bad taste certainly. It were better rung to some lofter change of comparison.

"Horrid, horrid!" still sobbed Marian—"what made you read it, Camilla? How could you?"

And thus till we thought her a baby, and St. George told her so, bending over and dropping a piece of sea-grass on her cheek. But he did not tell her so a second time, nor did we—but wait.

Bending over, dropping a piece of sea-grass on her wet cheek, saying in mercy—mercy—for her "nervous nonsense," calling "May! May! you little baby," he suddenly flung up his head at the sound of a gallop crunching upon the gravelly road beyond.

Yes, down he came, Richard Ware, riding his petted horse as that hot day at a hard gallop. Down he came, his head dropped into his breast, his mouth settled into a mournful stillness, which none of us understood. None of us but Marian Hope—her soul was prescient that day. Down he came, leaving his horse to the care of the first charge of a chance group on the beach, while he walked over to where we were sitting.

"What's the matter, Dick?" St. George shouted—"has the bank jilted you, or stocks fallen? Your face is like a death-warrant."

Something here stirred me to look at Marian Hope. That look shivered me. She had risen, and stood, hands clasped, eyes gazing wistfully into some mystical beyond, and an expression of some new knowledge and despair clouding her whole aspect.

From her I turned back again to Richard. He answered some word to St. George's jesting question, but with a still graver look held out to him a private dispatch. As he read it a whiteness came over his face. He raised his hand to his forehead, pressing hard, then dashed it down, paper and all, turning away with such a sick agony of pain in his face, that I knew the truth must be the shadow of death. I caught the "message" as it fell—just a few words:

"Lieutenant ——wounded—his feared mortally. Commissions to his brother St. George."

To Richard Ware, as a cousin of St. George's, this message came, and the painful duty of "communicating" it. Lieutenant ——, the prettiest young fellow! How well I remembered, only a year ago, his manly, modest electioneering—"the nearest to the throne," Ware said—in support of our Republican candidate! And there he was lying wounded, perhaps mortally; and here—I guessed what seemed the unreal save one—the woman who loved him, Marian Hope.

I went up to her, I put my arm about her, whispering her name with me, Marian; I felt that "something to tell you." She did not heed. The locked hands did not unclasp; the glazed eyes saw never an object in the actual scene before her. I knew upon what her vision dwelt. A far, far field, trampled out of all its summer freshness by myriad feet, by rolling wheels, by something more awful still—by shattering shot and shell, and stained by the blood of human lives. On this stained field she saw the mystical splendor, all the while, of blue hair dabbled and stiff, all the comely strength powerless now, at the mercy of every circumstance, wounded to the death, no hand to soothe, to help, no voice to whisper consolation in his extremity! This is what she saw with those glazed eyes, looking out far out beyond our reach.

Again I essayed to recall her. My womanly sense of silence rose up in alarm at this unconscious revelation of her soul.

"Come away," I whispered again; "I have something more to tell you, May."

It never so much as penetrated the outmost range of her understanding; she did not even hear my voice. In despair I looked about me. I met the eyes of Richard Ware. There were tears in them, I thought, and there was a strange look of mingled pity and pain upon his usually smiling face. At my glance he came forward. He read the story clearly as I, and he was a gentleman. I felt then that women could trust him with all the secrets of their love, and he would deal gently, reverently. He dealt reverently now. I don't know how it was. Some touch of the hand, some word low spoken, in a moment brought her out of her trance to a sense of present control; and in a moment more we went walking back, two and two, Richard Ware leading his horse as he walked beside her.

The whole town seemed changed as we entered it: a hush as of death spread over the streets, broken by knots of busy talkers here and there; and the low, wide house where we six were staying, always so cheery with music and laughter before, now echoed only grave, anxious voices and lowered tones. We went in, not as we had gone outbright with happy hopes and the joyous anticipation of our very first coming to the shore—but heavy-hearted, and filled with terrible forebodings, and an awful actual sense of loss. My room was just opposite Marian Hope's, and going up together, she asked, would I come in?

I remember perfectly, as I crossed the threshold, the chill air that blew in through the window blowing through the strings of an Æolian harp, shut in by the sash, in a mild, sweet strain of ghostly melody that was like a ghost; and just then from the Constitution a gun boomed sullenly. I was so shocked, so really frightened and nervous by this that I think I should have cried out but for the singular effect it seemed to have upon Marian. A mere coincidence, I said to myself; why should it stir me so? A mere coincidence! Well, you shall see for yourself.

Marian at the point I speak of suddenly stopped, looked expectantly, and then waited, with that same wistful air as before, but with a listening expression in her face, in her attitude quite new. And the time I was counting by that strange association of stillness, so to speak—a nightmare feeling that held me, spite of myself, from moving or speaking. It was a time, but a few seconds and age, and when she turned to me to speak I knew a clock was striking eight somewhere. She said,

"Did you hear, Lucy?"

Did I hear what? I heard the wild wailing of the Æolian strings; I heard the booming of a gun across the water; I heard a clock chime eight. She did not mean this—I knew it ere she spoke. But what?

Coming closer, bending down upon me a gaze of blended awe and unutterable human love, she whispered,

"Laura, I heard him call me. I saw, or dreamed, and she here covered her eyes with her hands, speaking lowly—"a little knoll, grass grown and rocky—and he, but he was dead. I saw that Southern sun, shining down upon the dearest head! You know whose, Laura; you have read my heart today. With the distinctness of a dream a distant bugle sound; with the booming of the gun I saw a sheet of white smoke; and then, oh then, dear Laura, a white face turned from me, ashen, ghastly and faint, but the eyes looking clearly into mine: clearly, Laura, clearly I saw them; do not say I did not—pitying us in your heart—pitying to stop the anticipated denial of her vision; a denial I never thought of making. "Then," and her voice hushed itself yet, "he shall be mine, Lucy, mine, urgent call—'Marian! Marian!' And then, Lucy?"

My mind began to work independently now, and I at once brought up all the possibilities against a plan like this, through which she only shook her head, saying quietly, "I must go."

Of course I must go. There was only the extravagant expression of her state. I had no more idea of her going, or of her believing it possible in her sober mind, than I had of going myself. I little knew her.

Leaving her, as I supposed, in a quieter condition, I went down to the dining-room. It is I found but one person, Richard Ware—Dick Ware, familiarly and naturally. And a good deal what you term a "Dick" he looked, handsome, brilliant, with a trifle, nay more than a trifle, of the élégant, had this Richard; one who provoked me sometimes by his airy manner, his easy cynicism, his French follies and foppishness; but slipping along in the smooth groove of luxury, and "the long, long course of peace," he had not had the desperation, born of his pampered tastes, flung himself down this shallow stream. The "long, long cankers of peace" were over, and the sun of the cannon was at least rousing him. The roar of the cannon—what else? I had my thoughts, but I kept still.

Entering the room, I went straight up to him, standing as he was, facing the window. He did not hear my footstep—only, as I brushed him, the rustle of gown. Then he turned, with a gesture of disappointment, yet relief, quickly veiled by courtesy.

I waited for me to speak. I would not. I would not hazard a single thought, where thoughts were so costly. He waited for me to speak of Marian, but Marian was my friend, my woman, and I was a woman. I might have told Richard Ware my own secrets, for I knew that underneath his frivolity was a man reposed. I left Marian Hope's until there was no need of keeping.

Presently he broke the silence himself.

"Miss Hope was much shocked," he said; "she is very excitable, or sympathetic."

I signified assent to this guarded speech, but I gave him nothing in return.

"I trust she is more composed—have you just come from her?"

Pausing again I lifted my eyes in the moonlight to observe him. He searched them with a look, and then we scrutinized each other at the end. So he dropped all masks, and exclaimed in a soft, vehement whisper,

"She loves him!"

I had no need to assent nor dissent. "Invisible truth is stronger than indisputable appearances," and we had dealt in both. But the ice once broken, he went on in a fervid flow of talk, not fully free in words, but breathing passionate depth in its overlaying of eloquent generalities—a talk suited to the hour, touching upon this first struggle, the sacrifice and loss—of the present individual grief that had come into our circle—of suspense and anxious hope deferred, and fancy's awful horrors.

Pity and tender consideration rang through his words, but a tenser string of pain was vibrating in a long quivering sob—a tooth of suffering that sharpened its fangs at another point than "pity and tender consideration."

"She will suffer most," he added; "and if he dies, which is probable, you know, it will be a long time; but she is young—she must recover in mind—"

The wreathing sprays of the balm-vine trailing in at the window were here suddenly caught, crushed into his hand against his mouth, as if he were loathing himself for thought and word, and so broke off; but the balm-vine brought then no balm of solace to Richard Ware.

By-and-by he resumed:

"Such a splendid young fellow as he was! It is hard to believe him lost to us. A hard fate for him, right in the face of youth and glory. But yet, the wine of life was very sweet in his cup—no bitter. Young, ardent, earnest, and in divine possession of God's first gift, he did not live to lose or change. No"—dropping still lower all masks now, speaking to passionate pain in the passionate night of summer rain and lightning flashes—"no, I envy him—envy him; with such possession it were sweet to lie there wounded, dying, Laura!"

I spanned his wrist with my hand as I said,

"You are mistaken, he never knew—nor ever asked to know."

"Ah"—long drawn, and a lift of the head—"is it so? She gives him so much voluntarily. Perhaps, perhaps"—he shuddered—and turned away from himself, breaking off his words, maybe his thought; and touching my hand, said "Good-night," turning to the door, and coming back to whisper, "Let me serve her, if service is needed."

It was late morning when I awoke, after this vivid night of fever and thought was Marian Hope. Dressing hastily, I sought her. Her room was quite still; was it vacant, or had she too overslept? A servant turned the corner at my third knock.

Miss Hope had gone down some time ago. I went down—I looked quickly into the parlor—she was not there; out upon the verands—nor there was she. As I stood wondering, the door of an united two-story house in front of Ware beckoned me in. Glancing into his face, and the face of her who sat in the deep window, Marian Hope, I knew the secret was all told. I was sure, certain even.

Through the clefts of confession her soul had grown stronger. His, since yesterday shrouded in solemn night, had entirely settled itself into quiet during this interview.

There was a burning depth in the deep darks of his eyes, and his face was marvellously pale, as I was silently raging beneath the calm exterior. I pitied him, with a sob rising in my throat. In a few rapid moments he made acquaintance with the plan of her determination. It was more feasible than I had thought, though startling. To go out to Richmond!

"How is that possible?" I exclaimed, breathless.

"More possible than you think. Do you know that my uncle is there, doing hard forward and, with a ghost of a smile, whispered a name that thrilled me with surprise—a name I shall not reveal here—a famous name for high distinction, for whose powerful influence, which she did not doubt obtaining, she would compass her desires.

I looked at Marian Hope. A proud, reserved girl in her usual action, how the sublime heights of love had carried her beyond conventions and womanly reticences! Yet I marvelled not why she chose Richard Ware for this confession—Richard Ware of all others. Perhaps my face expressed my thought, for she suddenly explained:

"I have known Richard all my life, you know; he is like a brother, or what a brother should be:" and here she looked with a swift impulse of grateful gratitude, of simple affection, brushing that soft, beautiful hair into his hands, where she hid her other face a moment in thanking. Carved in stone the face that bent above her might have been, but for the troubled eyes misty with unshed tears.

Lifting her face at length: "And he owes all his kindness by accompanying me to Washington."

"From whence—" I began.

"From whence I shall find means of communicating with my uncle, and then proceed onward."

She stopped—a shadow crossed her face—then looking up clearly:

"Friends, understand me completely. I go out and as the lover of Richard Ware, but to restore him yet"—very clearly now, quite proudly indeed, with inscrutable eyes of impassioned faith—"yet do I love him!"

A reverent silence fell upon us, and out of it she glided from the room. Noon came restless and fevered, with the last news of the dead—the wounded. Night at last brought us tidings.

There was one item never to be forgotten by three of us, by Marian Hope perhaps by the rest of the world. It told how, after hours of neglected suffering—hours that passed through a night and lengthened into a day—found at the close a gallant young officer, lying upon a certain knoll where he had fallen, was again wounded by a chance shot.

My spiritual sense at once took in the meaning of this; the relation was quite minute, and the signs unmistakable. But what was it? A coincidence!

I recalled the yesternight—the faint, wild prophecy of the wind-harp, the bugle-call heard by that strained ear, the sudden gun, the white puff and sheet of smoke—and then I remembered it was the close of the second day, and the clock was striking eight!

As I summed it all up a thrill ran through me, and I covered my face with my hands. I had heard of such things, but had thought little about them, given them little credence, perhaps; and now, how was I to dispose of this coincidence?

As I thought, into my room came a swift-gliding step, a silken rustle, and Marian Hope, in her dressing-robe, fluttered to my feet.

"Did you read it, Lucy?" was all she asked, with eyes clear as ether, and filled with a deep, internal light.

She knew that I remembered.

"And I go to-night," she murmured, bowing her head upon my folded hands.

The train was late at Richmond; and up and down the platform a gentleman of the stalest bearing waited and waited, with evident anxiety in his dark-bearded face. At length the locomotive's shrill hallo heralds approach, and in sweeps the long line of cars, bringing what he seeks—a lady in charge of a young Confederate officer.

"Maizy, Maizy, my child!" he says, tenderly, as he holds her a moment close to his breast. And at the old pet name of her childhood Marian recollings closer still, weeping out emotions which he as yet little understands, but which he endeavors to soothe in a fond, fatherly fashion. "Not in it, Maizy?" he goes on; "did you get frightened, my little Southern birdie, up there in the chilly North?"

Very dear to her uncle was Marian Hope—a "little Southern birdie," as he called her, for her dead mother, his only sister. Very dear; but she tried him sorely that night.

They were sitting alone together in the library, and she had told him her story—the whole story, omitting nothing—neither her involuntary love for the ubiquitous Coincidence or her very clear of the second day. It seems a hazardous experiment the unfolding of such a tale, but Marian Hope knew the man with whom she had to deal—a man of subtle intellect and an unusual delicacy of interior perception. He pondered a while over it, neither expressing surprise or incredulity, but in utter silence, regarding her with speculative interest now and then.

At last, "You came to see this man?" he said.

"I came to save him, to restore him if he yet lives." She had answered promptly, but her voice faltered now at the second possibility which she "if" suggested. There was no lack of surprise now in her listener's face, and, with a half smile at her temerity, he said,

"And how do you propose to do it?"

She bent upon him a look that was both ardent and believing—as he replied,

"You will give me the means."

"I?" He drew back, a cloud gathering upon her brow. "You have not what I want," he said.

Prepared for denial, for opposition, Marian assailed him in every vulnerable quarter, evincing a knowledge of his character and opportunities which startled and amazed him.

Perhaps he listened to her with less consternation than when it first dawned upon her secretly this man cherished in his soul a love for his country, under the broad bond of union; which no convulsions could shake off, no desire (which at times was disowning interest) to moderate, as far as his influence would allow him, the rash extremities of the times.

But what he could not comprehend from her, modified his acceptance of her entreaties, he at the same time decidedly, almost sternly, refused any co-operation.

"What an absurdly romantic plan!" he said, with a grim smile. "I to meddle with a prisoner of war because a girl who loves him asks it. Child, there are a hundred girls who might ask the same."

She winced a little, but answered, quietly, "Uncle, these girls are not your sister's child. It is I, 'Maizy,' who asks this of you. And he is wounded, fatally perhaps. If he yet lives, let him be home to die."

She dropped her head, with all its silken cloud of curls, against his head—curls whose touch he remembered as a child in a little white frock; she had lain in his breast. He looked at her pityingly a moment—the tears came into his eyes; then he spoke strangely with the words,

"He shall be well cared for, and you shall see him: ask no more."

"This way, Sir;" and the doctor turned into the low, wide room, whose windows were trellised with Virginia creepers and jessamine.

The young fellow lying on the couch there, just escaped from death, looked wonderingly at his apparent visitor, for whom the physician had just prepared him.

What could he want with him?

He was perfectly enlightened, though in guarded words. "My niece, Sir, who is with me now, spoke of you as a friend. I am desirous always to show to the fullest my power for assistance or loss in these unfortunate times." Mindful of his pride and honor, he had thus carefully generalized and simplified the position.

His niece! A scarlet flush spotted the pale cheek; a sudden conviction translated all the feverdream into actual cause—Marian Hope!

His visitor's suave, courteous sentences fell upon unheeding ears after this; undolooking down upon the man with whom she had dealt in the gloom country-seat of Marian's relative, certainly found captivity wearing rosy chains. But the patriotic heart beat truly; and amidst all the enchantments of love and idleness he yearned to take his place in the front of battle.

To again appeal to her uncle Marian knew would be useless. His decisions were unalterable. But,

"With true love's treacherous confidence,"

she had possessed herself with means, and found her way.

When we exalt the women of '76 to the disadvantage of those of our own times, it is well to remember such instances as this. Here was a woman bred in the utmost luxury; accustomed to life while more than any other, tends to individual gratification, and clouds the vision to great wrongs and personal sacrifice. Here was this woman throwing all her energies into a cause, and that cause the liberation of her lover from a safe captivity to sure separation and constant peril.

Time seemed to pass so merrily with those to whom it was not to be a time of separation. Marian's companion, who smiled so himself one day as he went out leaving them singing to a guitar accompaniment some sweet old love-song—smiled, thinking, "She says no more about his going home to die." That day the plan of escape was perfected, and at night the separation had taken place. Details are dangerous: let them pass.

But no heroine of the French revolution ever evinced more tact and skill in the accomplishment of her design than this girl who, six months ago, had found safety in a drum-belt or a bugle-case, some gay dance-measure, and whose days were occupied in the round of inanities which habit enforces. There was nothing wanting in this plan—pass nor countersign had she failed to obtain.

And left behind, with no means of communication between herself and her lover, unrepining and believing, she atones to her uncle for "true love's treacherous confidence" by a devotion as earnest and complete as her whole character. The very spirit to express

"I do not say the day is long and dreary,
For while thou art content to be away,
Loving in thee, O Love, I live half my days,
And reck not if mine own be sad and weary."

And through the long, long days she keeps her watch. The long, long days, God hallow them to thee, oh waiting heart!

It is November now. Only the other day we chronicled the return another Lord's-Iscal. In that perilous encounter, side by side fought our young hero of Manassas and his cousin, Richard Ware. Covered with glory, the brave Lieutenant returned to his post, but—" Richard Ware shot through the heart." That brave, true heart, which first received the first warrant on another many months ago—a summer morn, when the waves murmured, and birds sang, and the sun smiled calmly down, and a girl's sweetest soul thought her lover's first act of confession. The brave, true heart; all its yearnings are now satisfied, all its aspirations realized, while we drop our tears over his grave. In the mean time the roar of the cannon gods on, the drums beat, and the bugles blow, while other brave, true hearts are shedding their life-blood; but when women are content to watch alone while those they love "fight the good fight," and men fly from the allurements of home to encounter the dangers of battle, we may believe that not one drop of this costly blood shall be a useless sacrifice.

IMPORTANT FACTS.—Content writing for six months is done cheaper with Gold Pens than with Steel Pens: therefore, it is economy to use Gold Pens.

The Gold Pen remains unchanged by years of continued use, while the Steel Pen is ever changing by corrosion and wear: therefore, perfect uniformity of writing is obtained only by the use of the Gold Pen.

The Gold Pen is always ready and reliable, while the Steel Pen must be often condemned and a new one selected; therefore, there is a great saving of time in the use of the Gold Pen.

Gold is capable of receiving any degree of elasticity, so that the Gold Pen is exactly adapted to the hand of the writer; therefore, the nerves of the hand and arm are not injured, as they have to be the case by the use of Steel Pens.

See "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword," in the next column.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

AGENTS WANTED—to sell Yale's Flag of Stars and Military Goods and Stirring Packages. Agents who are now selling imitations, put up by other parties, are respectfully requested to send for their address and we will forward them a sample with circulars, which is one solitary item that they can make more money and give better satisfaction to purchasers than any other in market. Address J. W. YALE, Proprietor, Metropolitan Gift Book Store, Syracuse, New York.

RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.

Universally acknowledged to excel all others in the most desirable Features of a Piano-Forte Instruction Book.

Will be sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of Three Dollars.
OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

The best Books for Holiday Presents!!

Beautifully bound ENGLISH BIBLES, AMERICAN EPISCOPAL PRAYER BOOKS, CHURCH SERVICES, &c., &c., in calf, morocco, and extra gilt to all tastes and purposes.
SWAYNE IMPERIAL 4TO HYMNS FOR WEDDING PRESENTS, at prices from $15 to $50.
EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE,
Publishers to the Queen,
(☞ Branch of the London Establishment.) 646 Broadway, New York.

JOHNSON'S PATENT CAMP STOOLS.—Soldiers and others supplied at 490 Hudson Street, N. Y. Price 50 cents each. Liberal discount to Dealers.
N. J. has prepared a new and convenient Camp Seat for Ladies—a very desirable accompaniment in their walks through Central Park or elsewhere.

"The PEN is Mightier than the Sword."

THE GOLD PEN—THE BEST OF ALL PENS.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS.

The Best Pens in the World.

☞ On receipt of any of the following sums in cash or postages, the stationer will send by return mail, or otherwise as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens, selecting the same according to description, viz:

GOLD PENS, WITHOUT CASES.

For 25 cents, the Magg Pen; for 50 cents, the Lucky Pen; for 50 cents, the Always-Ready Pen; for 75 cents, the Elegant Pen; and for $1, the Excelsior Pen.

The sizes are, Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6.

THE SAME PENS IN HOLYOAKE'S EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For 50 cents, the Magg Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 25, the Elegant Pen; and for $1 50, the Excelsior Pen. These pens are well-finished, good writing Gold Pens, with Iridosmo Points, the sizes and nos. in every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens.

The terms "a, Morton," "Number," and "Quality" are stamped on the following Pens, and the Points on the Pens are, for six months, except against accident. The numbers indicate size only. No. 1 being the smallest, No. 6 the largest, adapted for the pocket; No. 4 the smallest, and No. 10 the largest hand-mouth Gold Pen, for the desk. Long and medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Nos. 8, 9, and 10, and made only of first quality. The engravings are fac similes of the sizes and styles.

BEST GOLD PENS, WITHOUT CASES.

For 75 cents, a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1, a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 4 pen 3d quality.

For $1 25, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 50, a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 75, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $2 25 a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

THE SAME GOLD PENS IN HOLYOAKE EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For $1 50, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 75 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2, a No. 3 Pen 1st quality, or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 50, a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $3, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $3 50 a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

GOLD PENS, ALL 1st QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED ED DESK-HOLDERS.

For $2, a No. 4 Pen; for $2 50, a No. 5 Pen; for $2 75, a No. 6 Pen; for $3 50, a No. 7 Pen.

For $4, a No. 5 Pen; for $4 50, a No. 6 Pen; and for $6, a No. 10 Pen.

The "Lucky" Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridosmin Points, carefully selected, and none of this quality are sold with the slightest flaw, which will spoil and ruin the closest grazing cut detected.

The "Lucky" Quality" are superior to any Pens made by him previous to the year 1860.

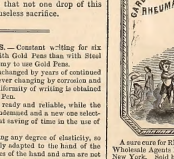
The "Always" Quality" Pens which shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity, and Good Writing Qualities (the only true standard) any Gold Pens made elsewhere.

In regard to the Cheap Gold Pens, he begs leave to say that, previous to operating in the New and Patented Machines, he could not have made as Good Writing and Durable Pen, for the price, but the Gold has been furnished gratuitously.

Address A. MORTON,
No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

FOR SALE by all dealers in this line throughout the country.

Any one sending a single letter post-stamp will receive a circular with the engravings above referred to.



A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agent C. W. GARDNER & CO., 44 Franklin St., New York. Sold by Apothecaries everywhere.

Card to Country News-Dealers.

The New York Mercury.

In consequence of the refusal of ROSS & TOUSEY to furnish any of their country agents to the publishers of THE MERCURY,—we desired to supply the newsmen through them with the same unique quantities of posters, show-cards, and circulars that are forwarded from our office to agents who receive their supplies from the other New York wholesale dealers—these gentlemen have ceased to receive any orders for the NEW YORK MERCURY.

The trade will continue to be supplied, as always heretofore, through the more enterprising-packing establishments of

H. DEXTER & CO.,
HAMILTON GOWDEN & FARRELLY,
JOHN F. FEEKS & CO.,
L. N. SHEAR & CO.,
WILLIAM SKELLY,
ORTON, DANIELS & JONES,
SAMUEL YATES, and
H. M. DE WITT.

as well as direct from the office of the publishers and proprietors,

CAULDWELL, SOUTHWORTH & WHITNEY.
Nos. 46 and 48 Ann Street, New York.

LIST OF THE RICH MEN OF BOSTON, with the amount of property owned in Real and Personal Estate, and the Taxes assessed on each individual. This List comprises 5000 names of Individuals and Firms. Being printed from the City Tax Book by order of the City Government, it is necessarily correct. Price 50 cents. Copies mailed free on receipt of price. Address A. WILLIAMS & CO., Publishers, 100 Washington Street, Boston.

☞ A few copies of the preceding yours at same price.

AGENTS.—Our new mammoth Price List of Watches, Jewelry, &c., is just out. It has a novel proposition for Price Paper Dealers! Mailed free anywhere. Address HUBBARD BROS., 85 Nassau Street, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smallest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, free by any address, on receipt of an order. E. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Head-Quarters for Jewelry.

A full assortment of all kinds appropriate for the Jewelry Envelope and Gift Jewelry Business. Persons can order the amount they would like to have sent, and pay the Express, and have the privilege of returning any thing they may with to. W. A. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, New York.

FROM THE HOUSE OF
J. B. LIPPINCOTT & COMPANY,
PHILADELPHIA.

I.
McClellan's U. S. Cavalry.

REGULATIONS AND INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE FIELD SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES CAVALRY IN TIME OF WAR. By GEORGE B. McCLELLAN, Major-General United States Army.

To which is added the Basis of Instruction for the United States Cavalry School, at the authorized Tactics, including the formation of regiments and squadrons, the duties and duties of officers, lessons in the trailing and use of the horse—illustrated by numerous diagrams, with the signals and calls now in use; also, instructions for officers and non-commissioned officers on outposts and patrol duty. With a drill for the use of cavalry on skirmishers, mounted and dismounted. 1 vol. 12mo. Fully illustrated. $1.50.

II.
Field Manual of Evolutions of the Line.

THE FIELD MANUAL OF EVOLUTIONS OF THE LINE, arranged in a tabular form, for the use of officers of the United States Infantry, being a sequel to the authorized United States Infantry Tactics. Translated, with adaptations to the United States Service, from the French of CHARLES PRIVAT DE CAPT, Henry Coppée, late Instructor in the U. S. Military Academy at West Point. Price 60 cents.

III.
Field Manual of Battalion Drill.

THE FIELD MANUAL OF BATTALION DRILL. Containing all the movements and manœuvres of the Battalion, with the commands arranged in tabular forms, and carefully explained. Translated from the French, with adaptation to the U. S. Service. By Capt. Henry Coppée, late Instructor in the U. S. Military Academy at West Point. Nearly ready.

IV.
McClellan's European Cavalry.

EUROPEAN CAVALRY, including details of the organization and cavalry service among the principal nations of Europe—comprising England, France, Russia, Prussia, Austria, and Sardinia. By GEORGE B. McCLELLAN, Major-General U. S. Army. 1 vol. 12mo. Fully illustrated. $1.25.

V.
Macleod's Surgery of the War in the Crimea.

Notes on the Surgery of the War in the Crimea, with remarks on the Treatment of Gunshot Wounds. By GEORGE H. B. MACLEOD, M.D., F.R.C.S., Surgeon to the Forces, Principal Medical Officer to the Forces. 1 vol. 12mo. $1 50.

☞ The Booksellers generally, or will be forwarded by mail (postpaid), on receipt of the price, by the Publishers.

NEW MUSIC.—THOMAS BAKER'S NEW WALTZ.
THE LAURA KEENE WALTZ.

The most beautiful and popular waltz of the season.
MORGAN & WATKIS, 451 & 453 Broadway, cor. Leonard.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be easily married, irrespective of age or position, prepossessing or otherwise, with a treatise on the arts of fascinating any person you wish. A previous scientific experiment which never fails. Free for 25 cents. Address T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Box 2200, Philadelphia.

Wanted—Commercial Agents, local and traveling, of character and ability. None others need apply. Terms liberal—business desirable. For particulars, Address CHASE & CO.,
Manchester, N. H.

$100 PER MONTH.—Agents, male and female, wanted every County in the United States. For particulars call on or address, with stamp, CHARLES M. BROWN, No. 74 Beekman St., corner Broadway, N. Y.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS.—SELPHO'S PATENT, 916 Broadway, N. Y.
Send for a Circular.

COOLEY'S Cabinet Printing Office for small Printers and Amateurs. Unrivalled for simplicity and cheapness. J. G. COOLEY & CO., 1 Spruce Street, N. Y.

The Current and Back Numbers of Harper's Weekly can be had of J. F. HUNT, Wholesale and Retail News Agent, No. 129 Nassau St., Pittsburg, Pa.

500 Agents Wanted!

Something New! Patent Work Holder, made of The New Gold, and 5 other articles. Address (and inclose stamp) SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, and all other places, forwarded free, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS. No. 74 Broadway. Butters charged low rates.

Printing Offices for the People.

Price.
Printing Office No. 5, press prints	8x 8 inches, $25 00
" 6, " "	12x10 " 40 00
" 7, " "	12x18 " 60 00

ADAMS PRESS COMPANY,
91 Park Row, New York.

SKATES!

SKATES! Skater for 25 cents and upwards.
NEW YORK SKATE EMPORIUM.
R. J. HART & BRO.,
No. 397 Broadway.

AT GIMBREDE'S Stationery Depot and Card Engraving Establishment, 589 Broadway, a Box of Note Paper and Envelopes, sixteen varieties, stamped with your address, forwarded free of charge on receipt of Three Dollars. 12 varieties, $2 00.

A HANDSOME HOLIDAY PRESENT.—One of Gimbrede's Artistic Monogram and Package of note paper colored initials) sent free on receipt of $8 00. 588 Broadway.

GIMBREDE, CARD ENGRAVER, having made arrangements to increase his Business, is now prepared to offer a second quality of Engraving at the same prices usually charged, which will excel the style and quality furnished by Jewelers, Booksellers, and Printers. The price of his most finished works will remain the same. Specimens of both styles will be shown on application at 588 Broadway and 177 Sixth Avenue.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS WANTED. Large commission; honorable business. Circular sent. A.W. Harrison, Philadelphia.

Cloaks! Cloaks!

BRODIE
has made his
Grand Opening
of
Fall and Winter Cloaks,
at his
OLD STAND,
300 Canal Street,
and
His Palace of Fashion,
Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,
Cor. of 23d Street,
New York.

Something New for Ladies.

DOWNER'S PATENT HEMMER AND SHIELD saves one-half the labor of hand-sewing, as it protects the finger from the needle, and makes a neat hem while the operator is sewing. Sent by mail on receipt of the price, TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. A liberal discount to the trade. Enterprising Agents can realize $150 per Month.

Descriptive Circulars furnished on application.
A. H. DOWNER, No. 442 Broadway, New York.

IMPORTANT INFORMATION to all women afflicted with female weakness, chronic disease, or irregularities, will be received by inclosing a postage stamp to JOSHUA F. BRIDGE, M.D., Resident Physician Greenberg Company, No. 2 Bond Street, N. Y.

A New Cartridge Revolver,

Carrying Six Balls (50 to the pound). A new and exciting a superior Pocket or Belt Arm will find this to be the best in the market. Price $12 00. Send for Circular.
MERWIN & BRAY, Agents, 246 Broadway, N. Y.
(Late MERWIN & CO., 598, corner 7th and D Streets, Washington, D. C.

Jomini's Waterloo.

The Political and Military History of the Campaign of Waterloo. Translated from the French of Lieutenant Baron de Jomini. By Capt. S. V. Benét, Ordnance Department U. S. Army. Illustrated with Maps, cloth, 75 cents.
Sent free by mail on receipt of price.
This day published by
D. VAN NOSTRAND,
Publisher and Importer,
192 Broadway.

"Something New for All."

GEN. GEO. B. MCCLELLAN and our New Union Prize Gift Packages are to be wondered at. Seventy-five cents worth of indispensable articles for 25 cents. Agents are making from $5 to $10 per day. Agents wanted, male and female, all over the country. Address, with stamp for circular, RICKARDS & CO, 102 Nassau Street, New York.

Commencement of Volume XXIV.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

For December, 1861.

Its unparalleled circulation from month to month, and a constant demand for back Numbers to complete sets, evince that HARPER'S MAGAZINE meets the wants of the most large body of American readers. No change will therefore be made in its general character. The Magazine contains at least twice the amount of matter of the leading English Monthlies. It is therefore enabled to present the most prolific literature. Engravings Novelties and Designs, besides furnishing a larger amount of original matter than is to be found in any Magazine in the World. Each Number contains an amount of reading equal to that in an octavo volume, with abundant illustrations. Illustrations of every subject in which the Artist can aid the Writer. More than Seven Thousand Illustrations have already appeared in the Magazine.

ANY NUMBER will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty Cents. Volumes for Binding, Nos. Nine Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States, for Three Dollars per Volume, postpaid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the Purchaser paying Freight or Expressage. A Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rate. Twenty-three Volumes, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to November, 1861, are now ready.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Twenty Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	4 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will not be sent gratuitously.

Volume I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 00 each, are now ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. Discount allowed to Booksellers and the Trade.

☞ To postmasters and agents getting up a Club of Ten Subscribers, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

"Massa say de Bobolitionists comin,' and gib us dese Knives. WHO DEY FOR?"

Chief Cook CAMERON divides the VIRGINIA GOOSE between MARYLAND and DELAWARE.

JONATHAN STOPPING THE SOUTHERN RAT-HOLES.

Christmas Week among the American Slaves!

Ready Tuesday, December 10th.

Beadle's Christmas Story

Maum Guinea,

And Her Plantation "Children,"

OR, CHRISTMAS WEEK AMONG THE AMERICAN SLAVES.

By MRS. METTA V. VICTOR,

Author of "Alice Wilde."

LOUISIANA PLANTATION LIFE during the Holidays is seized upon by the author as a screen around the barbecue, night-dancing, story-telling and love-making of the Slaves' romance; embodying all the tragedy and pathos, the humor and enjoyment, the happiness and horror of Slave Life and its twofold experiences. The negro and white characters introduced are all "representative"—each illustrative of some peculiar phase of a strange history.

220 pages complete; beautifully illustrated. Price Twenty Cents. For sale by all News Dealers, Bookselling and Army Sutlers, &c. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers,

141 William Street, N. Y.

WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Marriage Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 189 Broadway. Samples by mail.

THE NEW MUSIC BOOK.

By LOWELL and WILLIAM MASON.

ASAPH: Or, The Choir Boy: A Collection of Vocal Music, Sacred and Secular, for Choirs, Singing-Schools, Musical Societies and Conventions, and the Home Circle. Just issued, and contains nearly all new matter, comprising a very attractive Manual for Singing-Schools, a Collection of Church Music, and a Collection of Four-Part Songs and Glees, all in one volume. Price $8 per dozen. For sale by Booksellers generally. Published at Nos. 5 and 7 Mercer street, New York, by MASON BROTHERS.

PERSONAL.—For descriptions and honorable business at a liberal salary, write HANSON BROTHERS, Boston, Mass.

Holiday Presents.

Take a Second Look

At W. Forsyth & Co.'s Advertisement in Harper's Weekly of Dec. 14th, page 806, of Watches, Chains, Jewelry, &c. Hurry up the Orders for Certificates. Price 25 cents each. W. FORSYTH & CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y.

CENTRAL PARK SKATE EMPORIUM

Skates 25 cents to 25 Dollars. Everything in the skating line except ponds to suit all ages, sexes, tastes, and purses. CONOVER & WALKER, 474 Broadway, N. Y.

Out of town orders attended to carefully and promptly.

Snow's Pure Confectionery,

209 Kinds, 629 Broadway, N. Y. Wholesale and Retail. Dealers enclose stamp for catalogue and prices.

Silk Under Garments

OF

Hand and Made to Order, by

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York City.

The Wide World!

A racy and spirited complete Story Paper! Printed every week in Boston. Sold by News Dealers everywhere. 4 cents.

A STOUNDING!—$100 per Month salary, and all expenses paid. A New Article. Every Family and every Soldier must have it. Retail price, $1. For conditions of Agency address A. C. BALLOU & SON, Haverhill, Mass. Samples furnished by mail to applicants for Agencies for 25 cents.

AGENTS WANTED.—To sell something entirely new and original—none other like them—the Union Prize Stationery and Receipt Package. Each package contains a beautiful and correct engraving of GENERAL GEORGE B. McCLELLAN, 6x10.

75 Valuable Receipts.

6 White Fine Envelopes, in colors.

6 Ladies' White Fine Envelopes, in colors.

6 Buff Envelopes.

6 sheets Commercial Note Paper.

6 Sheets Fine Ladies' Note Paper.

6 Sheets Ruled Billet Paper.

1 Accommodation Pocketbook.

2 Fine Steel Pens.

1 Fine Pencil.

1 Sheet Blotting Paper.

1 Gift of Valuable Jewelry.

Retail price for the whole, twenty-five cents. Agents wanted in every city, town, and village. Call on or address, enclosing stamp,

RICKARDS & CO.,

161 Nassau Street, New York.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS. SPLENDID PLATES and 3 FULL-SIZED PATTERNS of an elegant CLOAK SLEEVE and LADIES' ZOUAVE JACKET. LARGEST and BEST FASHION MAGAZINE in the WORLD. Published Quarterly, 473 Broadway. Sold everywhere or sent by mail. Yearly, with a valuable PREMIUM, $1 00. Single, 25 cents. Winter Number now ready. SPLENDID change for Agents to Canvass.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—The advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe LUNG AFFECTION, and that dread disease, Consumption, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a SURE CURE for CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and he hopes every sufferer may try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address

Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON,

Williamsburgh, Kings County, N. Y.

CHOICE FURS. No. 49 Broadway. Opening an Retail of an entirely new stock of Sable, Mink and other choice FURS, in the most desirable styles, much below usual prices. S. GOGE,

Practical Furrier.

SENT BY EXPRESS

EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S

PERFECT FITTING

SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices, Made to Measure at $18 per doz. OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,

With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2.50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

30 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 14c. per yd. $4 35

7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard..... 3 50

Making and cutting..... 6 00

Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c..... 1 50

Profit..... 2 65

Total..... $18 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

387 Broadway, up stairs,

Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

Devlin & Co.

We are now in receipt of large importations of choice

WINTER OVERCOATINGS,

FRENCH CASSIMERES,

NEW STYLES VESTINGS,

WINTER UNDERWEAR.

And have also added largely to our superior stock of ready made

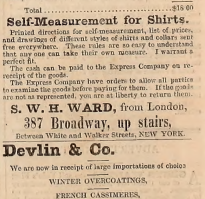
WINTER CLOTHING,

All of which we are selling at exceedingly low prices.

DEVLIN & CO.,

Corner of Broadway and Warren and Grand Streets.

EXCELSIOR



FOR FARMERS, MILLERS, and OTHERS. Also ANTI-FRICTION HORSE POWERS. These Mills and Powers have taken NINE FIRST PREMIUMS at Western State Fairs this Year, and are superior to all others. Agents wanted in every county. Rights for sale. Send stamp for illustrated circulars &c.

DENNET BROTHERS, 43 Greene St., New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 261.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

UNION REFUGEES FROM WESTERN MISSOURI COMING INTO ST. LOUIS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

UNION REFUGEES IN MISSOURI.

THE illustration on the preceding page—which represents Union fugitives in St. Louis—shows how cruelly the rebellion is pressing upon the loyal people of Missouri. The Herald correspondent writes from St. Louis:

For some days past the unfortunate sufferers of the southwest portion of the State, who have been driven out on account of their Union sentiments, have lined our thoroughfares, and presented many of the most pitiful scenes of poverty and affliction ever witnessed in the city. Only a small portion arrived in proportion to the thousands who left Springfield and vicinity in company with General Sturgis' division. Their appearance—half naked, hungry, and with cold, and hardly able to stand—but excited the liveliest sympathy. While it is evident that something must be done for these destitute people, or they will die outright of starvation, Yesterday General Halleck issued an order on the subject, which has struck consternation into the hearts of the secessionists, and at the same time has been an effective remedy. It is as follows:

The laws of military rebellion are fixed and well-established rules. While it allows no cruel or barbarous acts on our part in retaliation for like acts of the enemy, it permits our military measures within the prescribed limits of military usage. If the enemy murders and robs Union men we are not justified in murdering and robbing other persons who are, in a legal sense, enemies to our Government, but we may enforce on them the severe penalties justified by the laws of war for the crimes of their fellow-rebels. The rebel forces in the southwestern counties of this State have robbed and plundered the peaceful secessionist inhabitants, taking from them their clothing and means of subsistence. Men, women, and children have almost been stripped and plundered. Thousands of such persons are finding their way to this city heretofore, half clad, and in destitute and suffering condition. Humanity and justice require that these sufferings should be relieved, and that the outrages committed upon them should be retaliated upon the enemy. The individuals who have directly caused these sufferings are at present beyond our reach; but there are in this city, and in other places within our lines, numerous secret secessionists who render aid, assistance, and encouragement to those who committed these outrages. They do not themselves rob and plunder, but they abet and countenance these acts in others. Although less bold, they are equally guilty. It is therefore ordered and directed that the Provost-Marshals immediately inquire into the conduct of all persons so driven from their homes, and that measures be taken to replace them in the houses and to feed and clothe them at the expense of avowed secessionists, and of those who are found guilty of giving aid, sentiments, and encouragement to the enemy.

The Tribune correspondent says:

Truly enough, at this hour thousands of refugees are fleeing from Missouri that they may find bread, and afterward a home in our loyal Free State. Scantily clad, half famished, and pinched with cold, they enter our border towns and beg, for they have no money, that they may live. Nor are these the ignorant poor—it is the better class by far—those who are faithful to the Union. Whole families and whole neighborhoods have come, and the roads leading to St. Louis and Hay dotted are literally filled with them. Far to the rear come the various divisions of Price's army, and when they overtake the helpless exiles they rob them of every thing. From the men they take even their pocket-knives.

TO ADVERTISERS.

☞ THE great exertions made by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY to illustrate the War have been rewarded by a large increase of circulation. During the year which ends with this Number over FIVE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS of the WAR have been published in HARPER'S WEEKLY. It now circulates ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY THOUSAND COPIES each WEEKLY; which is, we believe, the largest circulation of any Journal in this country in which Advertisements are published. Price 50 and 75 cents per line.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

☞ A HANDSOME Title-page to the FIFTH VOLUME, of which this is the concluding Number, together with a Complete Index of Contents, has been printed on a separate sheet, and may be had gratuitously of all Agents or at the Office of Publication.

Muslin Covers may also be had, by all who wish their Numbers for the year bound in a volume, at FIFTY CENTS each. Twenty-five per cent. discount allowed to the trade.

☞ EUROPEAN Dealers will be supplied with HARPER'S WEEKLY by John Adams Knight, Publisher of the London Americus, 100 Fleet Street, London, England, where Subscriptions and Advertisements will be received, and single copies of HARPER'S MONTHLY and WEEKLY furnished.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1861.

JOHN BULL ON THE RAM-PAGE.

THE British newspapers reach us full of fury and menace against this country. Our "little fleet to be swept from the seas:" what San Jacintos" are to be "sunk or captured;" our blockade is to be broken at once; the "Southern confederacy" to be "acknowledged by Great Britain and France simultaneously;" our "Northern ports are to be blockaded;" "twelve Royal men-of-war" are to sail up the Potomac, and compel the evacuation of Mason and Slidell in view of the White House; the Warrior is to be anchored off Annapolis, with shotted guns; we are to be taught the folly and danger of "insulting the British flag." All this, and much more, we are to suffer, according to those British journalists, because Captain Wilkes, instead of making the Trent a prize, and carrying her into an American port for adjudication, generously allowed her and her passengers to proceed on their voyage unmolested. The law officers of the British Crown admit that the Trent was liable to seizure, and her passengers to detention and annoyance; but with a refinement worthy of nisi prius pleaders, they pretend that it was unjustifiable to inflict upon her any minor indignity. In their opinion the greater does not contain the less. We must either exact the whole of our rights or none of them. If we will be forbearing we must be punished. "If you refuse a penny to a beggar!" asked the drunken sailor of a gentleman whom he was molesting, "that you don't strike back?"

Well, if it must be so, so mote it be. If England is bent upon seizing this our hour trouble to force a war upon us for the destruction of the Union, we must accept the decree manfully. We are already engaged in a war of such magnitude that our outlay of money and men would not be greatly increased if we had to contend against England simultaneously with the South. Telegraphs and steam protect us against any landing of foreign troops on our soil; vigorous exertion will speedily provide us with a fleet of war vessels and privateers which will render it much more difficult than John Bull imagines either to raise our Southern blockade, or to blockade our Northern ports, or to protect British commerce on the ocean. It was the combination of all the European Powers against Napoleon which proved the close of the last century, which developed the strength of the French nation to such a pitch that in less than ten years it ruled the whole European continent; a similar combination of discontents in America would rouse our people to a pitch of energy and self-sacrificing patriotism that would be much more likely to shake European thrones than American institutions.

But is it not sad to see how unwisely the energies of a great free nation like England are being directed? If there was a principle to which Englishmen of our race were true with more tenacity than any other, it was that under the meteor flag of England slavery could not exist, and that when a slave touched British soil that instant he became a free man. This has been the boast, the worthy boast of Englishmen for more than a generation. Yet when the people are conscious of a monstrous impending ruin—reared itself in its wickedness, and struggled mightily to overthrow a nation bound to England by every tie of blood, language, religion, commerces, laws, institutions, and a common freedom, England, instead of standing true to her traditions, her honor, and even her most palpable interests, has not besieged her sympathies upon the institution she had denounced for forty years, and shamelessly and openly rejoiced and assisted at the prospect of our overthrow. What can be the ultimate fruit of such a policy? What would be the position of Great Britain in the event of success—the protector of a nation "based on the corner-stone of human slavery?" What Palmerston will hereafter venture to vindicate England's indecent haste to place the rebels on a par with ourselves by the recognition; this persistent hostility of her press and many of her leading men; the vulgar falsehoods by which her leaders have deluded her people as to the nature of our contest; the countenance by her ports of the pirate steamers Nashville and Sumter, laden with the spoil of our vessels; and now, lastly, the attempt to bully us in the hour of our greatest extremity? Do not we see the task of the future Macaulay, to whose lot it shall fall to paint this page of British story, and to justify to the minds of posterity—perhaps to hope, is better—race of Englishmen the insidious and persevering efforts of their fathers to carry out, in this country, the policy Great Britain has pursued with uniformity in China and in India, to ruin a friendly nation in order to discredit republican institutions, and to keep four million human creatures in slavery in order that "Lancashire may get cotton, and a market with eight millions of buyers may be secured for British goods."

THE BURNING OF CHARLESTON

IT matters little, in effect, whether the burning of the city of Charleston was the fruit of accident or of negro incendiarism. The rebels are sure to ascribe the disaster to the latter cause. Secret terrors are the price of despotism: in slave countries, every house, every city, every unusual movement of a slave, carries apprehension to the heart of his master. At the time of the John Brown affair, Governor Wise told us that Virginia matrons living miles and miles away were beside themselves with terror. We know that so terrible was the alarm created by that trumpery attempt, that down on the Gulf shore negroes whose behavior had attracted attention were imprisoned, whipped, and even shot by scores. In the language of Southern members of Congress who talked secession in those days, life was not worth having, if accompanied by the agonies which such events implanted in every Southern breast.

It is by the light of these memories that we must read the tale of the burning of Charleston. The burning of 600 houses, including every public building in the city, and property valued at $7,000,000, is an astounding event. Whatever the politicians and the papers may say, the Southern people from Norfolk to Galveston are sure to conclude that the negroes did the dread deed, and each man and woman is now quaking in terror lest his or her house should be the next to go. Nor is this opinion likely to be confined to the whites. The slaves, too, will hear of the fire, and will hear simultaneously—for we know that news does spread among the slaves, hard as their masters try to keep them in ignorance—that Beaufort eight and ten thousand slaves, till lately the overworked laborers on Carolina cotton plantations, are now free men, getting eight and ten dollars a month. It will not exceed the negro's power of combination to connect the two events together. When he does, beware the result.

We are gradually spreading the net which is to encircle the rebellion. The occupation of Ship Island, Mississippi, by the advance-guard of General Butler's expedition, under General Phelps, is of course the first step toward a movement upon Mobile and New Orleans. The terrors which have compelled General Lee to imprison men and women in Charleston to prevent their flying to the mountains, will now be transferred to the Gulf cities, and if we hear of more fires no one must be surprised. The assassin's dagger and the incendiary torch are the natural weapons of the slave. We should not use them, but we did not make the present situation.

In a few days, probably before the next number of this journal is printed, a fresh blow at the rebellion will be struck by General Burnside at the head of a powerful brigade consisting of men, and very possibly General Halleck may have commenced operations on the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers. The burning of Charleston will prove a potent help to these generals, and give an additional fleet or army. It may have been, as we said, a mere accident, assisted by a high wind. But wherever our troops advance, fathers and mothers will shriek themselves with a shudder that within a month after the landing of our forces on the soil of South Carolina the chief city of that State was mysteriously burned, and thousands of people rendered houseless on a December night. The offspring of these thoughts will be surmised.

THE LOUNGER.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE'S DISPATCHES.

THE calmness, clearness, and ability of Mr. Seward's dispatches to our foreign Ministers show how well he understands the emergency. The skillful difference in tone and representation of the same general subject to different Powers shows his diplomatic genius and accomplishment. In his instructions to Mr. Adams, in England, he says, "You will therefore draw into debate before the British Government any opposing moral principles which may be supposed to be at the foundation of the controversy between those States and the Federal Union." To Mr. Clay, in Russia, he says, "its object [the rebellion] is to create a State and a nation whose first Address to mankind is slavery is necessary, just, wise, and beneficent, and that it may and must be expanded over the central portion of the American continent and islands, without check or resistance, at whatever cost and sacrifice to the welfare and happiness of the human race." To Mr. Dayton, he states, with the cold sarcasm, the essential absurdity and impracticability of the political system of the Confederate States, which the Rebel Vice President elegantly caterized, in one of his speeches on his way to Washington, as free love in politics; and he impresses upon him that the function which is now transigent is the same faction that has until recently controlled the Government of the country—including, of course, himself and the present Secretary of Embassies, and which the late President was one of the fathers.

These quotations are handled with such gravity and comprehension that the question inevitably arises, Why has the Secretary of State forfeited so much confidence at home since the rebellion commenced? That he has done so is beyond question. That his warm friends have been disappointed is undeniable. The reason is not difficult, closely, is it not that he has failed to show that deep and earnest conviction of the threatening scope of the conspiracy which he so plainly discovers in his correspondence with our Ministers?

The particular indications of this want are not very easy to point out. It is probably felt in the light tone in which the Secretary has spoken in public of the rebellion as a whim, a gust, a hallucination. Or, in the Secretary, has been the instinctive response of those who have heard or read his words.

Then the almost eager and impetuous of his friends have thought the President too slow, too much without a policy; and have held the Secretary of State responsible. Moreover, in the early days, when the necessity and the ability of action were so sadly disproportioned, the Secretary's optimism was held to be the drag upon the wheels of Government. That this opinion was just there is no sufficient proof. But it was very general among ardent men.

The correspondence now published will vindicate Mr. Seward's clear comprehension of the character of the rebellion, and the scope of his policy is doubtless to be found in his profound conviction of the necessity of the Union and the adequacy of the Government, under the Constitution, to secure all reforms. And the question between him and his more vehement associates can probably be expressed in the President's words, that "we should not be in haste to determine that radical and extreme measures, which may reach the loyal as well as the disloyal, are indispensable."

PATIENCE.

PEOPLE, it is said, are getting impatient. There ought to be a forward movement. Something ought to be done. Secretary Cameron says that we have a hundred thousand men in the field. What are they doing? Forward! Forward!

Yes; we have heard that before. Nothing is more natural than impatience. Let us go right in and win. But let us also—in conducting a great war, in which we had every preparation to make—let us have common-sense. Here is one man who knows when we ought to move upon the Potomac. That is General M'Clellan. If he be an able soldier, he will move when that time arrives. If he be loyal, he will move when the time comes. And we can meanwhile wait in confidence, or we can fret over delay.

Every thing depends upon our faith in our leader. Congress certainly can not tell whether there should be a movement. Newspapers can not. Men out of and elsewhere have no better opportunities for knowing than the General. And newspaper correspondents in Washington have had their chance to say. War can be conducted only upon the principles of war. There is an army of probably a hundred and fifty thousand desperate men, ably officered, steadily intrenched, beyond the Potomac. Propraty to engage them requires a knowledge of circumstances, of our own forces and their capacity, and of military science, which most of us who quietly write and talk about it do not possess. If General M'Clellan is equally ignorant, we are in a very bad way.

If any body doubts our leader's loyalty, let him say so. If any body doubts his ability, let him say that. But if, as no one has yet dreamed of denying, General M'Clellan is loyal, and if he is the soldier that every body believes, it is not fair to him, to the cause, or to our friends in the field, to ask in or-dinary public sentiment that any unbehave, and let slip the dogs of war to their sure destruction.

That General M'Clellan has done any of the foolish things that are reported of him there seems to be no reason to believe; and if in any way he differs from any theory of the Government upon the policy of conducting the war, we may be very sure that he differs as an honest man should, fairly and frankly. The country can better afford to lose the fine offering to an impatient and unjust public opinion; the disgrace of General Frémont was the second; does it mean to require the sacrifice of General M'Clellan as the third?

ALIENATION AND DISTRACTION.

THE Union Defense Committee—a body of the wealthiest and most intelligent citizens of all parties, who have been in communication with the good work of arming and forwarding soldiers to fight the battles of the country against anarchy—have recently passed some resolutions approving the timely and excellent words of the President in his Message, and another resolution, "that we deprecate the discussion of projects which tend to distract and alienate the Union sentiment of our people."

Does this mean projects of unworthy peace, projects of infamous compromise, projects of patching which would end in a more fatal rent? or what does it mean? It would be most unfortunate if projects which provide that the rebels shall pay the expenses of their own rebellion? Do they deprecate discussing whether rebels shall be allowed the free use and enjoyment of their property, whether in real estate or in the service of slaves? Do they propose that the citizens can not have the same view of the true policy of the war, or that, differing, they ought not by discussion to try to convince and agree?

For instance, Mr. Pendleton argues, ably but hopelessly, against the right of the President to suspend the habeas corpus. Certainly that is an argument tends to distract and alienate the harmony of public sentiment. Shall he therefore forbear the discussion? Is it not a thousand-fold better that he should make his argument, and have a vote of 108 to 26 recorded against his proposition?

Mr. Dana, the Secretary of the Treasury, proposes to use the labor of the slaves for the Government, in stead of allowing them to help the rebels. Is that alienating and distracting?

Mr. Bingham proposes to release the slaves of rebels, and Mr. Gurley to colonize them in Florida. Are those suggestions to be deprecated?

Mr. Sumner presents petitions for universal emancipation, with compensation to loyal owners. Is that to be reprobated?

Another gentleman repeats the familiar truism that the war is for the supremacy of the Government, and that when its object is attained the war ought to cease. Is that a distracting suggestion?

The gentlemen of the Union Defense Committee are intelligent and sagacious. They know that the four millions of slaves in the rebel section can not be disregarded; they know that something must be done, because whether any policy is adopted for their disposition or not, we have thousands of them to care for. Is it not worth while to consider what shall be done with them? Is it not equally worth while to consider whether there may not be some policy devised in regard to slaves which may shorten the war and save thousands of lives and millions of dollars to the nation? Do they not know that the one project which would distract and alienate loyal men from the support of the war is a proposition that all discussion should cease upon the origin and intention of the rebellion, because without such discussion you can not possibly cope with it successfully?

The object of the war is, we all agree, to restore the supremacy of the Government by suppressing insurrection. The question is, how can it best be done? And if the resolutions mean any thing, they mean that that is the very question which must not be discussed. Of course if it is only meant that the debate should be candid and generous, we shall all cry Amen.

A SERENADE-SPEECH.

GOVERNOR MORTON, of Indiana, was serenaded and made a speech a few days ago. He expressed a sentiment which has been heard elsewhere. "I am for crushing the rebellion," said the Governor, "but not by means which would make reconciliation impossible."

But, Governor, when people are pushed to war somebody must be hurt. What is war but a mutual hurting of two parties until one yields to the other? War is meant to inflict injury. This is the argument of physical strength when the mental argument has failed.

Then if war simply must be hurt, and will certainly hurt you, in what way may he be hurt? Clearly in every way that, without unnecessary personal cruelty, may compel him to submit. A man attacks me murderously I may fairly hold his hands, or throw him down, or shoot him. So if a nation or a faction begins a war, every means that will cripple their resources and shear their strength is honorable warfare. You may blockade a port, or you may surround a fort, and starve them into surrender. You may seize the horses, carriages, and telegraphs that might convey men, means, or information. You may seize corn and cotton, and unquestionably destroy them rather than that they should fall into the enemy's hands and help him. Will Governor Morton say why you must respect the labor which is the source of all these helps to the foe?

If by any means the rebels could stop the work in the Northern factories, which are now humming night and day with the weaving of cloths and necessaries of every kind for our army, would it be wrong to do so, and have a perfect right to do it? If, although they might be beyond the Potomac, they could shut off the workmen that in the South are interest to stop working for us, does Governor Morton think that they might not fairly do it? Can he conceive a more disastrous blow to our cause? And if in doing so they should do an act just and desirable in itself, would that be any objection?

But he may think that, if the operation is immediately begun to vanish and murder, it would be a very inhuman thing to excite them. But no people under such circumstances ever did or will such things. It is holding men in slavery which produces servile insurrections, not releasing them. And again, if there be any truth in the argument that a release of the slaves of rebels would carry terror into the rebellious section, since that is the very thing we are trying to do, to the very people for which we have collected fleets and armies—since war is organized terror, and fear subdues men soulless as any demand can we have to refrain, in justice to the men who have taken their lives in their hands for their country, to bring the terror of fear home to bear upon the enemies of the country? If they think it a real danger they will succumb, or deliberately risk the result. If they do not think it so, why should Governor Morton?

Besides, does any man in his senses not see that this weapon of fear will be used, rather than the destruction of the country be suffered? Then it is simply a question of time and of necessity—a question of circumstances.

Once more. Every man ought to know that the exasperation of feeling can go no farther than it has already gone. That proposition in the rebellious section has been educated in contempt of the Union and hatred of the North. The feeling is perfectly reasonable. It can not be complained. Those who have it are to be, and will be, conquered. When they are conquered they will be reasonable.

CAPTAIN GORDON.

THE case of Gordon, the slave-trader, has peculiar interest at the present whilst of the war. The general conviction undoubtedly is that he will not be hanged, but that his sentence will be commuted. The reason for this view seems to be that this is the first capital conviction under an old law; and that as the slave-trade between the States is not punished as piracy, it is patently unfair to treat the African slave-trade as such.

The difference between the two is simply this: that the sufferings of the victim are much greater in the case of the transport across the ocean than in the carriage from State to State. The essential meanness, inhumanity, and cruelty are the same in both cases. In sentencing the prisoner, the judge said: "Think of the cruelty and wickedness of seizing nearly a thousand human beings and driving them like cattle on board, and thrusting them beneath the decks of a small ship, beneath a burning tropical sun, to die of disease or suffocation, or be transported to distant lands, and be consigned, they and their posterity, to a fate far more cruel than death. * * * As you are known to me from the presence of that God of the black man as well as the white man, who is no respecter of persons, do not indulge for a moment the thought that he bears with indifference the cry of the humblest of his children."

In these suitable and solemn words speaks the honor of the bench. How they contrast with the extraordinary words of a higher court—words which History fails to justify—that the Africans were held to be such that we had no rights to be respected! Which, in the name of decency and justice, is the more respectable, the rebel barbarian in his home, living after his light and faith, or the civilized Christian who seizes him, packs him into the hold of a ship, with all the noisome attendant horrors of which the record is unquestionable, and sails with him over the sea?

What extenuating circumstances this case offers do not appear. If there be reasons why the sentence should not be executed, the President will doubtless state them. If the penalty shall seem to him too harsh for the offense, he will, in remitting it, of course recommend to Congress to modify the law. But if he does that, can he escape recommending the abolition of the death-penalty altogether? If Hicks were justly hung for killing two or three persons at a blow and without pain upon the ocean, what shall be said of him who caused the death of scores by lingering tortures? No form of piracy is so hideous as the slave trade; and if every man in New York who is concerned in the traffic dared to put up his sign which describes his business, he would print upon it "Pirate and Murderer."

PATRIOTISM WITHOUT IFS.

THERE is no such thing as conditional patriotism. Every citizen of this country is either for maintaining the Government and the national integrity at any cost, or else there is some price which he considers too costly to pay for it.

The question hardly concerns whether there may not be a price too high; but the answer is returned as immediately. What possible price can be extravagant for the system which secures all rights and development?

If the system be essentially and inevitably unfriendly to many human rights—if justice to all men is lawfully impossible under it—why maintain it at all? This was the old ground of the Abolitionists, and they were honest Unionists, for they held that our system secured the wrongs instead of the rights of men. But those who believe that "the cause of the United States is the cause of human nature," maintain the Government at any cost, because no price is too precious for the maintenance of those rights.

If, therefore, any citizen in any border State values the Government only so long as it protects property in slaves, but withdraws from, for its own salvation, the Government confiscates the property in slaves, he is just as patriotic as a Lowell manufacturer who is ready and willing to have the Government maintain itself by confiscating the mills of disloyal manufacturers.

If John Brocket said, "I am for America, provided that you are not compelled to burn Boston and destroy my property," John Hancock would have the same right to say, "I am for it, if Patrick Henry conferred upon Hook, the beef contractor for the army. The citizen in the border States or elsewhere who thinks the constitutional ground is not a Union man in the necessary sense," and, however honest he may be, he can not reasonably be called for the use of the word. Any kind of struggle who is not equal to a reverse. And the conditionally loyal man is only waiting to see which side shows the strongest. He will veer with every victory.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A ROYAL ENGRAVING BY DEED.—The EX-King of Naples, in answer to a deputation who went through the solemn mockery of presenting him with a sword, which it would be useless for him to attempt to wield, has replied, with most facetious gravity:

"I thank you for your generous offer, eternally engraved on our hearts, the names of you all."

Now that he is to be deposed, we can not tell, unless it is by the process of lithography.

A SENSIBLE EXCHANGE.—"Why, my dear Mrs. Smith, what on earth can you have sold Pinker for?"

"Oh! Mr. Smith insisted upon my disposing of it, and Pinker is a Secessionist, so I sold him for a Union flag. He says they would be much more useful, and would make better dusters."

THE FORCE OF CONTRADICTION CAN NO FARTHER GO.—To make a Will is the Most of every prudent man.

A WELL-WISHER.—There is a man in Pennsylvania who has the power of divining the existence of an oil-spring merely by the smell. He is now constructing an electrifying faculty from having a very strongly-developed oily-faculty organ.

A TURKISH EXPENSE.—Of all extravagances, perhaps the habit of snuff-taking is the worst, as one can not help paying for it through the nose.

MEN AND BEES.

Working Bees, in summer's heat,
Making honey, stock their hives,
So Union lovers have had, of late,
When the wintry cold arrives.
By their toil the blaze are fed,
Of it they partake their due;
Out of cold's way they do not
Therefore out of victuals too.

Working Men, employed, can earn
Little but what feeds their wives;
In a board they've no concern,
Like the bright Working Bees.
All that they produce, beside
What God gives them, others craves,
Goes for others to provide:
Some thought the least are slaves.

Now the winter is at hand;
Bees and men may work no more,
Bees can sustenance demand
Men can only help Employ.
Masters, you who have it all,
Of the fruits of labor then;
They are starved by Working Bees,
Give a share to Working Men.

CONSUL, TO ONE CONSTABLE.—An Englishman, who thought to know every thing—as many Englishmen do—was endeavoring to prove that the French language was capable of expressing every thing that could be said or written in the English tongue in several, and as a convincing example he took, after a pause, the word "constable." "You see, if I wanted to state that I had lost my war-horse in battle, all I should have to say would be simply, 'Mon cheval est hors-de-combat."

A BAD ACCEPTOR.—A dead wall.

ANOTHER SECESSIONIST.—Should the Pope at last resolve upon yielding up his temporal power, it will obviously be an act of Papal See-cession.

Why is an apple-tree like a crooked wall?—Because it isn't plum.

The other day we threw a shell from the Rip Raps into one of the rebel batteries, but owing to some mistake in the fuse, the shell did not explode. Such an imperfect piece of workmanship! they refuse it, and rout it back.

Why is it impolitent to have curtain near?—Because it makes an offil smell.

A piece of common sense that ought to be remembered by every soldier when his regiment is about leaving for the seat of war:—It is not right to be left.

Why did William Tell shudder when he shot the apple from his son's head?—Because it was an arrow escape for his child.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, December 10, in the Senate, Senators Fessenden and Sumner presented petitions for emancipating slaves under the war power. A resolution to expel Waldo P. Johnson for sympathizing and acting with the rebels was laid over. Bills were introduced to authorize the President to require territory for the settlement of free negroes, and to amend the organization of the Medical Department of the army. Senator Hale called up his resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the present judicial system of the United States and establishing another, which was agreed to. A bill to render more operative the law passed last session for the seizure of the lands of rebellious persons in the District of Columbia was also presented.—In the House, Mr. Wickliffe, after a resolution of inquiry as to his action in refer back to the Judiciary Committee the memorial of the Hilton Belligerent Police Commissioners, now confined in Fort Warren, Boston harbor. He was briefly replied to, in support of the committee's action, by Mr. Crittenden, to the effect that all that could be urged in favor of these and other prisoners similarly held had been already fully answered by the argument of Attorney-General Bates, and that it was time the whole question of the maintenance of habeas corpus in the Constitution, every provision of which they had trampled under foot." Mr. Pendleton's motion was tabled by 108 yeas to 39 nays. The Senate resolution to the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the conduct of the war was concurred in.

On Wednesday, 11th, in the Senate, after the presentation of a petition for the emancipation of slaves, Senator Wilson offered a resolution of inquiry as to what reduction could be made in the expenses of the army. A resolution from the Judiciary Committee, asking Congress to relieve the distressed people of Poland, was proposed. Senator Hale offered a resolution appointing a joint committee having power to sit during the recess of the two Houses of Congress. A joint resolution for the confiscation of rebel property and the emancipation of loyal men was introduced.—In the House, a resolution was introduced to the effect that the Secretary of War be requested to send a direct General Hitchcock to recall his order referring to fugitive slaves, and to restore the practice in force in the departments of the army. After speeches from members in support of and in opposition to the resolution, the whole subject was laid on the table by a vote of seventy-eight yeas to sixty-four nays. A bill providing for the appointment of the republics of Hayti and Liberia was introduced, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A bill for the Committee on Foreign Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws relating to the discretionary and abuses of persons found in arms against the Government as to authorize the President to grant them amnesty. A bill for the punishment of treason, for the restoration of the writ of habeas corpus throughout the bounds of the rebels, and to provide homesteads for soldiers, was introduced and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On Thursday, 12th, in the Senate, a bill authorizing the President to call out militia to protect the West Point Academy was introduced and referred to the Military Committee. A resolution instructing the Committee on the Military Academy to depend entirely upon merit was adopted. A resolution for the reorganization of the army under a new system was agreed to. A joint resolution in favor of an exchange of prisoners was referred. The proposition of rebel Senator Johnson, of Missouri, was debated and referred to the Judiciary Committee. The Senate held an executive session and then adjourned.—In the House, some further resolutions growing out of Mr. Wickliffe's inquiry on the subject of General Hitchcock's recent orders with regard to escaped slaves were taken up for discussion, and, after a speech delivered by the Vice-President, Mr. Breckinridge, were laid on the table by a vote of seventy-eight yeas to sixty-four nays. A bill was introduced to amend the law for the United States, and referred to the Judiciary Committee. The resolution referring to the arrest of persons in the loyal States was then taken up, which declares all persons as to the right of the President to suppress the writ of habeas corpus, in which a number of members took part. The matter was referred to the Judiciary Committee by a vote of 95 to 17. After spirited discussion of a query as to the cause of the escape of the Sumter, an executive session was held.

In the House, a proposition by Mr. Vallandigham, Democrat, from Ohio, that the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to the House all facts in relation to the arrest of Captain Wilkes, and to communicate to the House the correspondence relating to the arrest of Mason and Slidell. The subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Committee on the Militia reported a bill providing for the appointment of a commissioner to take testimony in relation to the claims of persons whose property was taken for the use of the army, and to report thereon to the Secretary of War. The bill was passed. A joint resolution for the Senate to adjourn from the 24th to the 27th was adopted.

On Friday, 13th, in the Senate, a bill authorizing the President to call out militia to protect the West Point Academy was introduced and referred to the Military Committee. A resolution instructing the Committee on the Military Academy to depend entirely upon merit was adopted. A resolution for the reorganization of the army under a new system was agreed to. A joint resolution in favor of an exchange of prisoners was referred. The proposition of rebel Senator Johnson, of Missouri, was debated and referred to the Judiciary Committee. The Senate held an executive session and then adjourned.—In the House, some further resolutions growing out of Mr. Wickliffe's inquiry on the subject of General Hitchcock's recent orders with regard to escaped slaves were taken up for discussion, and, after a speech delivered by the Vice-President, Mr. Breckinridge, were laid on the table by a vote of seventy-eight yeas to sixty-four nays. A bill was introduced to amend the law for the United States, and referred to the Judiciary Committee. The resolution referring to the arrest of persons in the loyal States was then taken up, which declares all persons as to the right of the President to suppress the writ of habeas corpus, in which a number of members took part. The matter was referred to the Judiciary Committee by a vote of 95 to 17. After spirited discussion of a query as to the cause of the escape of the Sumter, an executive session was held.—In the House, a proposition by Mr. Vallandigham, Democrat, from Ohio, that the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to the House all facts in relation to the arrest of Captain Wilkes, and to communicate to the House the correspondence relating to the arrest of Mason and Slidell. The subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Committee on the Militia reported a bill providing of a volunteer force for the defence of Kentucky was then introduced, and after a discussion relative to the whole conduct of the war, the bill passed. A joint resolution for the Senate to adjourn from the 24th to the 27th was adopted.

On Saturday, 14th, in the Senate, petitions were presented for the emancipation of slaves, and for the emancipation of the slaves of rebels, and for an exchange of prisoners. A resolution was introduced to call for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. The bill provides for the appointment of commissioners to inquire into the validity of the claims presented for compensation for emancipated slaves, and declares that no compensation shall not exceed more than three hundred dollars for each person so held to service or labor, and appropriates one million of dollars for carrying the act into effect. A resolution was offered by Senator Wilkinson, to refer the President's Message to the United States, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The resolution referring to the arrest of persons in the loyal States was then taken up, which declares all persons as to the right of the President to suppress the writ of habeas corpus, in which a number of members took part. The matter was referred to the Judiciary Committee by a vote of 35 to 17. After spirited discussion of a query as to the cause of the escape of the Sumter, an executive session was held.—In the House, a proposition by Mr. Vallandigham, Democrat, from Ohio, that the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to the House all facts in relation to the arrest of Captain Wilkes, and to communicate to the House the correspondence relating to the arrest of Mason and Slidell. The subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Committee on the Militia reported a bill providing of a volunteer force for the defence of Kentucky was then introduced, and after a discussion relative to the whole conduct of the war, the bill passed. A joint resolution for the Senate to adjourn from the 24th to the 27th was adopted.

THE OCCUPATION OF SHIP ISLAND.

The Union steamer-transport Constitution, Captain A. T. Fletcher, arrived at Fort Monroe on the 17th, when the cabel for orders, on her return from Ship Island. Mississippi Sound. She landed at the latter place on the December 4, the two regiments (Twenty-sixth Massachusetts, and Twenty-fourth, which embarked at Fort Monroe, on the 16th and 21st of November. In this southward expedition, which was commanded by Colonel Dwight, of the Regiment of Maine, which did not embark on her, the Constitution proceeded to Ship Island, arriving November 25, where she arrived on the 26th. She cooled, and left on the 28th, and, after a stormy passage, arrived at the Ship Island, Mississippi Sound, December 3.

The reception was as gratifying as it was unexpected by the little fleet and small garrison which have been holding on to Ship Island, and repeatedly landed at the rebel attacks from the rebels. By the assistance of two large river steamers, which had been captured in Mississippi Sound only a short time previous to her arrival, the troops and baggage of the two regiments were quickly landed. On the 4th and 5th of December—a single accident only occurring—the whole of the steamer was landed on the beach, and was taken charge of by Commissary Potter, Major-General Butler's agent, who will probably join the expedition in a short time with a large accession to the force.

THE ARMIES IN KENTUCKY.

In Kentucky the movements of the troops betoken an early engagement with the rebels. The concentrating forces are large on both sides, the rebels having twenty-five thousand men under General Buckner, and the Unionists a sufficient force to give them battle. General Boyle, in person, is in command of the Union communication with the advancing forces, and is employing all the rolling stock of the railroad in the transportation of troops and supplies. In the neighborhood of Somerset both armies are fortifying, and at Fishing Creek, five miles west of that place, General Zollicoffer is also reported erecting rebel batteries. There are indefinite rumors in Cincinnati of an engagement between General M'Cook and the rebels at Munfordville, but they are not credited.

EXPECTED BATTLE IN MISSOURI.

A report reached St. Louis last week that Generals Raine and Price, with their rebel forces, had taken possession of Lexington, that the Union troops had engaged them there, and that they had driven them in disorder. Additional Union troops were marching in that direction to meet the rebels.

NEWS FROM PORT ROYAL.

The Forty-sixth New York Regiment, Colonel Ross, has left Hilton Head and proceeded to Tybee Island. The Pennsylvania Artillery and Thirteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers now occupy Otter Island in St. Helena Sound. The island possesses some strategic value, as it lies directly in the channel, the entrance of the South Edisto River and other important rivers.

The cotton gathering by the negroes, under the direction of our troops, is progressing satisfactorily; several hundred bales have been brought down from Beaufort to Hilton Head. Over two millions of dollars' worth have already been secured.

RUMORED REACTION IN TENNESSEE.

A letter dated at Bridgeport, Alabama, on the Tennessee, says that a movement is being set on foot by refugees from the rebel States, and by Unionists who have left Tennessee. It appears that while passing through Nashville on the 6th instant, a counter-revolution of the most exciting character was going on. An effort to impress some citizens into the rebel army was resisted by the people, who were in large numbers, and a general riot ensued. The police, who endeavored to enforce the militiaman, were overpowered, and four of them killed. The people then rushed toward the Capitol, to take weapons from the rebel Governor Harris, but that functionary fled precipitately to Memphis. The fact is itself a suggestive of a powerful counter-movement in the South; but taken in connection with the statements we have received for a similar revolt in North Carolina, Eastern Tennessee, the two richest in North Georgia, and Western Alabama, and Western Louisiana, there is abundant evidence that the Unionists in the rebel States, and thousands who have been the weary of the grinding despotism of Davis and his colleagues, are only waiting for protection and encouragement from the Government to put themselves once more under the folds of the old banner.

BATTLE IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

Intelligence reaches us by way of Cincinnati that a hardfought battle took place on Friday in Western Virginia. Western Virginia, between General Milroy, of the Union troops, and Colonel Johnston, commanding the rebels, which lasted from daylight till three o'clock in the afternoon. The Union troops numbered 3,000, the rebels over 2000. The rebels were defeated, set fire to their camps, and retreated, leaving the Union troops victorious. General Johnston was said to be shot in the mouth, but the loss on the rebel side amounted to 200. On our side only thirty men were killed.

A MESSAGE FROM GENERAL BUCKNER.

The rebel General Buckner recently sent a flag of truce from his camp at Bowling Green, Kentucky, to the Union lines, entreating that the body of his wife might be taken to Louisville with the mortal remains of their infant daughter, which they wished to inter in the cemetery in that city. General Boyle courteously denied the request.

GENERAL HUNTER AT WORK.

General Hunter's proclamation to the Union of Platte City, Missouri, contains language strong and unmistakable. He says that the rebellion has begun, but adds that, unless the rebels under a secession chief named Sterling Price lay down their arms and submit to the laws, the loyal inhabitants themselves within ten days, by military force, will be called upon to arise and to solve the issues of every secession in the country, and to carry out the laws.

PREPARATIONS FOR DEFENSE ALONG THE NORTH-WESTERN FRONTIER.

Colonel C. A. Waite, of the United States Army, has been placed in command of the military posts along the North-West line. His department extends from Maine to Michigan, and the different posts are immediately to be occupied and put in a state of defense. A regiment of cavalry will be stationed at Detroit. A regiment of artillery will be stationed at Fort Niagara, Sackett's Harbor, Madison's Harbor; and Fort Montgomery, at Rouse's Point, will be occupied by a full regiment. Barracks will be built shortly within a few days, the works put in a state of defense, and guns mounted as soon as practicable.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE "TRENT" AFFAIR.

On receipt of the intelligence of the seizure of the Trent in England the popular excitement became intense. Mr. BRIGHT made a speech at Rochdale, in which he referred in the friendliest terms to the cause in which the North is engaged, and hoped a hope that a reply to Europe might still be avoided. Mr. Cobden had written a letter, in which he was holding a suspension of judgment. But the entire drift of opinion appeared to be in the direction of war with the United States. Meetings of persons expressing to clear the sea of the American flag by a double blockading the Southern Confederacy; and, by breaking the blockade, letting out cotton, and bringing in arms and ammunition. The tone of the Northern party is also on the war programme. The London Observer, which is the semi-official organ of the ministers, declares it would be the only proper course for the Government to demand the surrender to a British frigate, anchored in front of Washington, with twelve other royal war-ships standing as witnesses of the humiliating spectacle. The tone of the London Times is equally warlike. Since last since his arrived at Paris, is cited as showing the insult to the British flag was premeditated and deliberate.

The effect of the war policy of the Government upon the markets has been striking. Consols have fallen three per cent.; American securities have fallen six, and Cunard shares seven per cent. The largest demand for cotton has almost ceased, in view of the early opening of the ports, thus resulting from hostilities, while breadstuffs have advanced.

A ROYAL PROCLAMATION.

Queen VICTORIA has issued a proclamation forbidding the export from all ports of the United Kingdom of gunpowder, nitre, nitrate of soda, brimstone, lead, and fire-arms.

THE BRITISH FLEET.

The three classes of reserve comprise eight line-of-battle ships, six frigates, five corvettes, and twelve steamers, making a grand total of 1861 guns. The steam gun-boats attached are not included. They are twenty-one in number, with forty-two guns. This, however, does not include the gun-boats and mortar-vessels laid up. The list is rather untidy to effective vessels at present, or could be rendered so within little more than a month. Commissioners have been at Portsmouth mount 542 guns. The total number of guns in the re-commissioned vessels is 1,861, while Admiral MILNE's fleet on the North American station amounts to 837 guns.

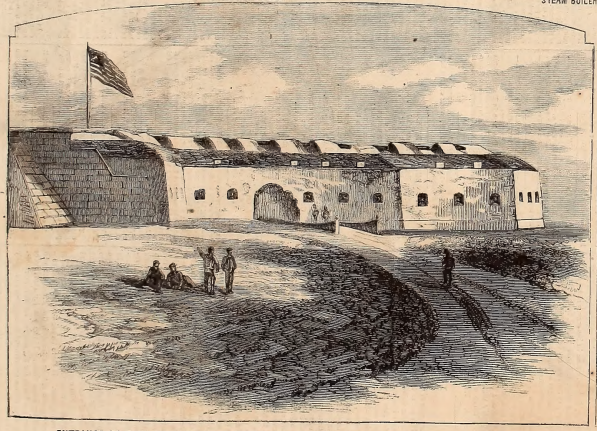
FRANCE.

PUBLIC OPINION THERE.

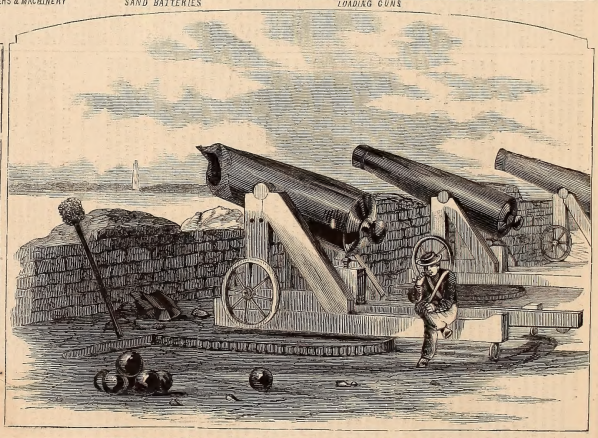
The Paris Moniteur considers a peaceful solution not impossible, and says that public opinion in the United States is very powerful, but is also very fickle, and it is best to await a solution of the question.

The Paris Constitutionnel also approves the review of the Moniteur, and adds that the French Government is by no hurry to recognize the South.

Other French papers are of the same opinion.



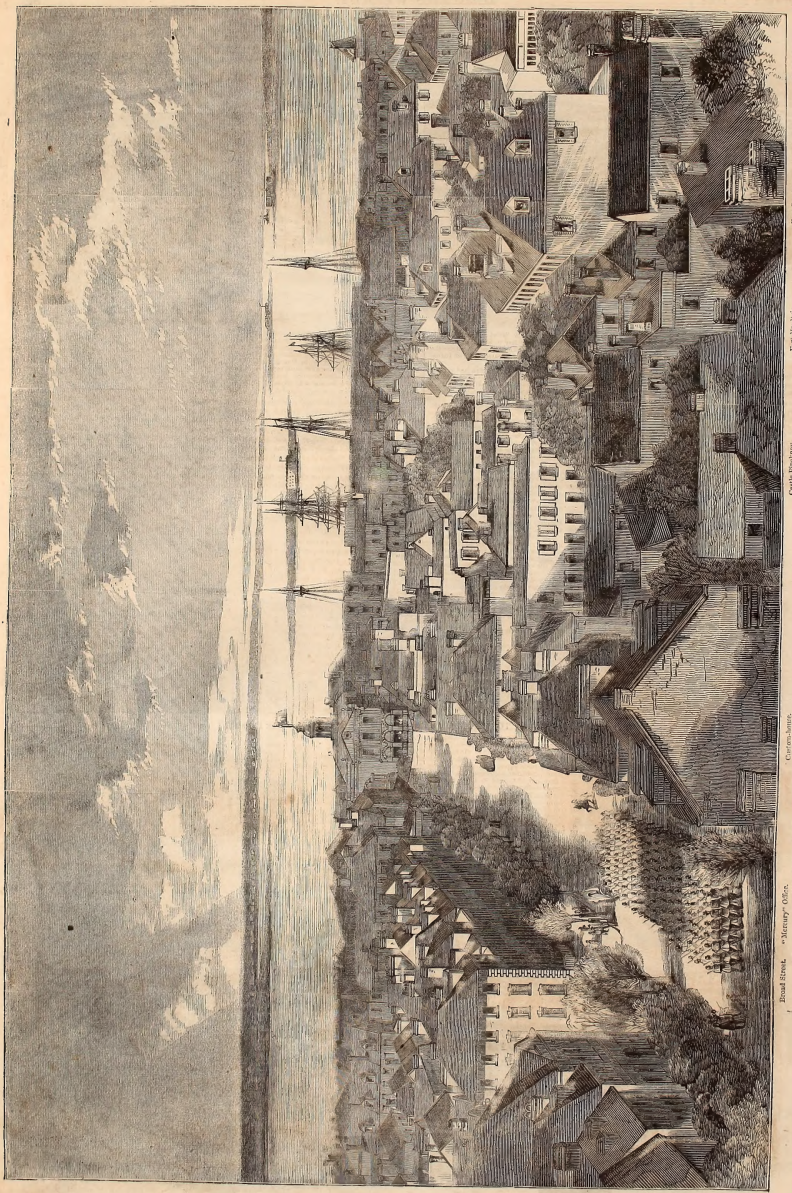
ENTRANCE TO FORT PICKENS, FACING FORT BARANCAS, AFTER TWO DAYS' BOMBARDMENT.—(SEE PAGE 827.)



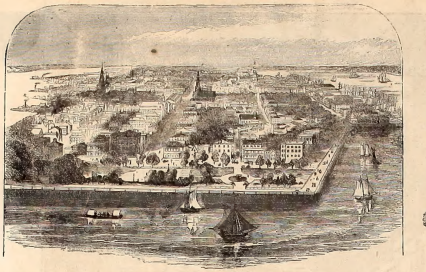
NORTHERN ROW OF GUNS AT FORT PICKENS, AFTER TWO DAYS' FIRING.—(SEE PAGE 827.)

BIRDS-EYE VIEW OF FORT PICKENS DURING THE BOMBARDMENT.—[SEE PAGE 827.]

GENERAL HALLECK'S FLEET OF MORTAR-BOATS FOR SERVICE ON THE MISSISSIPPI.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 827.]



THE CITY OF CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, LOOKING SEAWARD, AND SHOWING THE BURNED DISTRICT.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]



BIRDSEYE-VIEW OF CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

GROUP OF BANKS, CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE BURNING OF CHARLESTON.

We devote this and the preceding page to illustrations of the CITY OF CHARLESTON, South Carolina, which, we hear by telegraph, was mainly destroyed by fire on 11th and 12th. The dispatch from Fortress Monroe states:

"The fire commenced in Charleston last night (December 11), at nine o'clock, in Beard & Co.'s sash factory, at the foot of Hazel Street, and communicated to the opposite side of Hazel, to Cameron & Co.'s machine shops.

Under the impulse thus given and a stiff breeze, with a small supply of water, the conflagration assumed a formidable character, nearly equaling the most extensive conflagration on the American continent.

The Theatre, Floyd's sash factory, opposite the Express office, the old Executive Building, and all the houses between that point and Queen Street, are burned. The whole of one side of Broad Street is destroyed, from Colonel Godden's residence to Maxyck Street. A considerable portion of the city, from East Bay to King Street, is destroyed. Among the prominent buildings burned are the Institute and St. Andrew's hall, Theatre, Catholic Cathedral, and the Circular Church.

At last accounts from Charleston the fire had crossed Broad Street, and was sweeping furiously on. Nearly all that part of the city from Broad Street on the south, East Bay Street on the east, and King on the west, is said to be destroyed.

An extra train had left Augusta with supplies for the sufferers—thousands of whom roamed the streets—and assistance to fight the fire.

There are rumors of a negro insurrection and negro incendiarism. One account states that a plot was discovered by the body-servant of a military officer, who said that the negroes of the city were to be joined by large bands of negroes from the country, who were to come in armed at night. He said that the sash factory had been fired by a free negro, whom he designated, and who has been arrested. A small quantity of arms had been found under the floor of a negro cabin. They were all new and in good order. In other negro cabins knives and hatchets were found secreted.

The greatest consternation prevailed. Families were closing and barring their windows.

The fire companies being composed of men who are engaged on military duty elsewhere, the fire-engines were worked by negroes, who broke and rendered useless the two best ones. The offices of the Courier and Mercury are said to be destroyed.

Another account states that negro insurrections broke out in the interior of South Carolina two days before the fire, and are still raging unchecked; but this last report is not well authenticated.

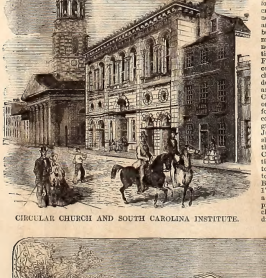
The following history of the city of Charleston is from the Herald:

The city of Charleston is one of the oldest in the United States, having been founded in 1672. Its population was recruited some years afterward by Huguenot refugees who emigrated from France and settled in pretty considerable numbers in South Carolina. From this stock many of the first families of that region now claim to be descended. It was not till 1783 that it was incorporated as a city. Fifty-two years previously, in 1731, it contained six hundred houses and five churches, and a thriving business was done in its port. During the Revolutionary War the possession of the harbor of Charleston was the object of more than one British expedition. A garrison of four hundred on Sullivan's Island, under command of Colonel Moultrie, achieved great distinction by the repulse, on 28th June, 1776, of a British squadron of nine ships-of-war. On the 12th of May, 1780, the city was surrendered to Sir Henry Clinton by General Lincoln, the corporation and principal inhabitants refusing to co-operate in its defense, and offering to acknowledge the sovereignty of Great Britain. The British held it till May, 1782. It contains some thirty churches, a theatre, several excellent hotels, cotton presses and factories, engine and machine factories, ship-yards, and a large dry dock. Its banks and other moneyed corporations enjoyed a high reputation until the secession mania brought destruction upon the city and all its institutions. It has suffered greater disasters by fire than almost any other city in the United States. In 1778 there were two hundred and fifty-two houses consumed; in 1796 nearly a third of the city was destroyed, involving loss of property to the amount of $1,000,000. Again, in the great fire of 1838, the loss was estimated at $5,000,000.

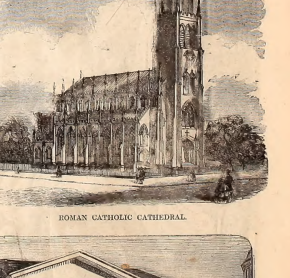
Mr. Simms, in Harper's Magazine for June, 1857, describes some of the buildings, now burned, which appear in our illustrations. Of the "Group of Banks" he says: "That huge, heavy, and somewhat unsightly fabric in the fore-ground is the Planters' and Mechanics' Bank, a structure of the Charleston medieval period. Without, it is a most imposing deformity—a miserable abuse of a mixed model. Next is the Farmers' and Exchange Bank, a fanciful little fabric, a little too ornate for such a worship, and showing beside the Planters' and Mechanics' as a toy-box under the eaves of the Tower of Babel. The building just above is a shop and warehouse, and gives a very fair idea of the style and size of building usually allotted in Charleston to the retail traders. The tall structure further on is the Union Bank, of an old style, but not the oldest in Charleston architecture. Beyond, all the houses are employed in trade—shops, warehouses," etc. Mr. Simms says that the Roman Catholic Cathedral of St. John and St. Finbar "occupies a fine situation at the west end of Broad Street. It is of recent erection, of brown freestone, from a design by Keely, of Brooklyn. Its style is graceful and imposing." Of the Circular Church Mr. Simms says: "This church belongs to the medieval period of the Palmetto City. But recent repairs and alterations have somewhat modernized and improved it; and it is now such an edifice as will not offend the eye of a critical inspector." The South Carolina Institute, which appears in the same view, is described as a structure of the Italian style, with a façade of eighty feet; the entrance being through a lofty arch-way, with staircases leading to the great hall above, capable of seating three thousand persons.

This paper by Mr. Simms contains views and descriptions of all the principal buildings in Charleston; and if, as we have reason to suppose, these buildings have been destroyed, this Magazine article may be the only memorial existing of Charleston as it existed before the Great Rebellion.

Speaking of the fire, the Herald says: "Does it not look like a retribution of Providence, and an omen and a type of the future destruction of the rebellion?"

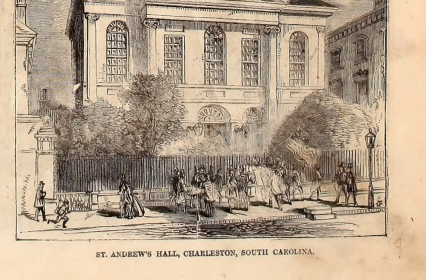


CIRCULAR CHURCH AND SOUTH CAROLINA INSTITUTE.



ROMAN CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL.

HIBERNIAN HALL, CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.



ST. ANDREW'S HALL, CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

GREAT FAIR GIVEN AT THE CITY ASSEMBLY ROOMS, NEW YO

, DECEMBER, 1861, IN AID OF THE CITY POOR.—[See Page 827.]

"LIST OF THE KILLED."

MOTHERS who sit in dumb terror and dread,
Holding that terrible list,
Fearing to look lest you see 'mid the dead
The name of the boy you have kissed—

Kissed on as those who in anguish and pain
Kiss precious faces of clay,
E'en as you would hush and you shuddering lain
That dear one in grave-robes away:

I pity you, sitting with faces so white,
Striving to parry the blow;
I know how that name will torture your sight,
Can fathom the depth of your woe.

By the pang that's rent my desolate heart,
By this crushing weight of despair,
I know how you too will shudder and start,
Reading that dear name there.

I knew how you'll hush that passionate cry,
Thinking of him as he lies,
With beautiful face upturned to the sky,
Death veiling the glorious eyes.

"Fighting he fell!" Does a feeling of pride
Lighten your grief as you think
How brave was the boy that went from your side
How he would die or shrink?

The mother-love triumphs. Men call women weak.
Ah, well, perhaps it is so!
I know there are tears e'en now on my cheek
For the boy that's lying so low.

I know that I start at each step on the stair,
With wild fancies turn to the door,
Thinking, perchance, that my darling is there—
Peace, heart! he can come nevermore.

But still there's a thought that softens my woe:
Above the dead land,
And one day I'll hear, with rapturous glow,
The name of the boy I have kissed.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

A STRANGE STORY.

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER LI.

WHEN we separated for the night, which we did at eleven o'clock, Margrave said:

"Good-night and good-by. I must leave you to-morrow, Strahan, and before your usual hour for rising. I took the liberty of requesting one of your men to see me a chaise from L——. Pardon my seeming abruptness, but I always avoid long leave-takings, and I had fixed the date of my departure almost as soon as I accepted your invitation."

"I have no right to complain. The place must be dull, indeed, to a gay young fellow like you. It is dull even to me. I am meditating flight already. Are you going back to L——?"

"Not even for such things as I left at my lodgings. When I settle somewhere, and can give an address, I shall direct them to be sent to me. For now, I trust, beautiful patches of scenery toward the north, only known to pedestrian tourists. I am a good walker; and you know, Strahan, that I am also a child of Nature. Adieu to you both; and many thanks to you, Strahan, for your hospitality."

He left the room.

"I am not sorry he is going," said Strahan, after a pause, and with a quick breath as if of relief. "I like him, I feel that he exhausts one's An excess of oxygen, as you would say in a lecture."

I was alone in my own chamber; I felt indisposed for bed and for sleep; the curious conversation I had held with Margrave weighed on me. Indeed, we had, in that conversation, touched upon the prodigies which I had not brought myself to speak of with frank courage; and certainly what in Margrave's manner had betrayed consciousness of my suspicions; on the contrary, the open frankness with which he evinced his passion for mystic speculation, or uttered his more unamiable sentiments, rather tended to disarm than encourage belief in gloomy error or sinister powers. And he was about to quit the neighborhood, he would not again see Lilian, not even enter the town of L——. Such, describe his relief from the presence to the promise of the Shadow, or was I not rather right in battling firmly against any grotesque phantom, and accepting his departure as a simple proof that my jealous fears had been among my other chimeras, and that as he had really only visited Lilian out of friendship to me, in my peril, so he might, with his characteristic acuteness, have guessed my jealousy, and ceased his visits from a kindly motive delicately concealed? And might not the same motive now have dictated the words which were intended to assure me that I—— contained no attractions to tempt him to return to it? Thus gradually soothed and cheered by the course to which my reflections led me, I continued to muse for hours. At length, looking at my watch, I was surprised to find it was the second hour after midnight. I was just about to rise from my chair to undress, and secure some hours of sleep, when the well-remembered cold wind passed through the room, stirring the roots of my hair, and before me stood, against the wall, the Luminous Shadow.

"Rise, and follow me," said the voice, sounding much nearer to me than it had ever done before.

And at those words I rose mechanically, and like a sleep-walker.

"Take up the light."

I took it.

The Scin-Læca glided along the wall toward the threshold, and motioned to me to open the door. I did so. The Shadow flitted into through the corridor. I followed, with hushed footsteps, down a small stair into Forman's study. In all my subsequent proceedings, about to be narrated, the Shadow guided me, sometimes by voice, sometimes by sign. I obeyed the guidance not only unresistingly but without a desire to resist. I was unconscious either of curiosity or of awe—only of a calm and passive indifference, neither pleasurable nor painful. In this obedience, from which all will seemed extracted, I took into my hands the staff which I had examined the day before, and which by the solid knob just where Margrave had cast it on re-entering the house. I unclosed the shutter to the casement, lifted the sash, and, with the light in my left hand, the staff in my right, stepped forth into the garden. The night was still; the flame of the candle scarcely trembled in the air; the Shadow moved on before me toward the old pavilion described in an earlier part of this narrative, and of which the interior has been already described. I followed the Shadow into the pavilion, up the crazy stair to the room above, with its four great blank, unglazed windows, its dreary cobwebs, north, south, east, and west. I halted on the middle of the floor. Right before my eyes, through the vast, dark, and lightless windows, stood out from the moonlit air the dreary mansoleum. Then, at the command conveyed to me, I placed the light on a wooden stool, and touched a spring in the handle of the staff, a lid flew back, and I drew from the hollow first a lump of some dark and resinous substance, next a small slender wand of polished steel, of which the point was tipped with a translucent material which appeared to me like crystal. Kneeling down, still obedient to the direction conveyed to me, I described on the floor with the lump of bitumen (if I may so call it) the form of the pentacle with the interlaced triangles, in a circle nine feet in diameter, just as I had drawn it for Margrave the evening before. The moonlight now made the figure perceptible in a dark color of mingled black and red. I applied the flame of the candle to the circle, and immediately it became lumber with a low steady splendor that rose about an inch from the floor, and gradually from this light there seemed to spring a dim transparent mist and a faint but exquisite odor. I stood in the midst of the circle, and within the circle also, by my side, still stood the Scin-Læca; no longer reflected on the wall, but apart from it, erect, rounded into more integral and clearer form, yet impalpable as before. Then breathed an icy air. Then lifting the wand, the broader end of which rested in the palm of my hand, the two forms brought up the sound, and played in a dirge-like chorus; and the howling went on louder and louder. Again strange words were whispered to me, and I repeated them in mechanical submission; and when they, too, were ended I felt the ground tremble beneath me, and as my eyes looked straight forward down the vista, like, stretching into the casement, was bounded by the gothic mausoleum, vague forms shadowy and dim to pass across the moonlight—below, along the award—above, in the air; and then suddenly a terror, not before conceived, came upon me.

And a third time words were whispered; but though I knew no more of their meaning than I did of those that had preceded, I felt that my pagnance to utter them aloud. Mutely I turned toward the Scin-Læca, and the expression of its face was menacing and fierce. I felt that a struggle must compelled to the control imposed upon me, and my lips commenced the formula again whispered to me. But my voice was drowned in a voice of warning and of anguish, that murmured "Hold!" I knew the voice; it was Lilian's. I paused—I looked toward the casement from which the voice had come, and in the space afar I saw the features, the form of Lilian. Her arms were stretched toward me in the moonlight, her countenance was deadly pale and anxious with unutterable distress. The whole image seemed wan, unless with the moon—dim, the attitude, the gesture, of one who sees another in deadly peril, and cries "Beware!"

This apparition lasted but a moment; in that moment sufficed to free my mind from the constraint which had before enslaved it. I dashed the wand in the ground, sprang from the circle, rushed from the place. How I got into my own room I can remember not—I know not; I have a vague remembrance of long harrowing wanderings, of giant trees, of shroud-like moonlight, of the Shining Shadow and its angry aspect, of the black walls and iron door of the House of the Dead, of spectral images—a confused and dreary phantasmagoria. But all I can recall with distinctness is that I found my own lueless face in the mirror in my own still room, by the light of the white moon through the window; and sinking down, I said to myself:

"This, at least, is a hallucination or a dream!"

CHAPTER LII.

A HEAVY sleep came over me at daybreak, but I did not undress nor go to bed. The sun was high in the heavens when, on waking, I saw the servant who had attended me bustling about the room.

"I beg your pardon, Sir, I am afraid I 'disturbed you; but I have been three times to see if you were not coming down, and found you so soundly asleep I did not like to wake you. Mr. Strahan has finished breakfast, and gone out riding; Mr. Margrave has left—left before six o'clock."

"Ah, he said he was going early."

"Yes, Sir; and he desired me to cross when he went. I could never have supposed so pleasant a gentleman could put himself into such a passion!"

"What was the matter?"

"Why, his walking-stick could not be found. It was not in his hall. He said he had left it in the study; we could not find it there. At last he found it himself in the old summer-house, and said—I beg pardon, he said—" he was sure you had taken it there: that some one, at all events, had been meddling with it." However, I am very glad it was found, since he seems to set such store on it."

"Did Mr. Margrave go himself into the summer-house to look for it?"

"Yes, Sir; no one else would have thought of such a place; no one likes to go there even in the day-time."

"Why?"

"Why, Sir, they say it is haunted since poor Sir Philip's death; and either there are strange noises in every part of the house. I am afraid you had a bad night, Sir," continued the servant, with evident curiosity glancing toward the bed, which I had not pressed, and toward the evening-dress, which, while he spoke, I was rapidly changing for that which I habitually wore in the morning. "I hope you did not feel your self ill?"

"No; but it seems I fell asleep in my chair."

"Did you hear, Sir, how the dogs howled about two o'clock in the morning? They woke me. Very frightful!"

"The moon was at her full. Dogs will bay the moon."

I felt relieved to think that I should not find Strahan in the breakfast-room, and hastening through the ceremony of a meal which I scarcely touched, I went out into the park unobserved, and creeping round the copses and into the neglected garden, made my way to the pavilion. I mounted the crazy stair, and halted on the floor of the upper room; yes, there still was the black figure of the pentacle—the circle. So, then, it was not a dream! I had not doubted. Or might it not still be so far a dream, that I had walked in my sleep, and, with an imagination preoccupied by my conference with Margrave —by the hieroglyphics on the staff I had handled, by the very figure associated with superstitious prejudice, I had, in an undistinguishable somnambulism, carried thither in sleep the staff, described the circle, and all the rest been but visionary delusion? Surely—surely, no common sense such as Julius Faber would interpret the riddles that perplexed me. Be that as it may, my first thought was to efface the marks on the floor. I found this easier than I had ventured to hope. I rubbed the circle and the pentacle away from the boards with the sole of my foot. There was an undistinguishable smudge behind. I know not why, but I felt the more nervously anxious to remove all such evidence of my visit to that room, because Margrave had so openly gone thither to seek for the staff, and had so rudely named me as the servant who had intermeddled with it. Might he not awake some suspicion against me? Suspicion, what of? I knew not, but I feared!

The healthful air had gradually nerved my spirits and relieved my thoughts. But the place had become hateful to me. I resolved not to wait for Strahan's return, but to walk back to L——, and leave a message for my host. It was sufficient excuse that I could not longer absent myself from my pupils; accordingly, I gave directions to have the few things that I had brought with me sent to my house by my servant who might arrive with the chaise, and was well pleased to find myself outside the park gates and on the high road.

I had not gone a mile before I met Strahan on horseback. He received my apologies for not waiting his return to bid him farewell, without observing them, or pretending, but his brow and walked beside me on my road. I saw that there was something on his mind; at last he said, looking down:

"Did you hear the dogs howl last night?"

"Yes! the full moon."

"You sound asleep, then, at the time. Did you hear any other sound? Did you see any thing?"

"What should I hear or see!"

Strahan was silent for some moments; then he said, with great seriousness,

"I could not sleep when I went to bed last night; I felt feverish and restless. Somehow or other Margrave got into my head, mixed up, in some strange way, with Sir Philip Derval. I heard the dogs howl, and at the same time, or rather a few minutes later, I felt the whole house tremble, as a real convey-house in London seems to tremble at night when a carriage is driven past it. The howling had then ceased, and could not have lasted long. Well, I felt a vague superstitious alarm; I got up and went to my window, which was unclosed (it is my habit to sleep with my windows open)—the moon was very bright—and I saw, I declare I saw, along the green alley that leads from the old part of the house to the summer-house, I—I will not say what I saw or believed I saw—you would ridicule me, and justly. But whatever it might be, on the earth without or in the fancy within my brain, I was so terrified, that I rushed back to my bed, and buried my face in my pillow. I would have come to you; but I did not dare to stir. I have been riding hard all the morning in order to recover my nerves. But I dread sleeping again under that roof, and now that you and Margrave leave me, I shall go this very day to London. I hope all that I have told you is no bad sign of any coming disease, blood to the head, eh?"

"No; but imagination overstrained can produce serious effects. You do right to change the scene. Go to London at once, amuse yourself, and—"

"Not return till the old house is razed to the ground. That is my resolve. You approve? That's well. All success to you, Fenwick! I will accept the chaise, and get my portmanteau ready and the carriage out in time for the five o'clock train."

So then, he too, had seen—what? I did not dare, and I did not desire to ask him. But he, at least, was not walking in his sleep! Did we both dream, or neither?

CHAPTER LIII.

THERE is an instance of the absorbing tyranny of everyday life which must have struck all such of my readers as have ever experienced one of those portents which are so at variance with everyday life, that the ordinary epithet bestowed on them is "supernatural."

And be my readers few or many, there will be no small proportion of them to whom, once, at least, in the course of their existence, a something strange and eirie has occurred—a something which perplexed and baffled rational conjecture, which left on those about it vivid vibrate to superstition. It may have been only a dream unaccountably verified, an undefinable presentiment unforewarning; it may from such slighter and vaguer tokens of the realm of marvel—up to the portents of ghostly apparitions or haunted chambers, I believe that the greater number of persons arrived at middle age, however instructed the class, however civilized the land, however skeptical the creed, to which they belong, have either in themselves experienced, or heard received by intimate associates whose veracity they accept as indisputable in all ordinary transactions of life—phenomena which are not to be solved by the wit that mocks them, nor, perhaps, by the logic and reason, to the contentment of the reason or the philosophy that explains them away. Such phenomena, I say, are not to be unfrequent even among those persons for the instances currently quoted and dismissed with a jest, for few of those who have witnessed them have courage to own it, and the very fear which common sense is a merciles persecutor. But he who reads my assertion in the quiet of his own room will, perhaps, candidly ransack his memory, and find there, in some dark corner which he excludes from "the babbling and remoreless day," some recollection that proves the assertion not untrue.

And it is, I say, an instance of the absorbing tyranny of everyday life that whenever any such startling incident disturbs its regular tenor of thought and occupation, that same everyday life does its best to bury in its sands the object which has troubled its surface; the more unaccountable, the more prodigious has been the phenomenon, the more violently scared and astounded is the mere, with involuntary effort, the mind seeks to rid itself of an enigma which might disease the understanding to solve it. We go about our mundane business with renewed avidity; we feel the necessity of proving to ourselves that we are still sober, practical men, and refuse to be unified for the world which we know, by unsolicited visitations from worlds into which every glimpse is soon shut eternally shadows. We endeavor to think how soon such incidents, though not actually forgotten, though they can be recalled—and recalled too often for health—are only, at are, nevertheless, thrust, as it were, out of the mind's sight, as we cast into lumber-rooms the crutches and sunken beds around us of a relative for which has recovered its strength and tone. It is a felicitous peculiarity in our organization, which and how invariably the mind will thus endeavor to rid itself of the incubus which disease the over and recall it. No man freed an home before from a raging toothache, the or a neuralgia, sad, retracted in his ever, to conduct and ponder upon the anguish he has undergone. It is the same with certain afflictions of the spirit—like those that endanger life, or affections, or blast our fortunes, overshadowing our whole future with a sense of loss—but where a trouble or a calamity has been of short date, an episode in our wonted life, where it affects ourselves alone, where it is attended with a sense of shame and humiliation, where the pain of recalling it seems idle, and if indulged would almost madden us; agonies of that kind we do not like to own, and we do over the death or falsehood of beloved friends, or the train of events by which we are reduced from wealth to penury. We are, for instance, who has escaped from a shipwreck, from the brink of a precipice, from the jaws of a tiger, spends his days and nights in reviving his terrors past, reimagining dangers not to occur again, or, if they do occur, from which the experience undergone can suggest no additional safeguards. The current of our life, indeed, like that of the rivers, is most rapid in the mildest channel, where all streams run calm, comparatively slow in the depth, and along the shores in which each life, as each river, has a character peculiar to itself. And hence, those who would sail with the tide of the world, as those who sail with the tide of a river, hasten to take the middle of the stream, or those who sail against the tide are found clinging to the shore. I returned to my habitual duties and avocations with renewed energy; I did more for my thoughts to dwell on the dreary wonders that had haunted me from the evening I first met Sir Philip Derval to the morning in which I had united the house of his heir; whether realities or hallucinations, no guess of mine could unravel such mazes, and no prudence of mine guard me against their repetition. But I had no fear that they would be repeated, any more than that those who has gone through ship-wreck, or the hair-breadth escape from a fall down a glacier, fears again to be found in a similar peril. Margrave had departed, whither I knew not, and, with his departure, ceased all sense of his influence. A certain calm within me, a tranquillizing feeling of relief, seemed to me like a pledge of permanent delivery.

But that which did accompany and haunt me through all my occupations and pursuits, was the melancholy remembrance of the love I had lost in Lilian. I heard from Mrs. Ashleigh, who still frequently visited me, that her daughter seemed much in the same quiet state of mind—perfectly reconciled to our separation—seldom mentioning my name, never mentioning it with indifference; the only thing remarkable in her state was her aversion to all society, and a kind of lethargy that would come over her often in the day. She would suddenly fall into sleep, and so remain for hours, but a sleep that seemed very serene and tranquil, and from which she woke of herself. She kept much within her own room, and always retired to it when visitors were announced.

Mrs. Ashleigh began reluctantly to relinquish the persuasion she had so long and so obstinately maintained on this state of feeling toward myself—and, indeed, this general change in Lilian—was but temporary and abnormal; she began to allow that I was best to drop all thoughts of a renewed engagement—a future union. I proposed to see Lilian in her presence and in my professional capacity; perhaps some physical cause, especially for this lethargy, might be detected and removed. Mrs. Ashleigh owned to me that the idea had occurred to herself; she had sounded Lilian upon it; but her daughter had so resolutely opposed it; had said with so quiet a firmness, that all hope of union between us, a visit from me would be unwelcome and painful; that Mrs. Ashleigh felt that an interview thus deprecated would only confirm estrangement. One day, in calling, she asked my advice whether it would not be better to try the effect of change of air and scene, and, in some other place, some other medical opinion might be taken? I approved of this suggestion with unqualified readiness.

"And," said Mrs. Ashleigh, shedding tears, "if that experiment prove unsuccessful, I will write and let you know; and then we must then consider what to say to the world as a reason why the marriage is broken off. I can render this more easy by saying, you, I will not return to L—— till the matter has ceased to be the topic of talk, and as a distance any excuse will be less questioned and seem more natural. But still—still—let us hope still."

"Have you one ground for hope?"

"Perhaps so; but you will think it very frail and fallacious."

"Name it, and let me judge."

"One night—in which you were on a visit to Derval Court—"

"Ay, that night."

"Lilian woke me by a lond cry (she sleeps in the next room to me, and the door was left open); I hastened to her bedside in alarm; she was sobbing, and passionately struggling against and convulsed. She kept calling on your name in a tone of passionate fondness, but as if in great terror. She cried, 'Do not go, Allen! do not go! you know not what you brave! what you do!' Then she rose in her bed, clasping her hands. She was set and rigid: I tried to awake her, but could not. After a little time she breathed a deep sigh, and murmured, 'Allen, Allen, you obey! did you not hear—did you not see me?' What could thus baffle matter and traverse space but love and soul? Can you still doubt, Allen?' Doubt that I love you, now, shall love you evermore? Yonder, yonder, as here below!' She then sank back on her pillow, weeping, and then I woke her."

"And what did she say on waking?"

"She did not remember what she had dreamed, except that she had passed through some great terror—but called, with a vague smile, 'It is over, and I feel happy now.' Then she turned round and fell asleep again, but quietly as a child, the tears dried, the smile resting."

"Go, my dear friend, go; take Lilian away from this place as soon as you can; divert her mind with fresh scenes. I hope! I do hope! Let me know where you fix yourself. I will seize a holiday—I need one; I will arrange as to my patients—I will come to the same place; she need not know of it—but I must be by to watch, to be of use, if need be. Heaven bless you for what you have said! I hope! I do hope!"

CHAPTER LIV.

Some days after I received a few lines from Mrs. Ashleigh. Her arrangements for departure were made. They were to start the next morning. She had fixed on going into the north of Devonshire, and staying some weeks either at Ilfracombe or Lynton, whichever place Lilian preferred. She would write as soon as they were settled.

I was up at my usual early hour the next morning. I resolved to go out toward Mrs. Ashleigh's house, and watch, unnoticed, where I might, perhaps, catch a glimpse of Lilian as she set two hours before the train by which Mrs. Ashleigh proposed to leave. A loud ring at my bell! I opened the door. Mrs. Ashleigh rushed in, falling on my breast.

"Lilian! Lilian!"

"Heavens! What has happened?"

"She has left—she is gone—gone away! Oh, Allen! how?—whither? Advise me. What is to be done?"

"Come in—compose yourself—tell me all—clearly, quickly. Lilian gone?—gone away? impossible! She must be hid somewhere in the house—the garden—she, perhaps, did not like the journey. She may have crept away to some young friend's house. But I talk when you should talk to me all."

Little enough to tell! Lilian had seemed unusually cheerful the night before, and pleased at the thought of the excursion. Mother and daughter retired to rest early: Mrs. Ashleigh saw Lilian sleeping quietly before she herself went to bed. She woke between the hours when dressed herself, went into the next room to call Lilian—Lilian was not there. No suspicion of flight occurred to her. Perhaps her daughter might be up already, and gone down stairs, remembering something she might wish to pack and take with her. But Lilian was not. Mrs. Ashleigh was confirmed in this idea when she noticed that her own room door was left open. She went down stairs, met a maid-servant, who had, who told her, with alarm and surprise, that both the street and garden doors were found unclosed. No one had seen Lilian. Mrs. Ashleigh now became seriously uneasy. On remounting to her daughter's room, she missed Lilian's bonnet and mantle. The house and garden were then searched in vain. There could be no doubt that Lilian had gone—must have stolen noiselessly at night through the house, and escaped by the side door of the house and through the garden.

"Do you think she could have received any letter, any message, any visitor unknown to you?"

"I can not think it. Why do you ask? Oh, Allen, you do not believe in any mysterious police in this disappearance! No, you do not believe it. But my child's honor! What will the world think?"

Not for the world cared I at that moment. I could think only of Lilian, and without one suspicion that invested blame to her.

"Be quiet, be silent: perhaps she has gone on some visit, and will return. Meanwhile, leave inquiry to me."

THE RING.

Your placed this ring on my finger,
My Willie warm and true,
And bade me take it off when I
Loved some one more than you.

You went to fight for native land,
My Willie strong and brave,
And when you went you kissed me and
I did you to the grave.

Low on my dying bed, Willie,
I'm lying in this hour,
But the ring is on my finger still,
And I love you more and more.

I'm wasted to a shade, Willie,
My voice comes faint and low,
But my heart is strong with love for you,
And the ring shall never go.

My hand is thin and white, Willie,
My finger is too small;
And last night, as I slept, the ring
Slipped off—I heard it fall.

No one was nigh me then, Willie,
To give it me again,
And I crept down and got it, though
I thrilled with fearful pain.

And now I'm dying. No one knows
What rashness I have done;
I'll never tell them what I did;
They'll wonder when I'm gone.

Good-by, a last good-by, Willie,
My voice comes faint and low;
But I keep my thin hand tightly shut—
The ring shall never go!

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, November, 1861.

MISSISSIPPI MORTAR-BOATS.

On page 821 we publish a picture representing the FLEET OF MORTAR-BOATS which have been built for the Mississippi River service. Our artist, Mr. Simplot, writes us as follows:

"ST. LOUIS, December 11, 1861.

"Inclosed I send you a sketch of the Mortar-Boats intended for service in the military expedition down the Mississippi. They are thirty-eight in number, and are now lying complete—with the exception of their necessary armament—near this city. I understand, however, that they will be towed down immediately to Cairo, and there equipped. Each boat is to carry a heavy mortar, and will be also used for conveying the troops on the expedition."

THE GREAT FAIR AT NEW YORK.

We devote pages 824 and 825 to illustrations of THE GREAT FAIR which opened on Friday, December 13, at the New York Assembly Rooms. This fair was got up by the LADIES OF NEW YORK, without distinction of sect, for the relief of the poor, especially that part of them left destitute by the war. It proved a complete success. The array of beauty and fashion which gathered round the ladies who presided there surpassed, and the proceeds will prove a handsome fund for the object proposed by the managers. The rooms were placed at the disposal of the Ladies' Aid Association by A. T. STEWART, Esq.

THE EXECUTION OF JOHNSON.

On page 828 we illustrate the military execution of Johnson, who was shot at Washington for desertion on 13th. The culprit's crime is clearly described in the following extract from his confession:

I had not the slightest intention of deserting up to a few minutes before I started in the direction of the enemy's lines. The way I came to leave our army was this: I was on the outposts, and after dinner, when our watering orders were, I thought I would go to the first house on the Brandy Station road and get a drink of milk. I went to the first house I saw a man and a boy. I asked the man for some milk, and he told the boy to go and get it. I asked him where I could get some, he said he did not know, except I would go to the next house further on. I said I believed I would be dangerous to go far, and he remarked that none of the people around there had a kind feeling for rebels. It was then that I conceived the idea of deserting. I told the man, after drinking the milk it was at the time, I was the enemy's line, go and see my mother in New Orleans, stay for some time in the South, and then be able to get back to our regiment again, perhaps with some valuable information. I told him my name was Carter of the rebels, and as it is I would rather be hung on a tree by the Yankees than be captured by the rebels, as I knew that heaven put it into my head to go army. I acted more like a crazy man at the moment. I remained at the house until some of the enemy had been seen lately in that vicinity. I asked where it was that the five rebels I had heard of had been seen some days ago. He said it was at the second house on the left-hand side of the road. I asked him where it was from there to Centreville, and he went that way. Riding along on the Braddock road, some miles beyond Centreville, I met a man named Colonel Taylor, of the Third New Jersey regiment, with his escort of cavalry. I thought he was the rebels, but at first was so scared that I did not know what to say. However, I managed to tell him that I was a deserter, and I told my name. He said to him, "I'm all right, then." "Why so?" he asked. "Because we are old friends," said I. "I am retired to—I went to go down to New Orleans to see my mother." He said, "Very well," and then our interview continued. I told him two of our companies which had been sent out to reconnoitre were cut-ups. He asked if I thought he could capture any of them, and I told him I thought he could. He said that he had heard that there were a number of mounted riflemen around. The horse scout and men which belong to the Lincoln men received, and on the same time said, "Let me see your pistol." I handed him my revolver. Colonel Taylor looked it, and cocking it, said to me, "Dismount, or I will blow your brains out." I was so much frightened "thought my brains had been blown out already. I dismounted, delivered up my horse and arms at the same time. They searched my pockets, but there was nothing in them except a piece of New York Ledger, I believe. They he tied my hands behind me, and sent me back to camp in charge of the Lincoln scouter who took up the trail.

He was duly tried by court-martial and found guilty. The sentence having been approved, it was ordered that it be carried into effect on 18th. The following extract from the Herald report completes the melancholy history:

The spot chosen for the impressive scene was a spacious field near the Capitol grounds, about a thousand from the camp ground of the division. The troops fell into line, forming three sides of a square, in the order observed in the programme, precisely at three o'clock a.m.

In the mean time the funeral procession was formed at the quarters of Captain Boyd, Provost Marshal of the Alexandria district, and Sub-queens of Generals Casey and Franklin. Shortly after three o'clock it reached the fatal field.

The Provost Marshal, mounted and wearing a crimson scarf across his left, led the funeral cortège. He was immediately followed by the buglers of the regiment, four abreast, playing a dirge. Then came the twelve men—one from each company in the regiment, selected by ballot—who constituted the firing party. In the order observed the leading rifle—had been previously loaded under the direction of the Provost Marshal, one was loaded with a blank cartridge, according to the usual custom, so that neither of the men could be positive that he had the real ball which killed the unfortunate man. The coffin, which was of pine wood stained, and without any inscriptions, came next in a one-horse wagon. Immediately behind followed the unfortunate man, in the same wagon. About five feet six inches in height, with light hair and whiskers, his eyes brown joining each other, Johnson presented a most forlorn appearance. He was dressed in his every-day clothes, the regulation overcoat and black gloves. He was supported by the Rev. Mr. Hamilton, his constant companion with him, while Father Willett rode behind on horseback. The rear was brought up by Company A, of the Lincoln Cavalry, forming the escort.

Arriving at the ground as I have said past three o'clock, the musicians and the escort took a position a little to the left, while the whole procession followed the wagon. The coffin was placed on the ground, and he took his place beside it. The firing party was placed within a few paces of the prisoner, who stood between the clergymen. The final order of execution was then given by the Provost Marshal.

While the order was being read Johnson stood with his hat on, his head a little inclined to the left, and his eyes fixed in a steady gaze on the ground. Near the close of the reading of the order he looked around inquiringly, evidently in his ear. Johnson had expressed a desire to say a few final words, but the Provost Marshal was not accustomed to such requests, and therefore declined to grant the favor. Johnson, however, by consulting

THE EXECUTION OF THE DESERTER WILLIAM JOHNSON IN GENERAL FRANKLIN'S DIVISION, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—[SEE PAGE 827.]

FORT PULASKI, SAVANNAH RIVER, GEORGIA.—FROM A SKETCH BY AN OFFICER OF THE NAVY.—[SEE PAGE 827.]

OLD TYBEE.

I HOPE I may never write another story if there is not as much essential truth in this about Old Tybee as the strictest fact-monger has a right to require. You have heard his name before, no doubt. It has lately been carried about like a torch, and flared across a good many troubled faces, while a very respectable number of people have smiled at the token with the sort of satisfaction that bears ever with it an all adequate sense of occasions.

My Tybee was the keeper of a light-house. He had kept it for forty years, and might reckon the trips up the winding stair by the thousand. I knew about him years ago, when I was young and poor. If I coveted his situation in those days, I at least did not petition for it. I doubt if any body ever thought of his removal from his post as if the thing were possible. We considered that his presence was essential, as well as the light he managed, for the safe-conduct of vessels down that dangerous shore; as if somehow he were the medium through which the saving ray must pass, the wonderful light that was visible a dozen miles at sea. Well, if you had met once the glance of his eyes you would understand me better.

One day while he stood in the tower, where his daughter had left him, well satisfied with the result of her labor in polishing the shield of the lantern and its manifold reflectors, Tybee saw a boat approaching the island, and I carried half a dozen men for passengers. While he stood watching them, vaguely wondering what their errand might be, with now and then a fresh glance of solicitude cast at the result of his daughter's work, he perceived that the strangers were uniform, and that they were proceeding by the steep path which cut rock on which the tower was built. His first impulse was to go down and meet them, since of course they were seeking him.

But Old Tybee was not agile now as once. His rheumatism made him think twice in these days concerning movements to which once his limbs would had immediately urged him. So he stood on the highest step of the great stair, and listened, and waited.

On they came, tramp, tramp, six resolute, following men, to confront a poor old keeper. When he had once looked upon their faces the man-sense a consternation seized upon the old man, as if these young fellows were more terrible than the great ocean to which he had given his best and his youth for dear and familiar companionship. But the sea had never proved his enemy, and these had not the look of friends. At least he was sure that they had come on no kindly errand. His presentiment was soon justified; for, in spite of themselves, the strangers betrayed not depraved themselves with real friendliness toward the keeper of the lighthouse. That he had kept an steadily performing the duties of his office night after night for years was it this that had made him obnoxious to the fiercely-bearded striplings? It would actually seem so, thought poor Old Tybee.

The youngest of the company, evidently an officer, was the first to speak.

"Sir, have your famous light, is it? Shall I put a ball through its head, Colonel?"

"If you did you'd deserve to have daylight put through your own. You answered the others on the company, who was yet far from old, though his hair was gray.

"I shall never learn your economics," replied the younger, no little vanity in the satisfaction with which he announced his incapacity.

"You'll have to learn patience though, and all the rest of us before we're through with this business," observed the other. "How far out do they say the light is?"

"Twelve mile," answered Old Tybee; but the pride with which he was accustomed to give this bit of information had now no evidence. The heart of him was full of consternation, and he stood looking from one man to the other, wondering if their talk was to be taken for such expression as he feared. The doubt was quickly silenced.

"Well, boys," said the grave Colonel, "you've done a hard day's work already, but the job is to pay for doing. It's pretty firmly set and meant to last, the lantern is, but if you're careful you can dislodge it and be home again before dark."

The four men who had accompanied the officers now stood forward, and one of them untying a sack Tybee had not noticed before, took from it the tools by which the lamp was to be removed from its setting.

Old Tybee's time for expostulation had evidently come. Trembling with indignation and amazement he exclaimed,

"What do you—what are you going to do? It's my business to tend to this here light-house. Government gave me the situation for life, you ought to know."

At that they all laughed, and the younger officer's face expressed ineffable contempt at the mention of the government. But the old man was answered by a look to restrain this ardent iconoclast, and he answered poor Tybee gravely and kindly.

"You only going to save our old friend the trouble of climbing up his long stair next winter. Such a break-neck place I never was in before, and I am satisfied that a man of your years should have been imposed upon so long. How long have you kept the light burning, Tybee?"

"I've been forty year."

"Then you've had your share of spoils, you needn't complain," said one of the men grimly.

"As we never removed all that time, sir," asked the Colonel.

"No, nor ever heard such a thing once talked of," Tybee answered. "What's going to be done without the light out there on the rock the ships travel by?"

"That's their own look-out. Government finds it costs too much to furnish travelers their lights. They'll be expecting refreshments next, you know. We've got to learn prudence, the Colonel says, and he understands these things."

Old Tybee looked at the young man as if he would have admired to see the daylight put through him according to his officer's suggestion, but he held his peace.

"You had better go down," said the Colonel to the old man. Though now a man of war, battle was evidently not his proper element; and he was constantly apprehensive of the issue of things that might in a moment be brought about up there in the tower by the hot head of his lieutenant. "The men will be getting on board, and I'll be there," continued, with a gentle expostulation in his voice as if he had been speaking to a woman. "I'll stay and see that no harm comes to the light. And when it's set up again, nobody shall take your place here—you shall keep it burning as long as you live. I give you my word."

Still Tybee lingered. The question remained the young man's flippant answer he would not take for a reply.

"What's to become of all the vessels, Sir?" he asked again. And what true man in his senses would think of avoiding a reply to a question supposed so solemnly, with such deep concern, such disdainful disregard of whatever personal danger might attend his sedulousness?

"What did they do before there was a light?" asked the Colonel, annoyed and troubled. "They'll carry their own, I fancy, with them, perhaps, as we sailors should, and use them, and not rush along like blind fools trusting to other folks to keep them from the ditch." The Colonel spoke superbly in the words as the Colonel's voice could possibly convey. Then Old Tybee made his last stand.

"I don't know nothing like that," he said, his gray head. "I don't know who sent you here. You seem to have some sort of right. You look like officers. I'm only a keeper. I've got no regimentals. I can show you my commission."

The young lieutenant with a loud laugh touched his cap with mock deference to the old man.

"I suppose now you wouldn't really insist on serving the State after you had an honorable discharge. You see in a few minutes—second, boy!—there won't be any light-house here to speak of what can you keep then? Do you want the Government to come down like a thief in the night? It's enough to know that the State has decided that this institution is a nuisance, and must therefore be located and abolished. "Isn't it? Come! you're a sensible old fellow!".

But again spoke the older man, and even more kindly than before. He could perceive the desperate distress that would presently overwhelm poor Old Tybee.

"When the light is needed again it will be set in the tower again, and I'll see, as I said before, that so faithful a servant of the State is restored to his place again. But now you are needed and should be glad to take a rest, for it won't be a long one."

And now indeed, perceiving that his resistance was in vain, the old man began to descend the stairs. When he had reached the door of the tower he stood looking out upon the sea—far out, and far down upon the rocks, where the ships, and he seemed to see a wreck on every wave, and the beach was strewn with the bodies of the lost.

Now and then he paused a shelf, as to ascertain how the diabolical work going on within the strong stone walls progressed. Many times he looked, and saw, as he well knew it must be, nothing. But at last there was a spectacle indeed! From the flag-staff which on all holidays, and on many another when lieutenants wished to demonstrate itself to the old fellows who perhaps were sailing down from Marblehead or Narragansett (names harmless of all their associations with those of North America, for Tybee was a man from Marblehead)—from that very flag-staff another flag was flying, and it threw out the colors of mourning. Yes, Old Tybee, sit down on the rock and weep, for it is time to weep.

Shuddering, he turned away from the spectacle and knew not where to go. Wherever he went it would haunt him—compel his eyes, and grieve his heart. Old Tybee was not prone to answer questions of man, woman, or child. He tried to kiss himself among the shore-rocks till the men had gone down from the tower, launched their boat, and rowed away, and even till night came on.

Who could have looked with indifference on the answer of that old man?

I doubt if any bore on that sad summer day an sadder heart than he.

When he went home at last it was to take his accustomed place in the corner of the fire-place where his daughter was busying herself preparing for their supper. As it was the first evening, but he warmed himself as if a chill were on him, and Maggie was so disturbed by his aspect when he came in that she could not be induced to eat herself instantly, and brought him a drink of stuff that had a strong odor, and usually an exhilarating effect. At first he seemed disposed to refuse it, but she urged it upon him in her irresistible way, so that he presently drained the glass; still he gave it back to her without a word or even a look of acknowledgment.

Presently came little Tom frisking about, and chattering in mirth of some trouble he got in after any one but a child would have felt his joints awkwardly stiffening under such a chilling influence as the old man displayed.

The first question the little fellow asked was the one most natural for him. He had asked it every night since his grandfather took his post in the boat that he might see the beacon light the sailors watched for coming down the ocean, and saw, though their sailing was to be round the rock of Tom's imagination.

"Does it shine bright, grand'ther?"

Heretofore the old man's cheerful and unvarying answer had been, however preoccupied his mind,

"Bright as ever—bright and warm as any lie!" He now made no response whatever, but sat looking into the fire as if he did not even see the preparations going on there for his comfortable evening meal, and did not behold his daughter, who at this very hour, for so many years, had been engaged in the same occupation, getting tea for her father.

Was he thinking far back into the time when she was like Tom there, running up and down under every body's feet, but in nobody's way?—when her mother stood in her place, and Thomas Gwyn was as far beyond their knowledge as the undiscovered happiness is this day beyond ours? He had lived those years. How long he would be seventy. He was thinking of a dream he had one night, in the first year of his life on the island, when his daughter looked out, amid his mass, of little Tom—with a tender thought, too, toward the elder lad,

"Don't, father? Does it shine bright tonight?" speaking as women do when they speak merely for love; looking surprised, too, so different was her tone from common, that in which she had left him not long ago, when she had finished the polishing business in the tower—for Old Tybee was not variable, but calm and steady in his moods.

Brief was his answer, and gloomy as brief.

"It isn't Old Tybee's fault if they're all wrecked. They've broke her moorings and took her off. I saw 'em. What could I do? They was too many for me—six to one—with the Guvment to back 'em. That sounds like a curse-be. They're going to make wreckers of us, I expect. It comes to that since the Guvment's going in for wrecking vessels itself. I'm glad I'm not to have a hand in plundering kind o' poppilation on this island afore long."

"The lamp ain't down!" exclaimed Maggie, aghast. "Oh, father, you took the light off? Lord a mercy! what for, father?"

"You can't guess," he answered. "No wonder. Don't you see? The lamp's down, and I may take say I surrendered. Six to one..... What have you got there for supper, Mag?"

But Maggie heard this question, it was not after his usual way of asking. He didn't care for the answer Maggie gave. That was evident from the way he put down his head between his hands, and paid no heed, though his daughter ceased from her operations and walked out of the house to the gate of the little garden, where she loved to sit a garden, Tom following her. She came back immediately, and said, with a groan, "There ain't no light, Tom! Oh, what'll become of Thomas Gwyn? I never saw it dark afore like that on the island!"

What'll become of all the shipping that's got along so safe and snug past all the slippery places, thanks to me and the Guvment! It's a devilish bit; and Old Tybee's been a long way for it! He's an old man: I'm near seventy. My bones ain't worth much to them rascals."

"The light's down," continued Maggie again. You might as well have told her some scientific fact whose consequences could not touch our planet. She would have listened to it as well as to the strange idea she was battling against, that no longer from the rock whereon the round tower stood would the light be flashed to guide the mariners who sailed along that dangerous coast.

"Forty years ago I dreamed it was put out," said Old Tybee; and he turned and looked at his daughter.

Instant was her answer, and with it the first gleam of hope that had shone in his desperate face.

"But mother dreamed that it was lit again. You told me that. And you had the doing of it in her dream. Who knows? Perhaps to pass the other way as well. And it's got to!"

Cheered by her own prediction, Maggie turned away from the window, and resumed her cooking operations, causing thereby a savory smell to arise and possess itself of the old dark room, and presently she heard the pleased satisfaction finding itself so often renewed itself in her small experience, an Indian coke and fried fish on the table, and called Tom to come from the garden, and they sat around the board as though nothing had happened. Any body looking in upon them might have said so. But closer look at the old man's blue eyes (spoiled eyes his mother calls them, and they are very pretty) turn sideways toward the old man, while unconscious, he ate and drank, ever closer to his son, then's, looking now and then from his seat through the uncurtained window that once revealed to him by night the steady ray which now shone through up their red and golden lights, as if they would illuminate the tower, and the island, and the sky! His glance at the last was full of fear, and his look of reprimand from within the house, and of some unnatural vision from without, serve to entirely unman the boy, and to bring a constraint upon him to descend from the table to his place at his mother's feet, who understands that she must pin a newspaper before that window and keep out the dark hereafter.

After tea the pipe, but no story-telling. By-and-by Tom's blue eyes and golden curls are be-draped into sleep, but his mother's "Hush! hush!" prevented a repetition of that signal of distress. And Maggie sat down to her sewing-table, let her come closer to him, lay her hand for sober talk upon his knee.

"Father, tell me all about it!"

But has he not already told? He looks at her in a sort of wonder, mixed with alarm, as if he feared that she might be an expression of existing will, defiant purpose. Then he says,

"Six to one! No, no! We must wait, Mag—we must wait."

"And what will become of them?" she whispers, and draws nearer, shuddering. She sees what he has seen dreadly, the same event again. But the old man says aloud—tries to say cheerily—for Tybee was a sailor years ago, and has a Northman's dauntless courage in his heart.

"Tom is a sailor, you girl. Can't he swim? And when he comes back there are more fish swimming than ever have been caught. There's a living for us yet."

"And it's all true! We've at war! We've got to kill each other, and burn each other's houses down, and—"

"And a few traitors to the good old Guvment, for the men of Marblehead are in arms against Old Tybee! You know they give me the office, and they've been good to us, and pus reg'lar—"

"And never caught you and sold you for an African! Father, what are you talking about?" cried Maggie, in a wrath that was wonderful to behold.

"Mag, Mag! I've seen a sight that's killed me this day!"

"I don't know, father, but I'd a rather it had killed you than to believe—" Here Maggie's voice gave way, and her tears rolled, flood-like, over her. Her father did not speak, but his sad heart cried sympathy—he took her hand and held it, and she knew there was no difference between them. The act soothed her far more than any word of his could have done. They were not divided. At last she said,

"It isn't against us the men of Marblehead are up in arms. We have no quarrel with never sleep another night in peace as long as they live here on this island and that light is out. Won't we keep it burning when it's in Guvment?"

Tybee's old arms embraced his Margaret, but he was silent yet, as she went on:

"They'll count it," she said, "they'll come who've got the right, and you'll follow 'em up those stairs to see that the light's set right again. Don't be troubled, father! You've got to live till that's settled. Who'd dare to go out of the world afore? I'd rather never see my Tom again than think it wouldn't happen. Remember your mother's dream!"

"She was allus good at that," said the old man, and he straightened himself in his chair, and looked the hopeful, that voice Maggie was used to use the result of her prophecy. (I wonder how many prophets have lifted up their voices by the fireside of this land during the April days? Have the men who lecture before Lyceums through the spring of '62 would like to repeat some themes of their discourses in the years of grace yet green in all women's memories?)

And the result encouraged her—emboldened her to advance yet further. "Do you suppose this country is given up to thieves and pirates? Before Now Year you'll see that light again! And we'll hang out the flag, so that they shall all see what we're thinking about here on this island! But we can hold our tongues. You think I can't, I can—before mother!"

Never mind! What was she thinking of? There were vessels out at that very moment drifting fast within the line of danger, doomed to destruction; some without suspicion, others on the out-look, captain and crew, starring through the darkness for that exciting light which had been the sole staying the last stave he ever would! Yet, never mind. He was but one—but one—though all the world to her.

When she spoke of the old flag two tears rolled down the wrinkled cheeks of Old Tybee. He could not tell her exactly the flag that would float from the light-house. He had left out the very bitterness of the potion when he gave the cup to her. He had tried to keep it back—tried what he could for sing-ing, as if it were a hymn, the chorus of "The Star-Spangled Banner"—but he could not do it. She knew with her own eyes in the morning discovered that Unutterable.

Maggie did not sleep that night. Her face showed pale as the dawn as the face of a watcher who has watched in fear. How many times had she risen from her bed—one to the window—listened? Was that a gun-fire? Was that a cry? And if in dreams she had dreamed of wrecks, no more could have been dashed ashore than she seemed to see with her mind's eye. She had no real, true knowledge of the world's affairs, and now for the first time conscious of remoteness, their light was not out in the spaces of war, where all is fear in the dark—but then the spirit of heroes quickened within in them!

And now for watching and waiting. And how long must they wait?

Is it to-morrow we shall enter Paradise? At least let us not doubt it shall be on some to-morrow—some to-day.

Maggie had a task to perform that did not end even the whole day. And for old Tybee was his burden she must bear in its performance. She had hope to keep alive through all mentions of disaster; the old father's daily "work" the figure of one who holds himself still responsible while the power that conferred the responsibility is disbelieved and even dismissive with scorn. For the ships wrecked, and the lives, along that coast, the continual stress of that responsibility to feel! And this during all when Old Tybee's darkened but his occupation, gave himself over to the miseries of disappointed old age; and no tidings came of Tom; and the thing she dreaded most was daily groaned that her boy would forget his father.

Yet the earnest expectation of the creature never failed. Like the flower all the camp? Are the soldiers' names all registered? She would not let her expectation fail. She domineered like a tyrant over her old father's heart, and kept her prophet's mantle closely wrapped about her, in spite of every gale. She came from Marblehead! How often she said it, though in fact Maggie had never voyaged ten miles away from the island where she was born! How often she said it, with an awful atonement that never again would she lose sight of the light-house till the alien and infamous rag that flirted from its window should give place to the splendor of the nation's flag!

So the hours-time burned on brightly; the house-keeping work kept true; all the old duties were resumed with cheerful regularity. And, day after day, Maggie said to her father, pointing to the tower, "It's time come down, and we shall live to see it;" and he knew she meant the hateful thing that flashed its falsehoods from the shore to the main day after day. Sometimes he smiled, but it was a doubter's smile, for day and night one fear, harassed Old Tybee; and he said the old man's words to the young wife, "You may live to see the end of it, but I never shall. The glory has departed!" O thou of little faith!

Day and night then, with one thought, one care, while the summer passed away, and December came within experience, and the New Year was at hand.

On Christmas Eve there hung a little stocking, outside Maggie's door, and it was full. The Saint must have stopped in his travels at that house —must have known what loyal, patient hearts had there the training of the little one—must have seen that Tom the younger was in these days on his good behavior.

Maggie Gwyn sat late by her fire in a prayerful meditation. Her thoughts were wandering slightly out of their wonted channels—for a moment she had dropped her anxious hope and fear; husband and country grew dim in their love and name. She had turned from them, as at the most gentle call of One who turned from the Heavenly ways to ours, on such a night as that long centuries ago. She seemed to see Him lying in the beatitude of infancy on his mother's knee, as Tom had lain on hers, and with reverent wonder she was following Him she knew so well how Mary must have followed through the years succeeding. And if her boy was fatherless, she had now grace to pray that a double gift of wisdom might be given her in his behalf, that at last in fullness of time a Man might stand in his father's place, a true and loyal Man, who verily should see, if the sight were withholden from her eyes, the flag of his country flying from the old round tower. All for him she prayed, until a vision was vouchsafed her of the manhood, brave and true, that should grow from even such an infant as his. And why should I discover altogether the young mother's dream? all the hope, whose glory was undimmed even by the dark shadows that encircled its place of rising? How many thousand women, by silent firesides, sit dreaming the same dream of youth that must grow up fatherless, whom the year's war has bereaved! Hope of the world! Sustainer of the fainting hearts! teach them to perfectly trust, that they may peacefully rest in Thee, and do Thy will!

While she sat there in her prayerful meditation—let me defraud you of none of the beautiful truths this hour is developing—there came, gentle as the tap, tap of the woodpecker, a touch on the window-pane. It seemed not to startle Maggie, but she looked up. Then she stood up, but stood silent. Then she moved, and not away from, but toward, the window. For she said, "There's news of Tom!" Then she opened the window, and nothing was her conviction. Then her heart stopped beating—seemed to stop. How dark it was without! But never need Maggie feel less the power of that darkness, and of the vast expanse of silence widening around her.

Neither you nor I will ever rightly know how it all came about, but presently there was a gnarled tableaux in the bedchamber of Tom's wife.

In the centre of the group stood a stalwart soldier in uniform, but not that uniform so hateful and so familiar of late to the old eyes of Tybee. Another sort of coat and head-gear than either he or Maggie had seen on their lover, behaved represented to them a military power they were compelled to regard as friendly; for Tom was clothed therewith. Was it a true or mocking cloud? They knew not the eyes that looked from beneath the turban, and the hands that were grasping theirs had that in their touch which told them as no other grasp could do—assured them, and lifted them up above their desolations to the very heights of health.

At either side of this stood Old Tybee and Margaret. Also, upright in bed, stood little Tom, staring hard at St. Nicholas, according to the best of his belief, and no one, for at least one moment after his uprising, saw the child. But then, when Tom the elder was aware!

At last came a moment when somebody must ask,

"Tom, where have you come from?"

Looking at the questioner, Tom answered her:

"It would take a week of steady talk to get through that report. And you and I've got other work on hand. We've got to protect the inhabitants of this island. They say the Gentiles have hoisted a beautiful kind of flag from that old tower father. Have they not?"

There was such a stern voice speaking through these playful words as brought out from Old Tybee an instant change of head and the quality and effect of a shout.

"God in heaven be praised!"

"What for, Tybee? what for? I should think not for such a work as that!"

"You've come to cut that cursed rag from its moorings."

"Why, so—"

Consider the appalling answer. Descend into the dreadful silence and darkness through which Maggie broke with words like these:

"Then go your ways. Let us alone!"

Tom stared her by catching up his boy, whom Maggie, for some unaccountable reason, had been busy dressing in his Christmas suit, his holiday rig.

"Follow me," he said; "and if any man attempts to tear down the Stars and Stripes shoot him on the spot! That's my platform. Now, father, will you come? You'll find our crew down there waiting for you. I promised 'em 'd have 'em the Governor of this island; and he's the only man who's got the right to set that nonsense you talk aboard. Come on, and get the flag up flying, and make ready to strike a light. Hurrah for the campaign! Hurrah for 1862!"

A dozen miles at the same manner shall hail it. And often as he hails the light let him smile a benediction downward for the sake of Old Tybee, who, after all, had need to see the end of the desolation he had the heart to weep for.

IMPORTANT FACTS.—Constant writing for six months is done cheaper with Gold Pens than with Steel Pens; therefore, it is economy to use Gold Pens.

The Gold Pen remains unchanged by years of continued use, while the Steel Pen is ever changing by corrosion and wear; therefore, perfect uniformity of writing is obtained only by the use of the Gold Pen.

The Gold Pen is more ready and reliable, while the Steel Pen must be often condemned and a new one selected; therefore, there is great saving of time in the use of the Gold Pen.

Gold is capable of receiving any degree of elasticity, so that the Gold Pen is exactly adapted to the hand of the writer; therefore, the nerves of the hand and arms are not injured, as is known to be the case by the use of Steel Pens.

See "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword," in the next column.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Printing Offices for the People.

Price.
Printing Office No. 2, press printing, 8vo, for 8 inches, $25 00
" " 4, " " 12x18 " 40 00
" " 5, " " 13x19 " 60 00

ADAMS PRESS COMPANY,
81 Park Row, New York.

The Army Drum and Fife Book.

Containing Instructions, the Reveille, Tattoo, Calls, and Beats, added to which are Infantry Bugle Calls, and Calls for Skirmishers in Double Files. Price 75 cents. Mailed postpaid. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

Russian Beaver Cloaks
At Popular Prices.
United States Cloak and Mantilla Store,
304 and 306 Canal Street, N. Y.
GEO. CAREY.

JEWELRY! JEWELRY!—The Head-Quarters for all Cash Buyers of fine and cheap Jewelry, Miniature Pins of all the Heroes. Persons wishing to see samples, send stamp for full particulars. W. A. HAYWARD (Manufacturing Jeweler), 335 Broadway.

The Ordnance Manual,
For the use of the Officers of the United States Army.
1 vol. 8vo, 512 pages. Cloth, $2 50.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
192 Broadway, New York.

Black Cloth Cloaks
At Popular Prices.
United States Cloak and Mantilla Store,
304 and 306 Canal Street, N. Y.
GEO. CAREY.

A New Cartridge Revolver.
Carrying Six Balls (60 to the pound). Any one wanting a superior Pocket or Belt Arm will find this to be the best in the market. Send for circular.
MERWIN & BRAY, Agents, 265 Broadway, N. Y.
Or MERWIN & CO., 58½, corner 7th and D Streets, Washington, D. C.

Vineland.—For Sale.
FARMS, of various sizes, at the new Settlement of Vineland, only 30 miles from Philadelphia. The soil is a fine clay loam, highly productive of choice fruits, grapes, peaches, wheat, grass, vegetables, &c.
Twenty thousand acres have been divided into farms of 20 acres and upward, at the low price of from $15 to $20 per acre.
One fourth cash, balance in four years. Also, Lots of ½ to 5 acres for fruit gardens, at from $100 to $300 each.
The climate is delightful and healthful, and very beneficial to Pulmonary Complaints.
To persons of some means, or out of business, this is a rare opportunity to establish a rural home in the best of markets, and be certain of a livelihood. This is the true remedy for hard times. Large sums now people of the best character, and forming the best society, are settling.
Route to Vineland.—Leave Walnut Street wharf, Philadelphia, at 9 A.M. and 4 P.M. by railway direct. Report of Some Editors of New York Tribune and Vineland Herald, can be had by applying to
COL. R. LANDIS, P. M.,
Vineland, Cumberland County, N. J.
Letters answered.

"Something New for All."
GEN. GEO. B. MCCLELLAN and her own Union Prize GIFT BOOKS, Unique Designs, Novelties. Seventy-five cents worth of indispensable articles for 25 cents. Agents Wanted. Sample by mail to $10 paid. Agents, male and female, everywhere. Address, with stamp for circulars, BRIDGMAN & CO., 630 Broadway, New York.

IMPORTANT INFORMATION to all women afflicted with female weakness, or uterine disease, or irregularities, will be received by inclosing a postage stamp to Professor WILSON, 1 Union Square, Philadelphia Greenberg Company, No. 2 Bond Street, N. Y.

Cavalry Tactics;
Or, Regulations for the Instruction, Formation, and Movements of the Cavalry of the Army and Volunteers of the United States. By Philip St. Geo. Cooke, Brig.-Gen. U. S. Army. 2 vols. 12mo. Cloth, $2 50.
Sent free by mail on receipt of price.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
192 Broadway, New York.

To Army and Navy Officers.
TIFFANY & CO., Nos. 550 and 552 Broadway, have in store, and are now receiving, a large assortment of watches, "warranted to suit wrought iron;" from Solingen; Passants, Canes, Umbrellas, and other Embroideries. Fancy Goods, Gold Epaulettes and Navy Lace, &c., from London. Orders by mail promptly filled, and goods forwarded to all parts of the loyal States.

The best Books for Holiday Presents!!
Beautifully bound ENGLISH BIBLES, AMERICAN TYPOGRAPHY, Diamond Bibles, Church Services, &c., in choice variety, and suited to all tastes and purposes.
SPECIAL INDUCEMENTS TO BIBLE AND WEDDING FRIENDS, at prices from $15 to $50.
LYON & SCOTTISWOODE,
626 Broadway, New York.
(☞ Branch of the London Establishment.)

Wanted—Commercial Agents, local and traveling, of energy and ability, to whom steady and liberal employ. Terms liberal—business desirable. For particulars, address CLARK & CO., Manchester, N. H.

"The PEN is Mightier than the Sword."
THE GOLD PEN—THE BEST OF ALL PENS.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS.

The Best Pens in the World.
On receipt of any of the following sums in cash or poststamps, the subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise directed, a Gold Pen, or Pens, selecting the same according to description, viz.:
GOLD PENS, WITHOUT CASES.
For 25 cents, the Always-Ready Pen: for 38 cents, the Lucky Pen; for 50 cents, the Always-Ready Pen; for 75 cents, the Elegant Pen; and for $1, the Incredible Pen.
The sizes are, Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6.
THE SAME PENS IN GOLD-PLATED EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.
For 50 cents, the Always-Ready Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 25, the Elegant Pen; and for $1 50, the Incredible Pen. These are well-finished, good writing Gold Pens, with Iridomin Points. Any one can try every one of which will fit and outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens.
The name "A. Morton," "Number," and "Quality" are stamped on the following Pens, and the Points are warranted for three months against special accident. The numbers indicate size only: No. 1 being the smallest, No. 6 the largest, adapted for the pocket; No. 4 the smallest, and No. 10 the largest Mammoth Gold Pen, for the desk. Long and medium nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Nos. 4, 5, 6, and 7, and made only of first quality. The engraving will be fac-similes of the sizes and styles.
GOLD PENS, WITHOUT CASES.
For 75 cents, No. 1 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.
For $1, a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 4 pen 3d quality.
For $1 25, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.
For $1 50, a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.
For $1 75, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.
For $2 25 a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.
THE SAME GOLD PENS IN SILVER EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.
For $1 50, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.
For $1 75 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.
For $2, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.
For $2 25, a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.
For $2 50, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality, or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.
For $3 50 a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.
GOLD PENS, ALL 1st QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED CASES, WITH PENCILS.
For $2, a No. 4 Pen; for $2 25, a No. 5 Pen; for $2 75, No. 6 Pen; for $3, a No. 7 Pen; for $3 50, a No. 8 Pen; and for $4, a No. 9 Pen; and for $6, a No. 10 Pen.
The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridomin Points, carefully selected, and none of this quality are sold and which have generally imperfection which skill and the closest scrutiny can detect.
The "2d Quality" are inferior to any Pens made by him previous to the year 1860.
The "3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity, and Good Writing Qualities (the only three considerations) any Gold Pens made elsewhere.
In regard to the Cheap Gold Pens, he begs leave to say that, having recently purchased New and Unrivaled Machines, he could not have made as Good Writing and Durable Pens, for the price, had the Gold been furnished gratuitously.
Every ordering must in all instances specify the "number" and "quality" of the Pens or Pens and Cases wanted.
☞ For sale by all dealers in the line throughout the country.
Address
A. MORTON,
No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.
Any one sending a single letter post-stamp will receive a circular with the engravings above referred to.

DR. JAYNE'S CELEBRATED COMPOUND RHEUMATIC AND NEURALGIC PILLS.
A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agents F. C. WELLS & CO., 112 Franklin St., New York. And by Apothecaries and Druggists generally.

AGENTS.—Our new mammoth Price List of Watches, Jewelry, &c., is just out. It has a novel proposition for Prize Packet Sales! Mailed to anywhere. Address HUBBARD BROS., 65 Nassau Street, N. Y.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may gain a married partner, irrespective of age or position, prepossessing or otherwise, with a treatise on the Art of Fascinating any person you wish. A certain scientific experiment which never fails. Free for 25 cents. Address T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Box 2200, Philadelphia.

French Seal Skin Cloaks
At Popular Prices.
United States Cloak and Mantilla Store,
304 and 306 Canal Street, N. Y.
GEO. CAREY.

$100 PER MONTH.—Agents, male and female, wanted in every County in the United States. For particulars call on or address, with stamp, CHARLES M. BROWN, No. 74 Broadway St., corner Broadway, N. Y.

Something New for Ladies.
DOWNER'S PATENT CORSET AND SHIELD SKIRT combined—the labor of hand-sewing, to it prot ects the front from soiling, and gives a neat, even finish while the corsetier is sewing. Sample sent on receipt of the price, TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Liberal discount to the trade. Enterprising Agents can realize $150 per Month.

Descriptive Circulars furnished on application.
A. H. DOWNER, 82 Beekman St., New York.

COOLEY'S Cabinet Printing Office for small Printers and Amateurs, the best thing out. Send for Circulars.
C. C. COOLEY & CO., 1 Spruce Street, N. Y.

The Current and Back Numbers of Harper's Weekly can be had of J. C. HUNT, Wholesale and Retail News Agent, Malone Hall, Hilton, Fitchburg, Fa-

Davis, Collamore & Co.
Now offer their entire stock of
HOLIDAY GOODS,
Consisting of DINING AND TEA SUITS,
MANTEL VASES,
GILT CUPS,
TETE A TETE SETS,
FANCY WARE,
BUREAU SETS, &c., &c.,
At Extraordinary Low Prices!
GLASS WARE, beautifully engraved with crest or initial, to order.
TEA TRAYS, CUTLERY, &c., &c.,
All new this goods.
479 Broadway, New York,
between Broome and Grand Streets.

CHRISTMAS!!!
Cloaks! Cloaks! Cloaks!
For the Holidays,
at BRODIE'S
OLD STAND,
300 Canal Street,
and
His Palace of Fashion,
Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,
Cor. of 234 Street,
New York.

The Army Officers' Pocket Companion.
Principally designed for Staff Officers in the Field. Partly translated from the French by M. de Koven, Lieutenant-Colonel of the French Staff Corps, with Additions from standard American, French, and English authorities. By WILLIAM P. CRAIGHILL, First Lieutenant U. S. Corps of Engineers, Assistant Professor of Engineering at the United States Military Academy.
1 vol. 18mo, full morocco, $1 50.
Sent free by mail on receipt of price.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, 192 Broadway, N. Y.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS. — (SELPHO'S Patent), 518 Broadway, New York. Send for Circular. Send for a Circular.

500 Agents Wanted!
Something New. The best Work Made—Made of The New Gold, and 9 other curious inventions. Address send stamp SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to
HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!
All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, and all other places, should be sent, at half rate, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Suites charged for rates.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS wanted. Large commission honorable business. Address, with stamp, A. W. HARTMAN, Hilton Head, S. C.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For January, 1862.
CONTENTS.
THE FRANCONIAN SWITZERLAND. By Bayard Taylor.
Illustrations.—Streitberg.—Franconian Peasantry.—Wonders.—Castle of Giesswenstein.—View in Tachersfeld.—Rock near Rabenstein.—Ruins of Gross Pad. Wrotzen.—Fine Residences.—Impediments.—The Tempest.—Klingor's Grotto.—Thun Fur, and no Further.—The Haberstein.
HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY. By Benson J. Lossing.
Illustrations.—The Shannon taking the Chesapeake laid Hallowell.—Jack Hopkins.—Judson Barney.—Richard Dale.—Truxtun's Medal.—Edward Preble.—Naval Monument at Annapolis.—A Tripolitan Galley.—Lake Lyon Haven Bay.—John Rodgers.—Isaac Hull.—Jacob Jones.—A Way on a Privateer.—William Bainbridge.—James Lawrence.—The Chesapeake and Shannon.—Sir Philip Broke.—Portrait of Commodore Decatur.—Burrows and Blyth.—Pat-de-Boy.—Isaac Chauncey.—Oliver H. Perry.—Commodore Perry.—Commodore Thomas Macdonough.—Downie's Grave.—Johnston Blakeley.—Stephen Decatur.—The Constitution.—Algiers.—Decatur's Monument.
THE ZOU-ZOU.
MY DEAREST LOVE.
MY BRIER-WOOD PIPE AND WHAT IT COST ME.
THE LOVE OF A SOLDIER.
CHRIS FARLEY. By Anthony Trollope.—Illustrated by J. E. Millais.
Chapter XXXIII. The Angel of Light.
Chapter XXXIV. Mr. Farnaby looks for Assistance.
Chapter XXXV. Love was still the Lord of all.
Chapter XXXVI. What the Man Was thinking about it.
Illustrations.—Felix Writes.—Mary's Letter.
MUHLTABEL WESLEY. By J. S. Haganey, D.D.
UNDER THE LEAVES.
SAMUEL F. B. MORSE.
THE LIFE AND CRIMES OF PHILIP. By W. M. Thackeray.
Chapter XXV. Infandi Dolores.
Chapter XXVI. Contains a Tug of War.
Chapter XXVII. Contains a Brief.—Greek meets Greek.—Comfort in Grief.
CURTIS'S NEW CHARACTER.
HINTS FOR TRAVELERS.
EDITOR'S RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S PORTFOLIO BUREAU.
EDITORS BIG BOOK.—Book of Illustrations.
THE ADVANCE OF MISS SMITH'S BONNET.—With Sixteen Fine Engravings.
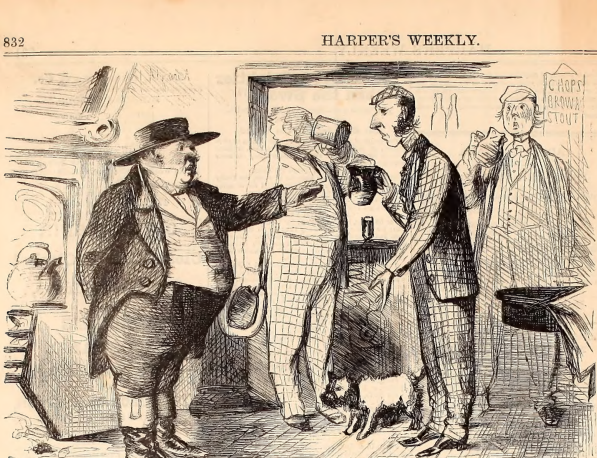
SONG FOR JANUARY.
Illustrations.—Evening Dress.—Walking Robe.

TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) $2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Eight subscribers.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.



HIGHLY INDIGNANT BRITON. "TO HARMS! TO HARMS!! BRITONS HARONSE!!!"
MR. BULL. "HI say, control your just INDIGNATION. The blarsted Yankees 'av MASON and SLIDELL, you know; but we'll make 'em Hapologize or Fight, you see, for not taking the TRENT. Cargo and all. To be sure we will, by George!"

AN (UN) CIVIL ENGINEER. "If he won't let me in, I'll Jerk the Bell out, or—or—or—I'll Publish a Pamphlet?"

(Heart-rending Account (in his Pamphlet, passim) of his Attempts to get into GEN. MCCLELLAN'S House.—Vide Mr. FLEET.)

"Maum Guinea."

This name bids fair to become memorable in our literature. The character of that singular woman is a new creation, as startling and real as the state of the slave which it so wonderfully reproduces. Her "Children" are other slaves, each of whom has a life history of a nature at once to enchain interest. The peculiar and novel nature of the subject—Christmas Week among the American Slaves—is treated with such power, pathos, humor, and keen appreciation of character, that it must stand out in relief as one of the most original and thoroughly delightful romances in our literature. As a romance of fact, it is one of the very best ever offered to the American public, and fully warrants all the encomiums lavished upon it in all quarters. Its unusual sale is but in keeping with its merits. Every one who reads it is intensely gratified. It bids fair to find its way to the FIRESIDE OF AMERICA to a greater extent than any romance since the days of "Uncle Tom" and "Jane Eyre." Ask for

Maum Guinea

and her Plantation "Children."

A ROSARIE OF
CHRISTMAS WEEK AMONG THE LOUISIANA SLAVES.
By MRS. VICTOR.

For sale by all NEWS DEALERS. PRICE TWENTY CENTS. Beautifully Illustrated. Send post-paid on receipt of price.

Address BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.

Best Thing for Agents.

AGENTS WANTED—To sell something entirely new and original—none others like them—the Union Prize Stationery and Receipt Package. Each package contains a beautiful and correct engraving of GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, on his 19 Valuable Receipts.

6 White Flag Envelopes, in colors.
6 Ladies' White Flag Envelopes, in colors.
6 Buff Envelopes.
6 sheets Commercial Note Paper.
6 Sheets Fine Ladies' Note Paper.
6 Sheets Ladies' Billet Paper.
1 Accommodation Penholder.
2 Fine Steel Pens.
1 Fine Pencil.
1 Sheet Blotting Paper.
1 Gift of Valuable Jewelry.

Retail price for the whole, twenty-five cents. Agents wanted in every city, town, and village. Call or address, enclosing stamp,

RICKARDS & CO.,
102 Nassau Street, New York.

Unceasing Wonders.

Parisian Cabinet of Wonders and Anatomy, 563 Broadway, New York.

(Next door to Bull and Block.)

Where man may trace his development from the 21st day of conception, and where at one glance is seen 1700 parts of the human body. In conjunction with these wondrous sights, a monster child, with FOUR legs, TWO heads, and FOUR arms, has just been added to this already interesting and instructive institution.

LECTURES DAILY.

Open for gentlemen only, from 10 A.M. till 10 P.M.

Admission 25 cents.

FASHIONABLE

HOLIDAY GOODS.

Elegant Dress Shirts,
With French Embroidered Bosom.

Three and Four Ply Linen Collars,
Holiday Styles now ready.

Silk, Wool, Merino, and Cotton
Under Shirts and Drawers.

Gauntlets and Gloves,
Some New Styles.

Robes de Chambre,
Elegant and New Styles.

Union Riding-Belts,
For Equestrians' Use.

Gymnastic Goods,
Approved Styles.

Ladies' and Misses' Gaiters,
Velvet, Cloth, and Knitted.

Knit Hoods, Sontags, and Caps,
Fashionable Colors and Styles.

Ringwood Gloves,
White and Colored.

Negligee Shirts,
For Traveling.

Suspenders.

Umbrellas,
&c., &c.

A large and elegant variety of the above goods, entirely new and choice styles, many of them manufactured on the premises, and not to be had elsewhere, will be found at popular prices, at

UNION ADAMS,
637 Broadway, New York City.

Head-Quarters for Jewelry.

A full assortment of all kinds appropriate for the Jewelry Envelope and Gift Jewelry Business. Persons can order the amount they would like to have sent, and pay the Express, and have the privilege of returning any thing they may wish to. W. A. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, New York.

Skating Caps

ON

Hand and made to Order, by

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York City.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

Splendid List!!

Of Articles to be Sold for One Dollar each.

100	Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100.00 each
100	" Watches	50.00 each
250	Ladies' Gold Watches	25.00 each
500	Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches	15.00 each
3600	Vest and Neck Chains	5.00 to 10.00 each
2000	Gold Bead Bracelets	5.00 to 10.00 each
3000	" "	3.00 to 5.00 each
1500	Cameo Brooches	4.00 to 6.00 each
1000	Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000	Lava and Florentine Brooches	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000	Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000	Cameo Ear Drops	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000	Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000	Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000	Coral, Opal, and Em. Ear Drops	4.00 to 6.00 each
1500	Gents' Breast Pins	2.50 to 5.00 each
1000	Watch Keys	5.00 to 6.00 each
5000	Fob and Ribbon Slides	5.00 to 6.00 each
5000	Sets of Bosom Studs	5.50 to 6.00 each
5000	Sleeve Buttons	5.50 to 6.00 each
1000	Plain Rings	2.50 to 5.00 each
7000	Stone Set Rings	2.50 to 6.00 each
1000	Lockets	2.50 to 10.00 each
10000	Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5.00 to 15.00 each
10000	Gold Pens, 14 Carats and Warranted	4.00 to 5.00 each

(with Silver Mounted Holders.)

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, will be placed in envelopes and sealed. These envelopes will be sent by mail, or delivered as called for, without regard to choice. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1, eleven for $2, thirty for $5, sixty-five for $10, and one hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

W. FORSYTH & CO.
208 Broadway, corner of Fulton Street, New York.

N.B. We wish it distinctly understood that all articles of jewelry not giving perfect satisfaction can be returned and the money will be refunded.

The McClellan Gift Writing-Desk.

Something New for Agents. Something New for Agents.

A portable writing-desk, containing three kinds of the following articles: Writing paper, envelopes, pens, pencil, pen-holder, blotting-paper, and a bottle of ink. EACH DESK CONTAINS A GIFT OF JEWELRY, ELIGIBLING ALL AND EVERY GIFT JEWELRY ARTICLES OFFERED TO THE PUBLIC.

The retail price for the McClellan Gift Writing-Desk IS ONLY 25 CENTS! Agents wanted all over the country. For particulars address with stamp, W. H. CATLEY, 102 Nassau Street, New York City.

WARD'S

Perfect Fitting Shirts,

MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN.

Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, drawings of different styles of Shirts, sent free everywhere.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,
No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

Snow's Pure Confectionery,
200 Kinds, 623 Broadway, N. Y. Wholesale and Retail. Dealers enclose stamp for catalogue and prices.

WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Marriage Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 182 Broadway. Samples by mail.

CENTRAL PARK SKATE EMPORIUM.

Skates 75 cents to 25 dollars. Everything in the skating line (except boots) sold all sizes, prices, fastest, safest, and purest. CONOVER & WALKER, 474 Broadway, N. Y. Out of town orders attended to carefully and promptly.

The Wide World!

A racy and spirited complete Story Paper! Printed every week in Boston. Sold by News Dealers everywhere. 4 cents.

A FREE GIFT TO ALL.

Send three-cent stamp for Catalogue to H. MARANVILLE, Akron, Ohio.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

Notwithstanding the great amount of space devoted to Illustrations of the War, Harper's Weekly commenced in No. 241, dated August 19th, a new and thrilling PERIODICAL TALE, by Sir EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, entitled,

"A STRANGE STORY,"

which will be continued from week to week till completed.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	4 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.